The Danish foreign ministry said it transferred about 2 million euros to the PA as part of the "plan for democracy, proper conduct, rule of law and human rights."

The Dutch foreign ministry refused to give details, and Norway confirmed a 1.25 million-euro transfer to the PA.

Britain announced it has transferred to the NSU more than nine million pounds sterling (13.7 million euros) since 1999.

In answer to a parliamentary question in the House of Lords two weeks ago, Baroness Valerie Amos said, "The purpose of the project was to provide professional legal, technical, policy and communications advice to the PA in preparation for, and during, permanent status negotiations with Israel. Following the breakdown of formal negotiations, the NSU has broadened its role by seeking to encourage the resumption of permanent status negotiations by contributing to a variety of diplomatic peace initiatives."

Lambert said the financial aid to the PA has created an absurd situation.

"On the one hand, the EU and Norway objected to the ICJ's involvement in the separation fence issue, but in fact, they gave funds to a body acting against their own interests," he said.

In related developments, Britain has agreed to finance new operation centres for the Palestinian police in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The centres will be set up in the coming weeks in all Palestinian cities to improve police capabilities, British and Palestinian sources said. They will be under the supervision of Haj Ismail Jabar, the commander of the Palestinian national security mechanism. The PA says they will be established in an attempt to regain control of the cities.

Israeli defence sources said the British aid aims to strengthen the Palestinian police in the territories and is part of its support for Palestinian bodies acting against terrorist organizations.

'Bridging the Rift' with scientific research centre

By TAMAR MORAD
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ITHACA, N.Y. — Israel and Jordan are breaking ground tomorrow on a major scientific research centre that aims to create a comprehensive computer databank of genetic information on humans, animals and plants. Some believe it has the potential to become one of the biggest science projects ever.

The facility will be located on 150 acres that straddle both sides of the Israeli-Jordanian border, 80 kilometres south of the Dead Sea. Two major U.S. universities – Cornell and Stanford – will develop the centre with a private New York-based organization called Bridging the Rift. Doctoral degrees will be offered that include course work at the two universities and fieldwork at the centre, which will also be known as Bridging the Rift.

The goal is for scientists from Israel, Jordan and the two universities – and eventually others, including scientists from other Arab countries – to create a comprehensive computer databank of all living systems, called the "Library of Life."

"This is a huge upgrading of relations between Israel and Jordan, and potentially between Israel and the Arab world," said Ra'anan Gissin, a spokesperson for Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

> 'Scientifically, this has the potential to be one of the biggest science projects of all time'

"Scientifically, this has the potential to be one of the biggest science projects of all time," said Ron Elber, an Israeli professor of computer science at Cornell who will serve as the centre's director.

The project will require the development of complex new software and database systems to help make predictions at genetic levels and to help understand the co-evolution of species and the ways in which ecology affects DNA. It could take decades to complete, and Elber said, it "could be bigger than putting man on the moon," in terms of the quantity of work involved and the value of adding to scientific knowledge.

Faculty involved in the project said the centre will advance beyond GenBank, the database operated by the National Institutes of Health in the United State, which is part of an international database of DNA information.

The Library of Life will record genetic codes and analyze how genes interact with and adapt to their environments, which has not yet been done on a large scale. For example, Elber said, "some species developed 'antifreeze' genes, or proteins, because they live in extremely cold conditions. We assume, but we do not know yet, that such special proteins were developed also for the desert environment."

But the three-part ground-breaking ceremony is a sign of the political sensitivities involved. While a delegation from Cornell and Stanford will take part in a ceremony at the site, Sharon and Jordan's King Abdullah II will conduct separate ceremonies in Jerusalem and Amman.

The project has been stopped and started several times since work began four years ago. Since the start of the intifadah, Jordan has not wanted to go public with such a major venture with Israel until now, according to a Cornell source.

The idea for a joint Israeli-Jordanian research centre came from Mati Kochavi, an Israeli businessman who is Bridging the Rift's chief executive. Kochavi came together with Steven Tanksley, a professor of plant breeding at Cornell, who developed the Library of Life concept. Funds for the centre, which one source said are "in the multi-millions," have come from private donors.

The Arava site was chosen because it is relatively safe and quiet. Its location on the border will enable scientists from other Arab countries to enter from Jordan.

Elber said the desert is also the best kind of environment in which to create a prototype – to be called the Library of the Desert – for the Library of Life. As there are few living things in the desert, collecting and cataloguing information there is feasible in a relatively short period of time.

The area near the Dead Sea is "perfect for researching what happens in extreme environments – places with high salinity and high temperatures," said Marc Feldman, a professor of biological sciences at Stanford who chairs the joint Cornell-Stanford academic committee for the centre. Feldman anticipates the centre will eventually house a variety of other scientific research projects.

The centre's "location, in the Middle East, the birth of civilization, has symbolic significance," Elber said. "It could help the Middle East become the centre of civilization again."

The first students from Israel and Jordan will begin doctoral course work at Cornell and Stanford in January 2005. Upon completion of the centre – expected in three to five years – they will come to do research. Likewise, faculty and students from Cornell, Stanford and universities in Israel and Jordan will also come to work on the gene bank.

Toronto entertainer melts off 54 lbs.

"I lost 54 lbs. in 4 months thanks to Positive Changes Hypnosis! My suit size dropped from a heavy 60 to a lean 46.

Depressed & Overweight

My name is Robin Langdon. I'm an entertainer in Toronto. I was pudgy as a kid, but I was really overweight for the past 13 years. I'm a drummer, a vocalist, and an actor, and I expend a lot of energy entertaining. However, I injured my back and had to have surgery, which kept me from exercising. My eating habits didn't change, though. I ended up gaining over 50 lbs.! Then depression set in and I ate even more.

I started eating at night. I would wake up at 2 or 3 A.M. and start bingeing. That's when I really started packing on the pounds. I knew it didn't make sense, but it was a habit I couldn't break.

I tried many ways to lose weight over the years. I tried diet pills. Those were the worst. I tried starvation and the point system. I lost 65 pounds, but then regained it all. I denied myself too much with counting points and weekly weigh-ins. All diets are about denial.

Easy and Fun Weight Loss

That's when I spotted an ad for Positive Changes Hypnosis in The Canadian Jewish News. I showed the ad to my wife. She said, 'Go for it,' so I called for the free evaluation. Everything about hypnosis was well explained, and I was not rushed or pressured to make a decision. I thought about it and talked to my family about the program. Then I signed up and melted off 11 inches around my waist! I haven't looked back since.

With hypnosis, my weight loss has been easy and fun. I don't have to think about it — it's been effortless. I lost 5 lbs. my first week and 12-13 lbs. my first month! I drink lots of water and I've made many other good habit changes.

I first realized hypnosis was working for me about 6 weeks into my hypnosis program, when I played at a friend's 25th anniversary party. They brought out a strawberry shortcake the size of a table! Strawberry shortcake was always my favourite dessert, but I was able to look at it and just walk away. The significance of that didn't hit me until I was packing up my equipment at the end of the evening. I said to myself, "I just made a positive change!"

"Perfect Control"

Thanks to hypnosis, I'm now in perfect control. I feel great! I can move around more easily since I lost weight, which makes my performance better. My stress level is way, way down. I just feel healthier. I have that spring back in my step.

Losing weight with hypnosis gives you confidence, too, because you are achieving something. You're saying to the world, "Look at me, I can do this. You can too!"

I believe my weight loss is permanent. Losing weight is about habit changes; not dieting or denial or scales or tape measures. That's why I recommend Positive Changes Hypnosis at the drop of a hat to anyone who wants to lose weight.

If you want to make changes to your life, why not try Positive Changes Hypnosis — you'll be glad you did. Tell them Robin sent you."

Boning Up

Building healthy bones at the Bernard Betel Centre

Instructor Karen Shuster with Thursday-morning Osteofit students.

At a time when many older adults are alarmed by looming health problems, members of the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living are fighting back. On Tuesdays and Thursdays, students gather for Osteofit classes to help prevent bone loss and build strength and balance.

The best defense against osteoporosis is starting early, says Betel Centre Wellness Co-ordinator, Jessica Rossman. Called a "silent thief," osteoporosis can steal bone mass for years without warning signs. When estrogen levels are falling, the body is at its greatest risk, and activity makes a big difference. "When you're sedentary," Rossman says, "you run into problems. People who are inactive are going to have more pain."

Rossman, who recently hosted a Wellness workshop on laughter, says Osteofit exercise is "functional," aiming to make everyday living easier for participants of any age: "Things like carrying groceries; preventing falls."

One of the Betel Centre's many younger seniors, Dorit Mazor, is an Osteofit regular.

Dorit Mazor

Dora Lichtenfeld

Klara Noik

"I love it...the teacher is wonderful," says Dorit. "She makes us want to come."

Fellow participant Leslie Roth is also enthusiastic about longtime instructor Karen Shuster. "She really keeps you going... she exercises every part of your body, from your head down." Leslie says her Thursday-morning Osteofit class has helped immensely.

"It's terrific... she keeps us moving the whole hour. There is a lady here who wouldn't be walking if it wasn't for this class."

Shuster speaks passionately about how regular exercise maintains vigour. Though one in four Canadian women over 50 will develop osteoporosis (one in eight men), regular exercise helps prevent traumatic fractures while increasing strength and balance.

"Weight training does all that," says Shuster, adding that balance can be affected by many factors, including medication and inner ear disorders.

She says the main difference between Osteofit and other fitness classes is in "the types of exercises we don't do," which could be harmful to people with osteoporosis, like bending from the waist, which puts excess pressure on the back. "We try and teach people how to maneuver in a safer, more effective way."

Instructor Karen Shuster

Shuster has formed a strong bond with many of her students, and they feel just as warmly towards her.

"She has a nice personality," says Klara Noik, who says she is more energetic thanks to Osteofit classes. She particularly appreciates Shuster's emphasis on weights and leg strength. "It's really wonderful...this is so important for our age."

At any age, Shuster says, exercise just makes sense. "If you don't take time for being well, you're eventually going to have to take time for being ill."

Osteofit participants also enjoy other activites at the Betel Centre, like Tuesday-morning LLI lectures. Klara has just finished a computer course. Dora Lichtenfeld says she comes to see friends as well as to exercise. "I'm with people... it helps me not to sit."

"I always tell people how great this place is," Leslie says. "I like the people... we have a wonderful time."

Circle of Care celebrates 30 years of service to the Jewish Community.

A Little Bit of History

There's one large wall at the Circle of Care offices in North York that's been dubbed "memory lane". Numerous pictures, plaques, and certificates pictorially depict the Agency's activities and personalities from inception. Notable, is a framed article reprinted from a 1974 issue of the Canadian Jewish News, announcing the creation by the organized Jewish community of Co-ordinated Services to the Jewish Elderly – a new agency with a mandate to assume responsibility as the central 'home support' organization to North York's Jewish seniors. CSJE represented a fresh, innovative approach to helping seniors face their new health realities while maintaining their independence to live in their own homes.

Look at us Today!

From modest beginnings operating out of a small bungalow in North York, with a staff of 8, over a 30 year span Coordinated Services to the Jewish Elderly melded into Senior Care and today is known as Circle of Care, one of the largest, most respected home care agencies in this city and province – a not for profit organization providing services across Greater Toronto Area, with a full complement of programs to meet the needs of our aging community. Circle of Care is accredited by the Canadian Council on Health Services Accreditation (CCHSA) as an organization that meets the highest standards of service provision and delivery.

We continue on a remarkable journey made possible over the past 30 years by the combined efforts of our staff and literally thousands of incredible volunteers who have been true community leaders. Today, the organization is backed by a skillful and dedicated in-house staff of 50, over 400 Personal Support Workers in the field, a 12 member volunteer Board of Directors and more than 500 field volunteers of all ages, whose teamwork supports a home care program to more than 4,000 clients of all ages, annually.

Generous donors and responsive and progressive funding bodies – UJA Federation, United Way of Metropolitan Toronto, the Ontario Ministry of Health, the City of Toronto, and ongoing support from the Community Care Access Centres of North York, Toronto, Scarborough, and Etobicoke/York and the Circle of Care Foundation underpin the Agency's ability to excel.

- the only Kosher Meals on Wheels program in Toronto
- homemaking, respite and personal care
- palliative care and support
- social work and care management programs
- elder abuse services
- information and assessment services
- volunteer visiting programs
- transportation programs
- Alzheimer's and dementia support groups
- educational and health promotion programs
- supportive housing programs

Identifying A Need

Who can benefit from Circle of Care services?

- A relative of any age who is unable to care for him or herself
- Someone soon to be discharged from hospital to recover at home
- An individual needing support in overcoming mental health issues
- A housebound friend needing nutritious food prepared for them regularly
- Anyone feeling the emotional and physical strain of caring for another, young or old, who is ill.

Circle of Care is a recognized leader in the innovation of new approaches to home care – publishing educational and training materials, participating in research, working hand in hand with local and provincial government, and cultivating partnerships with numerous community organizations in the community at large.

Circle of Care is absolutely dedicated to fulfill its mission to support individual independence and quality of life in the community. Within a broad framework and commitment to Jewish values, Circle of Care strives to provide excellence of care and leadership in the home care field.

Junk-food-junkie-turned-marathon-runner practices what she preaches

Bean there. Done that. For Natalie Bean-Sole, Nutrition Forever Inc. is not just a business; it's the fruition of a lifelong obsession with health and fitness, a celebration of her personal victory over obesity, and a commitment to help others achieve similar goals.

Lost 60 pounds and has kept it off for 10 years

As an overweight child who endured the typical gamut of fat jokes well into adolescence, Bean-Sole traded in her junk food addiction at age 16 for regular workouts and a wholesome diet. So complete was the turnaround that by age 18, she had become a Club Med fitness instructor. In 1999, her personal fitness odyssey culminated with the opening of Nutrition Forever.

Today, the effervescent 30-year-old — a full 60 pounds lighter than at age 20 — is living testimony to the value of a healthy lifestyle. Visitors to her uplifting, sunswept headquarters are received in a friendly, personal manner and introduced to the two cornerstones of Nutrition Forever's weight loss strategy:

- A diet that allows you to enjoy wholesome foods every two to three hours, with the emphasis on low sugar, low carbs and low fat;
- Detailed menu planning in the form of YES/NO lists indicating the foods you're allowed to eat in a particular week and those you're not. (Eat to Lose, Nutrition Forever's upcoming in-house cookbook, will further facilitate menu planning).

In a confidential, one-on-one environment, each client receives:

- a thorough initial consultation during which a detailed menu is prescribed;
- brief weekly follow-up meetings for the duration of the program, which typically lasts four to 20 weeks;
- ongoing advice by phone and e-mail, as well as referrals to personal trainers as needed. Two in particular — Carrie Burstein and Paul De Oliveira — enjoy a close working relationship with Bean-Sole and come highly recommended for their dedication and expertise.

Weight loss program has 98% success rate

For added convenience, a selection of nourishing salads, soups, and breads prepared expressly for Nutrition Forever can be purchased at (or catered from) Haymishe Bagel's 3031 Bathurst Street location.

Embarking on a weight loss program doesn't mean you have to give up noshing completely; Nutrition Forever carries delicious, naturally-sweetened, Kosher Frozfruit bars, and offers free delivery with purchase.

Future plans include a house brand low-fat ice cream, to be developed by Bean-Sole's husband Bobby — an expert in the art of homemade ice cream. (Now we know why Bean-Sole took up marathon running).

Nutrition Forever's growing clientele hails from all walks of life and emanates from all corners of the GTA and beyond. Referrals by physicians account for many of these customers, including a large number of diabetic patients who have seen their sugar levels improve dramatically under Nutrition Forever's regime. The bottom line: a 98% success rate for weight loss clients.

In addition to detailed menu planning and related services, Nutrition Forever offers a free session for every friend referred. Gift Certificates are also available.

On March 10, Marilyn Denis of Citytv's CityLine will visit Bean-Sole, who "helped me lose 25 pounds", notes Denis on Citytv's website.

The product of a sports-minded family (her brother is renowned sports broadcast journalist Elliotte Friedman), Bean-Sole is surrounded by dedicated staff members who share her zest for healthy living. Her very first employee and present assistant, Randi Mendelsohn, is now her training partner; both ran the 2003 Toronto Marathon together and plan to run again this fall.

"It's not a diet, it's a lifestyle"

Scores of satisfied customers have provided ample gratification for her efforts: "I get such a kick out of helping others lose weight," she beams.

It's not a diet, it's a lifestyle; a marriage of health, fitness, and good old-fashioned common sense. "Marathons aren't for everyone, but good health is," says Bean-Sole. "If you're willing to take the first small step, the rewards are incredible."

And forever.

How comfortable are Naots? A footprint in the sand ...

In a healthy body, every part counts — none more so than your oft-neglected feet, which bear the weight of your entire body as you move through the day. Happy, comfortable feet are one of the keys to overall well-being.

Since 1990 Solemates has graced Canadian feet with exquisitely fashionable, ruggedly-constructed, hand-sewn NAOT sandals, shoes and boots — all made with pride on Kibbutz Naot Mordechai in Israel. At Solemates' flagship Prairie Dog store on Eglinton Avenue West and at other fine footwear retailers across Canada, the Naot line has soared in popularity to the point where it is now synonymous with foot comfort and fashion.

New in-house fitness centre deals with entire body

As a natural extension of the ever-growing interest in a healthy lifestyle "from the ground up", as of March 26 the newly expanded Prairie Dog will house FitSpirit, a fitness centre equipped with free weights and exercise machines. Personal training will be offered in a variety of exercise techniques, including osteoporosis prevention and therapy through general body and back strengthening. The centre will be run by Corinne's daughter Natasha, a kinesiologist, and will have other professionals on staff.

During opening week (March 26–April 2), visitors will receive a gift with purchase.

Quality and styling. Naots are rugged and long-wearing, with multi-layered cork and latex insoles and durable Eva rubber soles. The selection of styles, colours and patterns has grown each year, and now includes literally dozens of attractive designs for both men and women. The Flexy line of sandals, shoes and clogs for men and women will redefine your footwear shopping experience.

A perfect match of form and function, Naot footwear is designed on the principle of a "footprint in the sand". For proper support and weight distribution, the sole molds itself to your foot in much the same way sand does when you stand barefoot on a warm summer beach.

Naots' removable cork footbed allows you to insert orthotics, but for many people, the footbed itself is adequate support. Moreover, you can replace the footbed without replacing the shoe, further extending the life of what is already an enduring product.

Leaving no element of foot comfort overlooked, Naot has a brand new offering that's both funky and functional: socks with dedicated left and right feet! Reinforced heels and soles give metatarsal and arch support, and foot-friendly fibres wick away moisture.

Naot shoes and sandals are pure heaven for walking on any terrain; on the beach or off, you'll feel your footprint in the sand.

Solemates and Naot have grown by creating products that earn long-term customer loyalty, of a kind that goes far beyond traditional brand loyalty. MADE IN ISRAEL, always symbolic of quality and cleverness, now means hip as well, and resonates with people everywhere who revere and respect the "little country that could."

Medical exchange launched at Toronto, Israeli hospitals

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Sunnybrook & Women's College Health Sciences Centre has established a medical exchange program with Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital to expand knowledge of spinal surgery and trauma.

The program, launched several months ago, is expected to sharpen the skills of Israeli physicians who treat victims of terrorism.

"The project was created to advance scientific and clinical understanding in the field of orthopedic trauma between our two centres," said Dr. Joel Finkelstein, a Sunnybrook spinal surgeon who helped to set up the exchange.

"Both centres are leaders in their fields and have unique areas of expertise," added Finkelstein, who teaches spinal surgery and orthopedic trauma surgery at the University of Toronto.

"The advancement in clinical practice requires the exchange of ideas and dialogue between partners."

The idea for the program came from Sari Cohen, an Israeli operating room nurse from Tel Aviv's Wolfson Hospital. She has worked at Sunnybrook for the past few years and plans to return to Israel in August.

The program officially got under way in December when Finkelstein, a member of the Canadian Orthopedic Association, led a delegation of Sunnybrook orthopedic surgeons, one nurse and a bio-mechanical engineer to Israel.

The trip was financed by Hadassah-WIZO.

They met the chief of Hadassah's orthopedic department, Dr. Iri Liebergall, and gave talks on their respective areas of expertise and research.

The delegation also visited the Israeli Orthopedic Association in Tel Aviv.

In addition, the Canadians learned about how Israeli doctors deal with terrorist attacks and "manage" mass casualties.

"They [Israeli doctors] are very advanced in spine surgery and trauma," Finkelstein said. "They are world leaders in computer-assisted surgery."

Apart from Dr. Finkelstein, the delegation consisted of Marvin Tile, Hans Kreder, Geg Berry, Michael Ford, Hamilton Hall and Sandie Roth.

As a result of the visit, an Israeli doctor from Hadassah, Amal Khoury, is currently working at Sunnybrook.

In May, Liebergall will become a visiting professor at Sunnybrook, and in July, another Israeli physician, Yigal Bronstein, will start working there.

Finkelstein hopes to send a second group of orthopedic surgeons to Israel next year.

Looking ahead, he said that "there is now interest in our hospital to expand the program to craniofacial surgery and cardiac surgery."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Is it true that taking vitamins gives you more energy?
A. No. Many people will claim this and it may be a placebo effect – doing something perceived to be healthy makes you feel healthier – but vitamins are not proven to give you increased energy.
Q. I really need help with after-school snacks. I have four kids ranging in age from four to 13 and they all come home from school and raid the kitchen, I need some healthy, kid-friendly suggestions.
A. Okay here are some of my favourites. Stock your cupboards with these and I think everyone will be happy and healthy. Try hummus and whole grain crackers (make sure they don't contain hydrogenated fats), baked nachos and salsa or refried bean dip (it's not really fried), vegetable or tomato soup, or yogurt fruit smoothies. Make pizza bagels on whole wheat English muffins and pile on the veggies; peanut or almond butter sandwiches on whole wheat bread; homemade bran, oatmeal or carrot muffins; yogurt; raw veggies and yogurt dip; fruit salad served over frozen yogurt; cereal with milk (not a sugar cereal); nuts (almonds, walnuts or hazelnuts are best) – mix them with a few raisins or chocolate chips; baked apples; apple sauce; milk or chocolate milk; or even scrambled eggs. These should get you started and fill up your hungry crowd.
Q. I am trying to reduce the junk that my three teenage children eat, but they say they don't like the taste of healthier choices, what should I do?
A. Don't give up, this will take time. One of the big problems that we have is when we feed our children a diet full of "kiddy foods" or fast food, junk foods and highly processed foods, they become very used to eating foods that are highly sweetened, salted or high in fat. Then healthier foods taste bland and undesirable by comparison. Keep trying. It's a fight worth fighting. Stock the house with healthy foods and let them shop with you.
Q. I am lactose intolerant and I know the obvious places to find lactose – in all dairy products – but I wonder if there are hidden sources?
A. There are indeed many unlikely places where lactose can be found. Lactose is a sugar, which, when it is removed from dairy foods, can be used to flavour many non-dairy items such as breaded foods, hot dogs, flavoured potato chips and snack foods. It can also be found in vitamins and medications. Read the labels and look for lactose. When buying vitamins or medications, ask the pharmacist for the ingredient listing, as it will not appear on the label. Just to let you know as well: not all dairy products contain lactose.

DVD a worthy addition to Holocaust film genre

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

I must have seen hundreds of Holocaust films over the years. I've seen films about the victims and about the rescuers. I've seen documentaries and fiction films. I've seen films made for television and TV miniseries. I've seen films that are only a few minutes long and films that are 9½ hours long. There seems to be no end in sight to Holocaust stories as survivors try to leave some kind of record behind before their time runs out.

Earlier this week, Steven Spielberg's landmark film, Schindler's List, was finally released on DVD. Spielberg and the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation, founded as a result of Spielberg's experiences in making Schindler's List, have also released the companion piece Broken Silence, a DVD of immense influence and power.

Broken Silence provides unique emotional moments

Broken Silence is a collection of five films, each one just a little less than an hour in length. Spielberg initiated this project by approaching five directors from five different countries and commissioning each of them to create a documentary about the Holocaust.

Even to someone who has been deluged with Holocaust films, this DVD provides some unique emotional moments.

Most of the films use testimonies from survivors that were recorded by the Shoah Foundation, intercut with photographs and archival footage.

Argentine filmmaker Luis Puenzo (The Official Story) directed Some Who Lived, a Spanish language film that includes the stories of survivors living in Argentina and Uruguay. Toward the film's conclusion, Puenzo looks at the connection between Nazis and Argentine fascists, and also brings the bombings of the Israeli embassy and the Argentine Jewish Federation building into the mix.

Hungarian director, Janos Szasz, the child of two Holocaust survivors, focuses on child survivors in the film Eyes of the Holocaust.

Well-known Polish director Andrzej Wajda made a film called I Remember, which deals with four survivors who were either helped or betrayed by their Polish neighbours.

One of these survivors was a member of the Sonderkommandos, while another smuggled food into the Warsaw ghetto. Wajda's film was produced in black and white, without narration and without archival film clips.

Instead, Wajda incorporated original footage of The March of the Living into the film as his symbol of hope and improved dialogue between young Jews, Poles and Germans.

According to Wajda, the film focuses on the dramatic and specific relations between Jews and Poles in Nazi-occupied Poland.

Hell On Earth is a Czech language film directed by Vojtech Jasny that looks at Theresienstadt, the model ghetto set up by the Nazis to deceive the world about how the Jews were being treated.

To my mind, the most moving film on the Broken Silence DVD is Children From The Ashes, by Russian director Pavel Chukhraj (The Thief). It tells the stories of a number of survivors who were children or teenagers during the war. It includes some film clips I have never seen before and gives graphic detail of the mass killings at Babi Yar. The DVD is worth watching and buying just for this film alone.

It is a bit strange that Broken Silence received very little publicity before its release. As a result, it may not be available in as many stores as Schindler's List.

Broken Silence is being released by Universal Studios Home Video, the same studio that released Schindler's List, and can be purchased by any video store that wishes to do so. If your store doesn't carry it, ask the manager to order it or you can order it online from www.amazon.ca, www.amazon.com or www.facet.org.

ROM exhibit spans 30 centuries of Egyptian art

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Golden mummy masks, coffins, sculptures, reliefs, papyri and jewelry all form a part of "Eternal Egypt," the exhibition of 144 exceptional ancient Egyptian artifacts from the British Museum that opened at the Royal Ontario Museum on Feb. 28.

The pieces are arranged in chronological order in six main sections, each focusing on a specific historical period. Spanning 30 centuries and as many dynasties, they offer "a vivid panorama of the entire history of Egyptian art," according to senior ROM Egyptologist Krzysztof Grzymski, who co-curated the exhibition.

The earliest item on view is a tiny ivory statuette of a first-dynasty king dating back 5,000 years to about 3,000 BCE. The white-crowned figure is one of the earliest known representations of an Egyptian pharoah and shows the characteristic attributes of divine kingship.

One of the latest items on display is a painted "Panel Portrait of a Woman," rendered during the Roman period (about 165 CE). Timewise, she's much closer to us than to first-dynasty Egypt, and the portrait seems to reflect more traditional European artistic sensibilities.

Several items in the collection are only partially finished and reveal the artists' raw sketches and grids that are usually hidden. These abandoned pieces offer a fascinating glimpse into the artistic processes prevalent in Egyptian ateliers in olden days.

It's hard to fathom the journey in both time and psychological space that these impressive relics have undergone. Created amid the splendour of a magnificent civilization by the Nile, they reflect the Egyptian belief in polytheism, a national reliance upon a godlike Pharoah and a deep cultural obsession with death.

When the supposedly "eternal" Egyptian civilization finally collapsed, many of these objects remained sleeping in dark and dusty tombs for millennia, only to be unearthed and carted away by British archeologists in the relatively modern post-Napoleonic era. From the British Museum, it was only a short hop across the pond for the present North American tour, of which Toronto is the first Canadian stop. The items are also slated to be shown in Victoria and Montreal.

As we stroll through the various chambers of this well laid-out exhibition, we are challenged at every turn to put these magnificent relics into historical and cultural context.

The "hauntingly sombre" stone face of Sesostris III is said to reflect the heavy burden borne by the pharoahs. The pink granite Lion of Amenhotep III reclines in a curiously relaxed and "un-Egyptian" pose, apparently not minding that it no longer guards Gebel Barkal, an 18th-dynasty palace in Upper Nubia – or the entrance to the British Museum's vast Egyptology department.

An elegant alabaster "Royal Woman" dates back to the Old Kingdom, but doesn't look a day older than 22nd dynasty. Likewise, we admire a variety of lithe and stylish human statuettes that might have been given form only yesterday.

Sometime during its middle kingdom, Egypt relied upon the slave labour of the Jews, but few (if, arguably, any) allusions to this central formative Jewish experience have ever been found in Egyptian art. Certainly there's no trace of a Hebrew slave in the present show.

However, some of the colourful papyri from the Book of the Dead seem to prefigure Jewish beliefs about humanity's accountability before God and the entrance requirements for the world to come.

Observing the sun rise and set each day, the Egyptians deduced that it travelled through a dark underworld by night and that each human soul follows a metaphorically parallel path after death. Filled with magical spells, the Book of the Dead was placed in tombs as a kind of guide book to help the deceased navigate the perilous underworld and reach the place of rebirth.

The Egyptians believed that the human soul resides in the heart and that the god Osiris judges all souls for admittance into the afterlife. Fascinatingly, a panel from the Book of the Dead shows a group of deities watching as a human heart is weighed on a scale against a feather. If the heart proves heavier than a feather, no afterlife is possible and the organ will be consumed by the mythical monster Anubis.

"Eternal Egypt: Masterworks of Ancient Art from The British Museum" offers a wonderful opportunity to contemplate both the enormity of human civilization and the smallness of one's own existence.

The exhibition continues at the Royal Ontario Museum until June 6. Admittance is free with regular museum admission.

JERUSALEM POST EDITOR MAKES WHIRLWIND VISIT TO TORONTO

The 30-year-old editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Post, spent four days in Toronto last week briefing various community groups as a guest of the UJA Federation. Bret Stephens spoke to students at the U of T's new Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, as well as to top UJA donors, the editorial board of the National Post, and various other groups.

An American who grew up in Mexico City, Stephens was a former Wall Street Journal reporter who covered the Middle East with a series of brilliant, cogent articles underlining Israel's differential treatment in the world media that sometimes crosses into anti-Semitism.

Venturing far from the media's beaten track, he also exposed the Palestinian "dream" as a full-fledged "nightmare" replete with lies, corruption and ill-disguised support of terrorist activities.

At the Wolfond Centre, Stephens gave a rousing and sparklingly lucent hour-long talk without notes, exhorting his student audience on the necessity of defending Israel and the Jewish people against the many calumnies and canards in circulation. Even if one disagrees with most actions of the Ariel Sharon government, it's still essential to speak out when Israel's right to exist is disputed, he said. "No one ever questions Italy's right to exist," he observed.

After hearing Stephens speak, you can easily understand why the Post's top brass were so keen to hire him despite his admission that he was then only 28 years old. "Don't worry, you'll outgrow it," he was told. He is the youngest editor in the paper's 70-year history.

Names in the News: Four Sons, written by Michael Albert and directed by Rachel McManus, is one of three plays featured in Tarragon Theatre's Paprika Festival for artists under 21. The play deals with the legendary four sons of Passover who supposedly sort out their differences in the washroom during a seder break! (March 18 to 28, 416-531-1827)... Courting May West, a new play about Hollywood sex icon Mae West, was given a first reading last month in a New York City theatre that was formerly a courthouse in which West was charged with obscenity in 1927. As playwright Linda Ann Loschiavo reveals, West was the daughter of a German-Jewish mother and an Anglo-Irish father.

Movie charts friendship between a Muslim and Jew

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Muslim-Jewish relations are at a low ebb today, particularly in France, but in Francois Dupeyron's feel-good movie, Monsieur Ibrahim, there is no trace of such friction.

The French film, which opens in Toronto and Vancouver on March 12, is about an elderly Muslim grocer who befriends a lonely Jewish teenager.

Monsieur Ibrahim, set in 1960s Paris, steps away from the divisive politics of the Arab-Israeli conflict and concentrates on an unusual human relationship.

Moses Schmitt, known as Momo, lives with his depressed father in a grimy flat in Pigalle, a working-class district frequented by prostitutes.

During his school break, Momo (Pierre Boulanger) empties his piggy bank, approaches a friendly prostitute (Anne Suarez) and loses his virginity.

This erotic encounter dissolves into a scene in which Momo walks into Ibrahim's small shop, filled to the brim with shelves of French and Middle Eastern delicacies.

Momo is not above stealing from Ibrahim (Omar Sharif), a Turkish Sufi. But Ibrahim, a strong, silent type, chooses to overlook Momo's transgressions.

When Momo's father (Gilbert Melki) finds himself unemployed, he deserts his son, effectively leaving him adrift as an orphan.

Momo gravitates toward Myriam (Isabelle Renauld), a girl next door, and they engage in puppy love. But these scenes are of minor importance compared to those with Ibrahim.

As Momo gets to know Ibrahim better, they form what seems like an inseparable bond. At Ibrahim's suggestion, Momo borrows a copy of his Qu'ran to read. An impressionable boy, Momo is disconnected from his Jewish roots.

Is the film subliminally suggesting that Ibrahim wants to convert Momo? Your guess is as good as mine.

Monsieur Ibrahim transforms itself into something of a classic road picture when the kindly grocer invites Momo to accompany him to his ancestral village in the parched highlands of Turkey.

They set off in a flashy red sports car. On the way, they visit a Catholic church and a mosque and watch the frenzied dance of dervishes.

The gentle aura of the film is abruptly shattered by a tragedy whose impact has a profound effect on Momo.

Emotions ring true thanks to Sharif's far-reaching range and Boulanger's understated performance.

They anchor Monsieur Ibrahim in a foundation of unrelieved reality and fanciful illusion.

Falling in love with the harp

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Erica Goodman, a Toronto harpist who is recognized as one of the world's best, fell in love with the harp at a Toronto Symphony Orchestra rehearsal.

Goodman's late father, Hyman, TSO concertmaster from 1948 to 1967, took her to the orchestra rehearsal in 1952, when she was four years old. After seeing the harp there, "it was my extreme desire to play it," Goodman remembers.

By that time, her parents had already seen a sign of her extraordinary musical talent. She'd played melodies on the piano by ear before she could talk.

Piano is the basis of all musical endeavour, Goodman says, so she and her parents agreed that she would get a harp after she finished Grade 8 piano. By the age of eight, she had fulfilled her side of the bargain.

But the harp is not the most practical of instruments. Goodman's mother, Maisie, a businesswoman and the sensible one in the family, Goodman says, wasn't particularly in favour of her playing it.

Besides being expensive – at today's prices, one can run anywhere from $20,000 to $40,000 – a harp costs a bundle to maintain and it's not easy to transport it anywhere.

"You can't put it in your pocket like a flute," Goodman says.

Canadian composer Louis Applebaum suggested to Goodman's parents they send their daughter to a music camp in Michigan – now known as the Interlochen Arts Camp – where she could try out the instrument.

"I loved it," Goodman says.

She got her harp when she was 10, and studied with Judy Loman, an internationally renowned principal harpist with the TSO.

"I was lucky to come from a very musical household where my parents were most sympathetic to my musical endeavours," Goodman says.

She played professionally, in Toronto and with the TSO, while she was in high school – she's still associated with the TSO – and made her New York debut as a soloist with the National Arts Orchestra at Lincoln Centre in 1972.

Goodman went on to perform on stages worldwide to critical acclaim, as well as to play on film and television soundtracks and to make a dozen well-received recordings. In 1995, she won a Juno Award for a solo recording, Erica Goodman Plays Canadian Harp Music.

A champion of contemporary music and composers, Goodman has been playing with New Music Concerts since 1970.

"That's how I was introduced to world-famous composers and up-and-comers from Canada," she says.

She has recorded the works of such composers as Milton Barnes, Srul Irving Glick and Marjan Mozetich.

"The harp lends itself very well to today's composers," she says.

Her latest recording is the 2003 release Lyra Hebraic, made with the group Trio Lyra. Trio Lyra includes Suzanne Shulman on flute and Mark Childs on viola. Later this year, another Trio Lyra CD, Mozart to Mosevitch, will be released, as well as another Goodman solo recording, Angel Harp.

Not exclusively a classical musician, Goodman has performed on stages with Moe Koffman, Guido Basso, Henry Mancini and Tony Bennett.

On request, she says, "[Bennett] would sing 'I Left My Heart in San Francisco' for the two millionth time as if it was his first time."

Currently, she's in the orchestra of the musical The Producers, at the Canon Theatre.

Goodman is participating in a harp extravaganza at the Mississauga Living Arts Centre on May 2. For more information, visit the website www.chambermusicmississauga.org.

For more information about Goodman, visit www.ericagoodman.tripod.com.

Book chronicles Jews' contribution to world

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

If you thought Alexander Graham Bell, who is variously claimed by Scots, Americans and Canadians as one of their own, invented the telephone, you're wrong, says author Joe King.

King credits a little-known German Jew as the telephone's inventor in his new book The Jewish Contribution to the Modern World: The Story of the Extraordinary Post-Emancipation Jewish Participation in the Shaping of 20th and 21st Century Civilization.

King provides ample evidence, in an accessible format, that Jews have played a disproportionate role in society in advancing knowledge and making the world a better place.

The book consists of short profiles and photos of about 350 Jews who have made outstanding contributions in a wide range of fields. They include Nobel laureates and many others who are household names.

But King also includes people who have been overlooked despite having made an impact on our lives today.

Johann Philip Reis (1834-1874) is one such example. This German schoolmaster's telephone, though it was crudely made – sausage skin was one of the components – was introduced to the public in 1861, 15 years before Bell unveiled his first phone.

"There is no question that Reis's concept formed the basis for… Bell's telephone design," King argues.

King acknowledges that Bell's apparatus was a great improvement over Reis's, but says another German Jew, Emile Berliner, really refined the telephone.

Berliner (1851-1929) invented the microphone and, after emigrating to Montreal, invented the gramophone. Bell Telephone bought Berliner's microphone and transformer, making communication much easier.

Other Jewish inventors listed include: Al Gross (walkie-talkie), Robert Adler (television remote control), Laszlo Biro (ball-point pen), Sylvan Goldman (shopping cart) and Morris Michtom (teddy bear).

Of course, much of the book deals with major figures in science and medicine. An entire chapter is devoted to Jews in atomic research. Here, too, though their names are unfamiliar, their accomplishments were huge.

Among them are Leo Szilard (1898-1964), who conceived the nuclear chain reaction; Hans Albrecht Bethe (b. 1906), who discovered how the sun and other stars burn by nuclear fission; Murray Gellman (b. 1929), who identified the quark, an elementary particle; Paul Ehrlich (1854-1915), "the father" of chemotherapy; Leo Graetz (1856-1941), who pioneered the study of electrical waves; and Rosalind Franklin (1920-1958), who some believe should have shared the Nobel Prize for the 1953 discovery of the structure of DNA.

Joe King, left, author of the The Jewish Contribution to the Modern World, with the book's grand patrons, Lawrence Bessner, seated, and Hy Adelman.

Other chapters cover scholarship, the law, the military, literature, the media, business, social activism, arts, music and entertainment.

If there is a quibble about this otherwise enjoyable and enlightening book, it is the inclusion of so many figures from popular culture. As talented as they may be, do actors such as Henry Winkler, Fran Drescher and William Shatner, or comedians such as Buddy Hackett or Wayne and Shuster, really belong in the same book as Albert Einstein, Sigmund Freud and Martin Buber?

King also takes liberties with Jewish ancestry, including, for example, British prime minister Benjamin Disraeli, who converted to Christianity at 13, and poet and wit Dorothy Parker, whose mother was not Jewish.

The inclusion of Parker is curious given that McGill University sociology professor Morton Weinfeld, whose expertise is North American Jewry, writes in the first line of the book's introduction that Parker was "no great lover of Jews."

Weinfeld goes on to send a clear message to anti-Semites: "Those who attack Jews, whether in the Diaspora or in Israel, risk impoverishing the world."

In his preface, King theorizes that once Jews were emancipated from the ghetto and had a taste of freedom, they quickly made their mark. He said he struggled to narrow down his list to 350 Jews out of the thousands more he could have chosen.

Among the few Canadians who made the cut are: Harry Halton, who designed the Canadair business jet; media baron Mortimer Zuckerman; distiller Samuel Bronfman; actor Lorne Greene; writer Mordecai Richler; and Morris "Two Gun" Cohen, commander of a Chinese army division that fought the Japanese invaders in the late 1930s.

The youngest personalities included were born in the mid-1950s, and most are entertainers (Jerry Seinfeld, Fran Drescher, Nathan Lane). The others are astronaut John Grunsfield and computer scientist Jaron Lanier, the youngest of all, having been born in 1960, who coined the term "virtual reality."

The Jewish Contribution to the Modern World is a publication of the Canadian Friends of Haifa University, in collaboration with the Montreal Jewish Publication Society.

Caring for the needs of aging survivors

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Respect, sensitivity and a concern for maintaining dignity are the watchwords of those dealing with the increasing number of aging Holocaust survivors coming into care, says Paula David, senior social worker and co-ordinator of the Holocaust Resource Project at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

To respond to the situation, she and a research assistant, Sandi Pelly, edited Caring for Aging Holocaust Survivors: a practice manual, which was published by Baycrest in late 2003.

The 252-page, soft-covered book gives a wealth of information about the particular needs of this group, who now comprise about half the residents in the various facilities of Baycrest. It is designed for caregivers, families and people in the general community.

Each chapter is written by a specialist in a particular subject, including social workers, occupational therapists, physicians, nurses, dentists, nutritionists and rabbis.

The book begins with a historical overview of the Holocaust and a chapter on the immigrant experience of the survivor by Harold Troper, professor of theory and policy studies at the University of Toronto and co-author of None is too Many.

Interspersed with the text are personal stories compiled by the editors, as well as poems written collectively by the Terrace Holocaust survivors group.

The intention is to educate both those who are already knowledgeable about the special considerations the survivors need because of what they went through, and those who are working with them for the first time.

"It is incumbent on us to learn and to learn quickly," David said. Because the children and the old were the least likely to have survived the war, the ones who did were, by and large, young adults who are all aging at the same time.

"We have to make the staff aware of their needs, such as why it may be harder for them to deal with the infirmities of aging and the inevitable losses." This is much harder to deal with when one has already lost so many loved ones, David said.

Originally, she said, decisions were made to not treat Holocaust survivors any differently from those who didn't go through the Holocaust. "Now we realize that we have to."

At the same time, she said, we have to recognize that each survivor is different. For instance, for some, taking a shower may be a horrific experience, conjuring up memories of gas chambers. For others, a shower may be a great way to get clean.

Some may want to show the numbers tattooed on their arms, others hide it. Some are glad to talk about their experiences, others prefer not to.

When a therapy dog was brought to one of the floors, a cognitively impaired resident, a survivor of the camps, was kept in her room to prevent her from being upset. But when she heard the dog, she ran out to it, bent down and hugged it, crying that she used to have a dog just like that one before the war.

"It was the first time she had talked in a long time," David remembered.

Even giving medical care can be difficult, she said. Citing medical experimentation by such sadists as Josef Mengele, she said that "the health care system betrayed them. We have to develop their trust again."

Staff has to be trained and knowledgeable about what the survivors have dealt with – not just the concentration camp experiences, but the loss of everything they had before.

"We have to teach [staff] that before the war, they had lives – some were rich and became poor, they spoke different languages, they were from different social classes. Then they had to come to a different country, most with very little, and had to learn new ways and new languages."

Many of the staff at Baycrest are immigrants themselves and can relate to that, David said. What is different is that they have a place and people they can go back to if they want. Holocaust survivors don't have that. "Everything was taken from them. There is no going back."

People assume that working with this population must be depressing, David said, but she doesn't find it so. "You are surrounded by people who are so incredibly resilient. No one thought people could cope after what they went through. They showed that they could."

David said survivors of the European Holocaust have something to offer to victims of more recent genocides, such as those from Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia. They can share their experiences of building new lives on the ashes of the old, of starting new families and dealing with the same traumatic memories. "We thought that it [genocide] could never happen again. But it did."

They also share ways of coping, not just for themselves, but also for their children. "They know that it is important to talk about it, to find ways to memorialize what happened."

Caring for Aging Holocaust Survivors is available at the Baycrest gift shop, by calling the department of social work at 416-785-2500, ext. 2853, or online at www.baycrest.org.

Clinical psychologist helps teams evaluate talent

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

In the early 1980s, Gordon Gund was in big-time trouble as owner of the NHL's Minnesota North Stars and the NBA's Cleveland Cavaliers.

Out of desperation, he turned to his friend Herb Greenberg for help in turning around two teams that were the jokes of their respective leagues.

It took several years, but the clinical psychologist, through his consulting firm Caliper International, was able to assist Gund in better evaluating the personality traits of prospective athletes for both franchises.

The work Greenberg did with Gund marked his introduction to the sports business. Today, among the company's clients are 23 professional sports teams, including the Toronto Raptors, and eight U.S. colleges.

Blind since a form of tuberculosis took his sight at age 10, the 74-year-old consultant says he probably benefits by not being able to see athletes in action. It certainly hasn't hindered his work over the past 20 years in the sports industry.

Caliper performs about 100,000 personality tests a year, working with 28,000 companies in 13 countries and in 17 different languages. It grossed about $25 million (all figures US) last year.

"It's very successful," said Greenberg, who founded the Princeton, N.J., consulting firm in 1961. "[The test] is designed so you can't claim all virtues and deny all faults. It works so well because it's a very complex level of analysis."

The Caliper test, which costs $265, is a three- or four-page quiz with as many as 160 questions.

A sample question could be: Identify what is most like you and what is least like you: I am a good leader; I am a responsible person; I am emotionally stable; I get along well with people.

Test results, which are based on the overall pattern of a person's responses, help teams determine a prospect's competitiveness, self-esteem and self-discipline going into their draft.

It all got started when a colleague at Rutgers University asked Greenberg what he knew about psychological testing. Apparently, a large life insurance company was losing 60 per cent of its agents each year and wanted him to find a test that would do a better job predicting whether or not prospective agents could sell.

Greenberg and his colleague spent three months looking at existing tests and found nothing that fit the bill. Research done over the next four years helped them to develop the test. They founded a company, Personality Dynamics, but in 1985 changed the name to Caliper, which is a precise measuring instrument.

Greenberg, who grew up in Brooklyn, once considered a different career.

"I thought of going to law school, and a congressman, who was a very dear friend of the family, urged me to change my name to Green," he recalls."He said I would have had a lot of difficulty getting into a good law school with the name Greenberg.

"I would never do that because I'm Jewish. If that bothers somebody, too bad."

In good health and taking lots of vitamins, Greenberg has no plans to call it quits any time soon.

"I'm having fun and enjoying myself," he says.

Two for Bridge

By ERIC KOKISH
and BEVERLY KRAFT

"Come look at this, Sarah, it's the new Bridge column."

That's the way we hope it will go when someone in your family picks up this issue of The CJN and comes across our feature. Alternatively, we hear that this page makes a nice coaster.

Don't let the names in the byline fool you. We're married up. There was a time when we played Bridge together. It's been years, though. Which may explain why we're still married. Another reason that we have endured lo these 24 years is that we tend to finish each other's sentences, no matter how arcane. Keeps us amused.

But this is a Bridge column, not Dear Abby. Are these survival credentials enough to justify a monthly visit to your breakfast table with a sliver of life from the Bridge table? Surely some prowess at the game is essential too.

Well, we'll see how you feel about our qualifications after considering Exhibit A below.

1984: The Epson World Inter-city Teams Championship in Tokyo. We were the defending champions in part because we had been immaculate at avoiding grand slams with the ace of trumps offside. Our team-mates "loved" us for this one. We did not win the tournament.

Beverly: "If I were interested in seven I would not have jumped to six."

Eric: "My hand was unlimited, so your jump had to be descriptive. What you were supposed to have was six strong hearts and the ace of clubs, all your values in the suits you bid. You should have continued with 5♠, then 5♣ over my 5♦ continuation. Given your retreat to 4♥ over 4♦, I would have known that you couldn't have everything I needed for a good grand slam."

Beverly: "Maybe you're right, but you weren't playing with you; I'm a simple soul who bids what she thinks she can make."

If you consider bidding a grand slam missing the ace of trumps to be the ultimate indignity, we believe that you might wish to reconsider after hearing what befell two of our teammates in the same event.

Sami Kehela and the late Peter Nagy, two of the greatest players to represent Canada at the world level, had little experience as partners when they joined us in Japan. Nonetheless, their skill and fine judgement made them an effective unit, and their aura of invincibility stood them in good stead. Besides, they were our lucky partnership. But, how lucky were they?

After Sami opened 1♥, he and Peter reached the excellent contract of 7♦ despite some vigorous competition in spades by the opponents. Trusting the Canadians implicitly, the opponents sacrificed in 7♠ at favourable vulnerability. Peter, next to speak, was void in spades and had seen Sami bid a grand slam without knowing about the void. Surely Sami would have the ace of spades. If that were the case Peter thought his side might be able to make 7NT, with solid hearts and diamonds and the ace of clubs. Peter found the master bid by passing, letting Sami know that he was thinking about 7NT.

Pan now to the proud Kehela, a player who prides himself on avoiding technical error and major disaster. Sami was also void in spades. He "knew," therefore that Peter had to have the ace of spades for his forcing pass of 7♠. And so it was that Canada's finest fetched up in 7NT with no spades in either hand. One of the great moments in sport was at hand.

7NT was doubled with glee by the opponent holding the ace-king of spades. Alas, he was not on lead. Alack, his partner thought that the double was the famous Lightner variety, asking for an unusual lead. Accordingly he led a heart and Sami spread his hand, taking all thirteen tricks in the other three suits to make 7NT doubled. We are pleased to report that neither of our guys had the chutzpah to redouble.

It's a fine line between bridge at the top and bridge at the bottom. We've been through stretches at both ends of the spectrum, but it's never been dull. There are rumblings in our household that it might be nice for us to play together again. Mutual interest, wholesome entertainment, mind sharpener. You've heard it all before, we're sure. But if we can stifle the apprehension, survive the occasional raised eyebrow in disappointment, commit to keeping the vagaries of the game outside the confines of our version of domestic bliss, hey, it might just keep us young and stoke our creative fires. Or not.

We're going to share some of our experiences with you and keep you up to date with what's going on in the wonderful wacky world of bridge. We'll show you some beautiful deals and (less often) some ugly ones, and introduce you to many characters and personalities whose exploits you might enjoy.

Although the early evidence might suggest that you will usually get two different perspectives from us, it's really not that way at all. For example, we both love the game of Bridge. We both love our children, our grandchildren and our dogs. We both hate celery.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman

When asked what law is most important in the baking of matzah, Rav Yisroel Salanter the 19th-century founder of the Mussar (ethical refinement) movement, responded that the employees of matzah factories be treated properly. While we often think of religiosity in terms of ritual, the truly religious Jew is focused even more on his behaviour towards humankind. Therefore, the first law codified in the Shulchan Aruch on Pesach is the obligation to give maot chittin (tzedakah) to the poor before this most expensive of holidays. Only then does eating matzah have significance.

In our meritorious desire to carefully observe the many obligations of Pesach, we often lose sight that Pesach is a Yom Tov meant to be enjoyed as we celebrate the formation of the Jewish nation and the blessings of freedom. It thus appears to me that the excessive cleaning that many do for Pesach may actually be counter-productive, especially if it takes away from the joy of Pesach and makes wives and their helping husbands dread the arrival of the holiday. This misplaced focus is all too common. We must ensure there is a proper balance between meticulous observance of ritual and the even-more-important concern for the economic well-being of the Jewish people.

Thus, in an effort to control price gouging, the Talmudic sage Shmuel ordered merchants not to raise their prices after Pesach, lest he change the accepted law and permit chametz she'avar alav haPesach (chametz owned by a Jew during Pesach), something which under normal circumstances is strictly prohibited. Without such a ruling, the average income earner would have willingly, but in the end unnecessarily, spent excessive funds maintaining kashrut standards at the cost of economic standards of freedom.

It is inappropriate to adopt stringencies that place undue financial strain on family budgets, stringencies that are widespread during the Passover season. Throughout the generations, our rabbinic leaders forbade the purchase of items whose prices were excessive, including such basic necessities as fish, even for those to whom price was not an issue. It is not by chance that we start the Seder with the words "let all who are hungry come and eat." Chag Kasher V'Samayach.

Biggest wave of hatred toward Jews since Holocaust: Sharansky

Quebec premier opens international conference on anti-Semitism, Israeli minister addresses gathering

By JANICE ARNOLD and DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporters

Natan Sharansky

Premier Jean Charest

MONTREAL — Natan Sharansky says European and other western countries are wrong if they think the current wave of anti-Semitism is due to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and will vanish when it is resolved.

Israel's minister for Jerusalem and Diaspora affairs denied his country is "trying to stop legitimate criticism" by calling it anti-Semitism, as he said some diplomats have suggested to him when he shows them evidence of such sentiment in their countries.

Sharansky made the comments in his keynote address Sunday evening at the three-day International Conference on the Global Dimensions of Contemporary Anti-Semitism, organized by the Quebec-Israel Committee with the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research.

About 1,800 people attended his public lecture, held at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim under tight security. Everyone was searched with a metal detector before being allowed to enter the building.

Quebec Premier Jean Charest launched the conference in an earlier speech to an invitation-only dinner audience of 300, including Sharansky, at the Gelber Conference Centre. Charest said current provincial legislation to protect human rights and stamp out racism and discrimination is "just the starting point" for future policy.

Existing law such as the Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms, passed in 1975, shows that the province was "at the forefront of modern western societies," he said.

"Many European countries have only recently begun to officially recognize cultural diversity, and have used the Quebec model of a pluralistic society to guide their actions."

Speaking earlier to reporters at the Gelber Centre, Sharansky stressed that while criticism of Israel is not necessarily anti-Semitic, the world is experiencing "the biggest wave of hatred towards Jews" since the Holocaust. "Every day [Israel is] compared to the Nazi state, Palestinian refugee camps to Auschwitz."

CANADA

Archeologist on Tour

TORONTO — Israeli archeologist Dan Bahat, an expert in the history of Jerusalem and tunnel excavations at the Western Wall, gave a lecture titled "In Search of the Ark of the Covenant and Jerusalem at the Time of Jesus" to hundreds of Christian pastors and clergy in five Western Canadian cities this week. His talks in Edmonton, Calgary, Victoria, Kelowna, B.C., and Surrey, B.C., were sponsored by the Israel Government Tourist Office-Canada (IGTO). The aim was "to keep fresh in the minds of Canadian Christians the desirability of Israel as a major world destination," said IGTO director Dani Shahal.

Foundation Hits $160M

MONTREAL — The Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal recently reported it has reached $160 million in assets. Established in 1971 as the Jewish community's permanent capital fund, the JCFM designates annual income according to donors' wishes in Montreal and abroad. A similar foundation in Toronto has about $120 million in assets.

Eggleton Heads Group

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel Interparliamentary Group (formerly the Canada-Israel Friendship Group), a group of pro-Israel senators and MPs, has elected Toronto Liberal MP Art Eggleton as its new chair. He replaces another Toronto Liberal MP, Carolyn Bennett. As minister responsible for international trade, Eggleton signed the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement in 1997, and last year he led a multi-party delegation of parliamentarians on a trip to the Jewish state.

Gomberg Dead

HALIFAX — Environmentalist Tooker Gomberg, a former Edmonton city councillor and mayoral candidate in Edmonton and Toronto, died March 3 after apparently jumping off a bridge linking Halifax and Dartmouth, police said. The Montreal native was 48 and had reportedly battled depression for the past three years. A graduate of Montreal's Herzliah High School, he founded one of Canada's first curbside recycling programs in Montreal and headed Edmonton's EcoCity Society. Gomberg received 50,000 votes, but came a distant second in the 2000 Toronto mayoral vote.

WORLD

Operation Safe Bus

CHICAGO — A U.S.-based interfaith group will provide Israel with security equipment for public buses. Responding to the threat of suicide bombings on Israeli public buses, the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews will outfit 1,000 security guards with explosives detectors and other equipment, including baggage-screening devices. The $7.2 million (US) project will cover Israel's 6,000 public buses, and individual donors can "secure a seat" for $24. "We are launching a practical way to protect innocent victims of random terror – one seat at a time, one bus at a time," said Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein, the group's president and CEO.

Police Probe Papon

PARIS — French police are investigating Maurice Papon for illegally wearing his Legion of Honour decoration. The honour was annulled by presidential order after Papon was convicted for complicity in crimes against humanity for his role in the deportation of some 1,500 Jews from southwest France to Nazi death camps in 1942. The Grand Chancellery of the Legion of Honour appealed to a court near Papon's home town east of Paris after the former Vichy official was seen wearing the decoration in a recent media photograph. The court ordered police to question Papon over the photo. Illegally wearing the decoration is punishable by a one-year jail term and an $18,000 (US) fine.

NYC Anti-Semitism Up

NEW YORK — Anti-Semitic incidents in New York spiked sharply during the last three months of 2003, says a new report released by New York Congressman Anthony Weiner. There were 57 such incidents during the last three months of 2003, as opposed to 31 during the same period in 2002, said the report. But anti-Semitic incidents fell overall in 2003 compared to 2002. There were 108 such incidents last year, as opposed to 114 the year before, according to New York City police.

Today I Am An Investor

NEW YORK — A mutual fund that invests in Israeli companies is offering an $18 free stock gift to U.S. children having a bar or bat mitzvah. The Blue and White Fund invests in Israeli firms that are traded on U.S. stock exchanges. Only individuals with a bar or bat mitzvah invitation or a proof from a rabbi are eligible.

Rabbi Links Synagogue Vandalism to Passion

DENVER — A crowd of about 300 people turned out to clean swastikas off a Denver synagogue on Purim.

The Sunday-morning cleaning at the BMH-BJ Congregation came after the 10 swastikas and Nazi symbols were spray-painted on the synagogue the preceding Friday night. The synagogue's rabbi, Daniel Cohen, said the vandalism may have been sparked by Mel Gibson's movie The Passion of the Christ, which critics say blames Jews for the death of Jesus.

The evening before The Passion opened on Feb. 25, a sign appeared in front of Denver's Lovingway United Pentecostal Church reading, "Jews killed the Lord Jesus," a passage from a letter written by Paul the apostle. Underneath the quote was the word, "Settled!" an apparent reference to Gibson's controversial film about the final 12 hours of Jesus' life.

The local branch of the Anti-Defamation League asked Lovingway's pastor Rev. Maurice Gordon, 73, to remove the sign. He initially refused, but when a Jewish woman later took down the sign, he subsequently put up a sign of apology. He resigned as church pastor earlier this month over the incident.

Union's anti-Israel activities draw criticism

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Israel figures prominently in the hallway graffiti of certain Canadian campuses these days, but it's not the words of the prophet, as the 1960s Simon and Garfunkel anthem said, that are written on those walls.

Jewish students say it's not uncommon to see messages scrawled on York University's tunnel walls and bathroom stalls that call for the end of Israel or death to all Jews. They say that when they complain, administrators usually agree that such scribblings are not welcome expressions of free speech in their institution of higher learning.

Jewish students also complain about the troubling nature of having to walk by Trotskyist League tables on the way to class and having to confront the group's political sloganeering against Israel.

However, last month, they found themselves frustrated by another type of presentation – one sponsored by a major campus union that they say is increasingly poisoning the atmosphere for Jewish students on campus.

The computer slide show by Jon Elmer, a freelance photojournalist, and activist Valerie Zink, both of whom spent time last summer in the West Bank town of Jenin and the Gaza Strip town of Rafah, was not compulsory and was sparsely attended.

But many students were troubled by the fact the biased talk, titled "From Occupied Palestine," was sponsored by the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) local 3903, which represents about 2,300 York teaching and graduate assistants, as well as contract faculty.

Jewish students at York U say CUPE local is poisoning campus atmosphere

Elmer began the talk by saying that he and Zink were only going to present the Palestinian side of the issue because they believe the other side is already well covered.

Zink then went on to recall stories told to her about "250 missiles falling every day" for a week during the Israeli invasion of Jenin in 2002. Although she was not there during that time, Zink described what she called the Jenin "massacre" in terms reminiscent of those that have been debunked by Human Rights Watch in its report on the conflict.

She talked about corpses piled at the side of the camp and the stench that filled the air. She described how an Israeli Defence Forces sniper killed a man for simply repairing his water tank on the top of his roof.

She concluded by saying, "I could go on forever."

"The presenters made it clear that they were not interested in actual discussion or debate," said Seth Winberg, a third-year York political science major who was part of a group of Jewish students who walked out of the presentation.

Jewish students complained that there was no mention of the tunnels used to smuggle arms and bombs into the refugee camps or of the suicide bombers that kill civilians in Israel. When members of the audience attempted to bring up these issues, they were shouted down by the moderator.

Tilly Shames, Israel affairs director for Hillel of Greater Toronto, was called "petty" and "stupid" by the moderator after asking whether Elmer had asked to see any tunnels.

CUPE represents more than half a million members across Canada. Local 3903's flyers state that its goals are to bargain collective agreements, defend workers' rights and fight on behalf of oppressed workers everywhere.

Over the past year, CUPE 3903 has budgeted money for such things as a $900 donation to sponsor a presentation on

Tourism in Israel (3)

From the editor's desk

The central conundrum that faced the 600 participants of the Third Prime Minister's Conference for Tourism to Israel last month in Jerusalem was how to increase the flow of visitors to the Jewish state. (That probably half of the people at the conference seeking an answer to this riddle were not Jewish is a subject on which I will reflect in the next issue of The CJN.)

To be sure, since 9/11, there has been a downturn in worldwide tourist travel. But the falling off of tourism in Israel has been much sharper than it has been globally.

The reason, of course, is the fear of travelling there generated by the violence of the conflict with the Palestinians and the possibility of being caught in a random act of terrorism.

The solution, of course, is not in gainsaying the fear, but in overcoming it. The irony is that the experience of visiting and touring Israel, despite the initial fear, is exhilarating and deeply pleasurable. It also places our fears in a more appropriate perspective: behind us, usually after we wondered why we were frightened in the first place.

One need only speak to any of the youngsters returning from their first visit to Israel on a Birthright trip to feel a sense of that exhilaration.

Israel's tourism officials have produced rafts of new travel brochures, information packets and even interactive materials to help entice undecided travellers to choose the Jewish state as a trip destination.

Despite its diminutive size, Israel is a gigantic tourist's delight because it offers visitors much that is deeply meaningful and rewarding on many levels: religious, historic, scenic, cultural and culinary, to name an obvious few.

Last year a number of new sites opened to inform, inspire, excite, strengthen or simply delight tourists:

• Mini-Israel. A new, 15-acre theme park midway between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. Israel's major cultural and historic sites and more than 30,000 meticulously crafted figurines are recreated and displayed is extraordinary artistic detail.

• The Turkish Bath (Hamam) Museum in Akko. The elegant network of marble-lined steam, massage, scrubbing and relaxation rooms of the El Basha turkish bath built by the Ottoman Turks in 1795 has been transformed into a museum.

• Ir David*, the City of David. This is a breathtaking archeological excavation located some 150 meters from the Western Wall in the original hilltop of Jerusalem mentioned in the Bible.

• The Jerusalem Archeological Park-Davidson Center. The splendour of the Second Temple comes alive from this magical location along the outer walls of the southwest corner of the Temple Mount, where it meets the Mount of Olives and the Kidron and Hinnom valleys. The Davidson Center, which is at the entrance to the park, is a state-of-the-art museum and teaching facility that is effectively a gateway for the modern visitor into the world of the Second Temple.

As well, the United Nations Education, Social and Cultural Organization has designated two more places in Israel, in addition to Akko and the Walls of the Old City of Jerusalem, as World Heritage Sites in recognition of their "outstanding universal value" – the "White City" of Tel Aviv, in which its impressive, art-deco-ish, mid-1930s Bauhaus architectural style pre-dominates, and Masada.

As anyone who has been to Israel – indeed, even anyone who has not been to Israel – knows, the country is a land flowing with milk, honey and tourist sites.

The decision of what to see or do in Israel, though burdened by a surfeit of choice, is an easy one. The more difficult decision for the prospective tourist appears to be, alas, whether or how to surmount one's fear.

How does one reach farther than the place in which fear has locked his heart? The answer can only come from within each of us by asking who we are, what we stand for and what we want to achieve during our time on Earth.

Ironically, the readers of this newspaper may be the people least afraid to travel to Israel. But the obligation to help our family, friends and acquaintances who have not yet been there or to go there again, rests on us all.

With the imminent arrival of Pesach, I bring to readers' attention the arrival of new Haggadot that have come across my desk.

The Holistic Haggadah: How Will You Be Different This Passover Night? by Michael Kagan (Urim Publications), describes itself as "a fascinating guide to the inner journey that the Passover seder evening offers us."

A product of our multi-disciplinary, new-age times, the author uses the traditional Haggadah as more than a theological, historical narrative. It becomes for him a springboard to integrate history and religion with emotional awareness and psychological self-discovery.

The depiction on the cover of the Yin Yang symbol made out of matzah leaves us with no doubt about the author's interesting, unconventional, cross-cultural, syncretic approach to the seder even as he borrows from the teachings of Reb Zalman Schachter-Shalomi and Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav.

Kagan lives in Jerusalem, has a PhD in chemistry from Hebrew University and describes himself as an Ortho-practising but unorthodox Jew.

B'nai Brith audit finds rise in anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada reported a 27 per cent jump in anti-Semitic incidents last year, with a substantial number of the 584 occurrences attributable to immigrant groups that have brought with them attitudes that vilify Jews.

Many discrete anti-Semitic incidents have been traced to "people who speak Arabic," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith.

Speaking at the release of B'nai Brith's 2003 Audit of Antisemitic Incidents, Dimant said the Jewish advocacy organization had tracked 36 cases in which the perpetrators were identifiable by their victims, "and those persons, either by words or language used, were Arab perpetrators."

Dimant pointed to incidents of anti-Israel protesters chanting "death to the Jews" in Arabic and to ethnic publications employing anti-Semitic stereotypes that have common currency abroad.

The rise of anti-Semitism in Canada is part of a global trend and must be addressed by education, he said.

The 2003 Audit, the 21st issued by B'nai Brith, reported that the increase in incidents in 2003 followed a 60 per cent jump the year before, almost doubling the occurrences in just three years. Of 2003's 584 incidents, the vast majority – 315 – took place in the Greater Toronto Area. Montreal was next with 102. From there, the number dropped dramatically to 45 in the Ottawa region and 40 in the rest of Ontario. Of the 10 distinct regions of Canada surveyed, only Manitoba and regional Ontario showed declines in the number of incidents.

The audit breaks down the incidents into three categories: vandalism, harassment and violence. Harassment remained by far the most prevalent, followed by vandalism and violence.

The type of reported incident ranged from a mall security guard in Montreal shouting "Yehudi" (Jew) at a man wearing a kippah to an elderly Jewish woman being pushed in a laundromat by teenage girls, who then called her in Arabic, "Zionist filthy pig."

Other reported incidents included bomb threats targeting Toronto synagogues, threats against a Victoria synagogue, the receipt of hate mail in Toronto and a fire set to the Jewish Youth Library in Ottawa.

"We are a community that is besieged," said Dimant. "Not only do we pay regular taxes [and school tuition], we also have to pay for security for our institutions, something nobody else is obliged to do.

"There is no reason any group in our society should feel so threatened that we would need security at our institutions."

The audit reported 23 incidents targeting synagogues in addition to 22 other incidents involving Jewish communal buildings, 46 against Jewish students on campus, 23 in the workplace, 32 relating to Internet sites and 33 involving hate e-mail. The audit also reported that 111 of the incidents included threats and 34 were directed against children (22 of which involved school facilities).

B'nai Brith officials cautioned that only about 10 per cent of all incidents are believed to be reported.

The audit pointed to two high-profile cases that "appear to have led to an increase in the number of individuals who felt empowered to act out their antisemitic proclivities. There appears to be a causal relationship between coverage of 'Jewish' issues in the mass media and the feeling that somehow 'permission' has been given for open expression of antagonism towards Jews."

The first of these cases was the outburst by Native leader David Ahenakew, who said in December 2002 that Hitler was right to "fry" six million Jews to prevent them from taking over Europe, and Lebanese Ambassador Raymond Baaklini, who told an Arabic language newspaper in January 2003 that Zionists control 90 per cent of the Canadian media.

The audit reported that in addition to the traditional source of anti-Jewish sentiment on the extreme right, "anti-Jewish rhetoric [is] increasingly emanating from the far left. This trend points to a progressively radicalized anti-globalist movement joining forces with Marxist, anti-American and anarchist elements to vilify the Jews as the root of the world's problems."

B'nai Brith officials urged political leaders to publicly condemn anti-Semitism. National president Rochelle Wilner noted that former prime minister Jean Chrétien never visited a synagogue, even though several were hit by fire bombs, although he did visit a mosque following the 9/11 attacks.

"We would like Prime Minister [Paul Martin] to make an unequivocal statement condemning anti-Semitism and for the Canadian government to take a strong stand and support initiatives against anti-Semitism and racism in Canada," she said.

The audit reported that only seven of the incidents led to criminal investigations. Det. Constable Brian Clarke of the Toronto police hate crimes unit said most of the incidents occur in anonymity, so identifying the perpetrators is difficult.

Sgt. Steve Irwin, head of the Toronto police intelligence unit, who also attended the news conference, agreed that immigrants can bring with them attitudes that are not consistent with Canadian values. Education is the key to addressing those attitudes, but sometimes the results are not seen until the third generation, he said.

Not all Arab immigrants share anti-Jewish opinions, Irwin said. Most are moderates who want a brighter future for their children. The challenge they face comes from "fanatics" who can intimidate others and who try to retain the "same old traditions and carry them on with the Arab communities," he said.

Tanenbaum resigns in fury over AGO redesign

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Once described as "the collector behind the curtain," Toronto cultural philanthropist Joey Tanenbaum stepped dramatically into the media spotlight last week as he resigned from the Art Gallery of Ontario's board of trustees over the proposed $195-million AGO makeover by architect Frank Gehry that was announced in late January.

In a public letter of resignation, Tanenbaum denounced the Gehry redesign as "a blatant attempt to eradicate the recent history of the gallery." He termed it a "frivolous transformation" that will require the "needless destruction" of many gallery spaces, including the Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Sculpture Atrium and other dedicated areas that bear the family name.

By any measure, the Tanenbaums have been extraordinarily generous benefactors over the past 35 years, having donated money and art worth more than $90 million to the AGO. They practiced similar largesse with the Royal Ontario Museum and the Art Gallery of Hamilton.

"And now, after more than three decades of contributing to the life and growth of the AGO, we are to watch as the evidence of our commitment disintegrates under the frivolous transformation that is planned," Tanenbaum wrote in his resignation letter.

The 71-year-old former builder and art collector also predicted that, as in other Gehry buildings, significant cost overruns would drive up the projected price tag to at least $250 million. His letter made clear he won't be giving another nickel to the institution.

Joey Tanenbaum

"As you know, Matthew, this is very painful for me and for my family," he wrote, addressing AGO director Matthew Teitelbaum. "I can only say that I'm grateful we were able to contribute something over the past decades without the foreknowledge of what was to come."

Much of the impetus for the rebuilding campaign has come from Toronto billionaire art collector Kenneth Thomson, who has donated $70 million toward the Gehry redesign and $300-million worth of art to help fill it.

The AGO's latest renovations plans come barely a decade after the gallery drastically scaled back architect Barton Myers' previous redesign due to lack of funds.

Tanenbaum has complained bitterly that the new design calls for the removal of the vaulted glass ceiling in the Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Sculpture Atrium so that another four floors can be built above it. The plan also calls for the Walker Court to be "ruined" with the addition of a spiral staircase, he says.

"We had conversations with Joey and knew of his unhappiness with the situation," James Fleck, past president of the AGO's board of trustees and chair of its building committee, told The CJN. "We did have other solutions and other spaces that we wanted to discuss with Joey and his wife, and that was supposed to happen in May when they got back from Florida.

"We were surprised and saddened when Joey took the steps that he did, and took them publicly – he didn't consult us beforehand. But we do recognize the tremendous support from the Tanenbaum family over the years, and we're still hopeful that some reconciliation can take place, although we know that Joey considers that either highly unlikely or impossible."

Speaking on condition of anonymity, a source with insider knowledge of Canadian art collection and philanthropy said the AGO's Teitelbaum was caught in the unenviable position of having to appease one powerful patron at the expense of offending another.

"It seems to me that Matthew had to choose one donor over another," the source said. "He had millions from Tanenbaum, but he had [more] from Thomson. He must have known this was going to happen. He knew he was going to lose somebody big, but the last person he would want to lose was Thomson."

The AGO could have sidestepped the present trouble, the source said, by following the example of London's Tate Gallery, which raised a new building for modern works at a remote site and left its present building untouched. Tanenbaum reportedly put a similar suggestion before the AGO board in relation to a parcel of land along Toronto's waterfront, but the idea was ultimately rejected in favour of Gehry's pared-down but still flashy redesign.

According to Fleck, the decision to proceed with the Gehry plan was unanimous among all board members who were present to vote. Tanenbaum, he said, was at his winter home near Sarasota, Fla. through much of the process.

"There have been conversations with Joey by phone, but this is not really something you can resolve over the phone," he said. "You've got to see the models, you've got to see the drawings, you've got to talk to Frank, you've got to get some engagement.

"Our disappointment really is that we weren't able to complete the dialogue."

No choice: wage war against terrorism

Despite the moral relativism that hard-core ideologues use to differentiate causes and effects from among terrorist victims, there is a straight line of inhumanely cruel sadism joining the suicide bombing attacks last Thursday in Madrid with the suicide bombings on Sunday in Ashdod.

The co-ordinated 10-bomb attack on the commuter trains in the Spanish capital was the largest terror strike in Europe since the 1988 Lockerbie disaster, killing 201 people and injuring nearly 1,500. The attack in Ashdod added 10 more names to the list of nearly 1,000 Israelis killed by Palestinian terrorists. Fatah's Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade and Hamas have claimed responsibility for the Ashdod attack. It is not yet clear who perpetrated the Madrid atrocity, although it appears that the extremists of Al Qaeda were involved.

Even if there should prove to have been no Al Qaeda link to the Madrid devastation, it should no longer be necessary to prove the utter incontrovertibility of the need for a worldwide war against terrorism. No continent, no city, no culture, no way of life is immune from the terrorists' aim. New York, Washington, Bali, Mombasa, Djerba, Moscow, Istanbul, Jerusalem, Madrid and Ashdod are only a partial list of places where innocent civilians have been struck down by the paradise-seeking murderers.

Most important of all, however, is that no purported grievance, no claim of historic injustice, no temporal or heavenly cause justifies the terrorists' bloodlust. For that is all it is: a lust to slaughter in the name of a self-proclaimed, ethereal, but perverse vindication. The only appropriate response to the terrorists is to oppose them. It is not to try to understand or appease them. Canada, too, has an important role to play in all international theatres – military and diplomatic – in opposing terrorism.

A vile, sinister view

In his column last Saturday in the Globe and Mail, Doug Saunders offered the following illustrative aside in support of the proposition that nationhood is an anachronism in our modern age: "They [people rethinking nationhood] include the smarter members of the Palestinian and Israeli communities, who are beginning to speak once again of a single, constitutionally secular state with two distinct regions. It's hard to see it through the concrete walls being built by Israel's extremist government, but a growing number of voices have begun to acknowledge that a federation would be the only way to put a stop to the sad mistakes of 1947…"

There are a number of flaws of fact, history and logic in Saunders' opinion, but the most egregious is simply this: In a sinister, even dishonest manner, he asserts that there should be no room anywhere on earth for a Jewish state. How vile a view!

Economic Mission seeks mentors

The Israel Economic Mission to Canada is interested in meeting local businesspeople who can act as mentors and help Israeli companies find customers, distributors or representatives in Canada. This initiative is co-ordinated with the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce in Tel Aviv.

Last year, Israel's exports to Canada reached $300 million (US) while Israel's exports to the United States were $12 billion (US). Our goal is to reach annual Israeli exports to Canada of $600 million (US) by 2007.

The number of Israeli companies that approach the Economic Mission's offices in Toronto and Montreal, as well as the Embassy of Israel in Ottawa, is increasing steadily. We are looking for volunteers to help Israeli companies find Canadian customers, partners, agents or representatives (as required) and arrange the initial contact between the parties.

The Economic Mission will pre-evaluate the capability of each Israeli company based on international standards and on its proven experience to export its products. Example sectors include consumer goods, textiles, food, machinery, electronic and electrical products, communication devices, security, defense, biotechnology, medical, software, automotive and aviation.

Individuals interested in this opportunity can contact the Government of Israel Economic Mission to Canada at 416-640-8540 or istrade@on.aibn.com.

Writing is on the wall

Recently, my cousin and I went into a travel agency at the Promenade Mall in Thornhill. We browsed through the catalogues for a few minutes and then looked at a large wall map. As we searched for Israel, we were stunned to find that, in its place, the map read "Israeli Occupied Territories."

In addition, Jerusalem was the only capital city on the map not indicated with a star like all other capital cities.

We were speechless for a few minutes. We could not believe that in a first-world, democratic country like Canada, such a thing was written on a map of the world.

This incident opened my eyes to the anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment that pervades everyday life in Canada. I would never have expected to find something so blatantly political in a purportedly non-political office. By displaying this map on the wall, the agency is making a clear political statement to its clients, who are predominantly Jewish and Israeli at this location.

I believe it is important that we as Canadians take a stand against such attempts to alienate the Jewish community and discriminate against the State of Israel. Many people believe that one lone voice cannot evoke change, but many united voices can make a world of difference.

Correct the record

To avoid the increasingly frequent accusation that world Jewry exaggerates the Holocaust, unsupportable claims and statements must be carefully avoided. I am a survivor of the Sachsenhausen Concentration Camp and I lost both my parents, one in Theresienstadt and one in Auschwitz.

There were no gassings or mass shootings at Terezin (Theresienstadt), and there is no record of a slaughter of 15,000 children there, as stated in the article on Jakie Young by David Silverberg ("11-year-old wunderkind to tour E. Europe with Ontario Terezin," CJN, Feb. 19). Theresienstadt was an organized ghetto and not an extermination camp. Many people died, including many children, but most of them died due to severe deprivation, hunger and typhus. Correct records are available from the Theresienstadt Martyrs Remembrance Association in Israel, at the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem or at the U.S. Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C.

Free publicity for the Passion

Jews are hearing a fair share of all kinds of rhetoric from fundamentalist Christian groups about Mel Gibson's film The Passion of the Christ.

We have, in my belief, given Gibson and his family publicity that all the money in the world could not buy. We have ensured that the movie and commentaries by Gibson's father, a Holocaust denier, will be seen and read about by almost everybody.

If we had just let this movie be released without any comment, it would have been a financial failure and a complete flop. But we changed all that. We have given Holocaust deniers and anti-Semites a platform to spew their garbage and hatred.

So now, instead of getting bashed by Muslim fanatics worldwide, we can expect a revival of the old blood libel that Christian anti-Semites are famous for. We now have to fight on two separate fronts just to keep ourselves where we were in 1935.

Silence of Jews in film industry

Many Jewish leaders and rabbis have spoken and written about Mel Gibson's movie The Passion of the Christ, but no Jewish producers, directors or actors have spoken out. Barbara Walters can protest against presidents, but not against Gibson. Steven Spielberg can record the history of survivors of the Holocaust, but not stand up and say that Gibson's movie is garbage.

Living in Canada and the United States has given Jews great opportunities to get ahead. Let's not let Gibson, who will pocket millions of dollars from the movie, revive anti-Semitism without fighting back.

Canada, America and Israel and the future of freedom

The following are edited excerpts from the Katherine Pless lectures delivered by critic and writer Robert Fulford at Holy Blossom Temple, Jan. 26, Feb. 9 and Feb. 23. They are reprinted with permission of the author.

U.S. President George W. Bush, a man of uncommonly direct speech, said in August 2002, that America is "the greatest force for good in history." That's a radical statement, in the sense that it goes to the root of the issue. How you respond will indicate your attitude to the United States.

Is it the empty boast of a braggart drunk on power? Or is it the simple truth? It sounds to me much like views expressed by Abraham Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt and John Kennedy, stripped of the relative subtlety in which they wrapped it.

Some people, like me, will say, "Yes, I suppose so." Others will shudder in horror. They may not be able to think of a greater force for good, and the stability of their own lives may depend on the United States. But Bush's opinion will offend those who are already skeptical of American intentions.

And the current administration has intensified the hostility of its old allies by changing the basis of American policy from containment, the style of the Cold War, to a new preemptive strategy. Now the Americans try to ensure their security by identifying and hunting down terrorists before they attack.

A containment policy would be useless against the relatively new challenge to the United States generated by Islamist attacks. These began in the 1980s and increased in frequency until finally an insufferable public outrage, Sept. 11, brought the United States to its feet, determined to defend itself (and its friends) against this menace.

The Americans recognized that they were at war, but they have discovered that the system of multilateral alliances, often effective in the past, is now unreliable.

Others did not see the war as the Americans saw it. Canada, for instance, though geographically close to the Sept. 11 attacks, did not consider them a declaration of war and therefore made no serious efforts to mobilize, leaving our military forces at the low levels to which they had fallen over the previous 30 years. Other nations held similar views. The Americans decided they would go forward with their friends if possible, but go forward by themselves if necessary.

In this crisis, anti-Americanism fed on itself. A suspicion of the Americans prevented several major countries from sympathizing with their goals and methods. And when America decided it would fight Iraq without the help of the United Nations, Germany and France, that was seen as a new expression of arrogance – another reason to dislike America.

There is a central rule of anti-Americanism, maintained in most countries: you must not agree with Washington on any issue, even if Washington is right. For this reason, many have ruled themselves out of the most significant conflict of the new century, the struggle against Islamic terrorism…

A French commentator, Jean François Revel, recently remarked, "If you remove anti-Americanism, nothing remains of French political thought today, either on the left or on the right." That suggests a question: What would happen if we somehow removed anti-Americanism from Canada?

My guess is that we would be even more bereft than the French. Anti-Americanism is part of us, bred in our bones, an essential ritual of our tribe. It's a special psychological crutch handed to us free by history and geography. We would not be ourselves without it.

It gives us reasons for feeling good about ourselves and it encourages delusions of superiority. In economic matters, it provides excuses for our failures, and in cultural affairs, it justifies policies that might otherwise seem foolish, wasteful or narrow-minded. In foreign affairs, it offers many delightful opportunities for justifying outrageously perverse behaviour, such as our decision to make a lifelong friend of Cuban leader Fidel Castro. It allows us to spend very little on our military forces, since we imagine they would only be used in support of the Americans anyway.

Anti-Americanism waxes and wanes. It sometimes lies dormant and it even occasionally plays dead. But it never truly disappears. Literary critic Northrop Frye once said that a Canadian is an American who rejects the revolution – that is, we are Americans who reject the essential fact of America.

This has so coloured opinion in English-speaking Canada that in many circles today, it is considered eccentric not to express reflexive anti-American views, along with contempt for the American president and his administration. A friend of mine who produces programs for the CBC defines anti-Americanism as the CBC's "default position" – it's where the programmers begin and end.

On CBC Radio, for instance, a vigorous pro-American opinion or a defence of George W. Bush sounds almost outrageous and certainly upsets faithful listeners. Fortunately, CBC producers ensure that such opinions are seldom heard.

If anti-Americanism throws a shadow over much of our public life, it may exert an even darker influence in private. Two years ago, I wrote a column on this subject and its public manifestations. The 60 or so letters that I received in response were touching, surprising and appalling. Most of them agreed with me but took a different approach. I wrote of public discussion, but my readers wanted to tell me about anti-Americanism in their personal and professional lives.

For me, there were two surprises in this correspondence. The first was that some Americans living here experience Canadian hostility as a much uglier prejudice than I had realized. The second surprise was a violation of a Canadian stereotype: my most passionate correspondents were Americans who lived in the West, a region we usually consider more pro-American than the rest of English-speaking Canada.

These letters, while more intense than anything I expected, confirmed my feeling that anti-Americanism is the most widely accepted prejudice in Canada. It's genially tolerated everywhere from university classrooms to dinner parties to meetings of the Liberal Party and the NDP. It is considered polite and normal by people who would consider racism, anti-Semitism and homophobia shameful. In fact, anti-Americanism creates around itself an aura of virtue…

Anti-Semitism is a virus that mutates constantly and appears in ever more surprising shapes. Today, its most vigorous form is the accusation that Israel and Washington work together in close harmony. Moreover, this latest mutation includes the argument that somehow Israel, allegedly through its American friends the neoconservatives, has become the more powerful partner. As Israeli writer Yossi Klein Halevi wrote recently, the belief in Jewish domination of Washington has become the latest idea behind anti-Semitism and anti-Americanism…

Israel's reputation in Europe has been particularly distorted by the convoluted history of nationalism. For much of the 20th century, Europe was a collection of self-consciously nationalist countries, each of them dedicated to a destiny that was based on race as well as territory.

Countries such as France, Poland, Italy and, of course, Germany saw nationalism and national pride as the purest and most noble form of politics. From these exalted positions, each European country could, if it chose, look down on the Jews, who were a people without a state, uncoupled from the historical dynamic that Europe was playing out. The Jews seemed to be by themselves, floating in a kind of no-man's-land. This attitude helped to make the Holocaust possible.

For Jews who survived past 1945, it was only natural to seize the Zionist ideal, by then half a century old, and make it into reality. They brought a new nation and a new national spirit into the world. Finally, they had what political philosopher Isaiah Berlin called "a place where Jews do not have to look over their shoulders, concerned constantly with how they look to other people."

In the beginning, I believe, Europeans were happy for them: happy that they were settled, happy that Europe didn't need to worry about them anymore, and possibly happy that democracy had been introduced into the Middle East. Democracy was spreading in Europe, too, reaching into every corner of the old fascist states: Germany, Italy, Spain, Portugal.

At the same time, Europeans were turning against nationalism. They recognized that it had served them badly in the 20th century, and slowly they were giving it up. The European Coal and Steel Community of 1952 turned into the European Economic Community and then today's European Union, with its Charter of Social Rights, common currency and many shared institutions. By the early 1990s, Europe had entered a post-nationalist period.

Where nationalism in Europe was once among the ultimate virtues, it now came to be thought of as antiquated and dangerous. From this new and morally exalted position, Europe could once more look down on the Jews, many of them now transformed into Israelis, builders of a nation growing stronger and more confident at precisely the moment when European nationalism was being dismantled.

In 1967, with the Six Day War, Israel moved even farther away from the new European mood. Not only was it a nation, it was a nation that could quickly and decisively defend itself and even hold, for the time being, territory that fell into its hands.

The Europeans have found a way to see themselves as superior in each era, the period of nationalism and the present phase of post-nationalism. But as they abandoned nationalism, they noticed that the Americans were not interested in following the same course. The Americans refused to surrender any of the crucial powers of national government. Moreover, when radical Muslims attacked their homeland on Sept. 11, they reacted like Israelis. They saw the attack as a declaration of war, and today Bush proudly calls himself "a war president."

American nationalism is alive and vigorous. Moreover, the enemy of the United States was the same enemy fighting Israel – Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden himself said so. At least in some eyes, the identification between the two nations was complete – a point that Arab propagandists have been trying to make for decades.

Chicken cordon bleu

This is a true story. Once upon a time, there was a kosher caterer who made a wonderful dish: chicken and pastrami.

He would skilfully stuff pastrami into a chicken breast, fry it in breadcrumbs, and cover it with sauce. Alas, no one wanted to buy this tasty entrée, for mere chicken and pastrami was far too humble for his customers' sophisticated palates. Disappointed, the caterer searched for a solution. He decided to give his beleaguered entrée a more glamourous name: chicken cordon bleu. (Luckily, his clients were unaware that chicken cordon bleu is usually stuffed with ham and cheese.) Then it began to sell. Everyone wanted a taste of that gourmet delicacy, chicken cordon bleu. With a stroke of the pen, this chicken was no longer a Yiddish accented immigrant from Brooklyn, but rather a charming French arrival.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

There's a simple lesson to this story (to quote the Mishnah): "don't judge a wine by its bottle." It's easy to be enticed by slick packaging. The shiny veneer, the classy bottle and the exotic name can beguile us into making rash decisions. Indeed, this classic moral relates well to our story. However, it has a uniquely contemporary dimension as well.

We are an image driven society. Frankly, no one cares what the wine tastes like anymore. We're only interested in the bottle. Our identities are now based on the external and superficial. That's why what your shoes do for your image is more important than what they do for your feet (hence, the invention of stiletto heels). And it's why people go to tanning salons, why people drive 100 km/h sports cars, and why people who would never eat "Jewish" food will eat that famous French entrée, chicken cordon bleu.

Today, image is more important than reality.

Our infatuation with image is destructive. It is a form of stupidity, which, (to paraphrase Maimonides) is the petri dish of evil. This obsession turns us into superstitious consumers, buying only items that have the blessings of the fashion Gods. Because of it, we forget about the comfort of loose sweatshirts and sensible shoes, we ignore our health in search of the perfect tan, and we refuse to try great, but untrendy, food. We fail to truly experience life while we're chasing an illusion. In the end, we're left clutching an empty bottle, never having enjoyed the wine inside.

We ate some "chicken cordon bleu" the other night, and it was quite enjoyable. Not because it conjured images of a French chef, but simply because it tasted good. Or, as Shakespeare might have put it, "chicken and pastrami by any other name still tastes as sweet as chicken and pastrami."

Mel's Passion is a battle not worth fighting

Maybe I am missing something, but I just can't get that excited about The Passion of the Christ, Mel Gibson's flamboyantly terrible, excessively violent movie that reduces one of history's most complicated and influential moments to a snuff video. The movie is simplistic, sophomoric and sadistic. I did not, however, find it dangerously anti-Semitic.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Gibson's Passion certainly has "passion," yet all the screaming and moaning left me utterly cold – beyond feeling occasionally disgusted by one of the blood-bursts. Gibson shows the emotion without explaining it. There is so much on-screen hysteria from the start that the viewer is left wondering what everyone is shouting about. Ironically, only Pontius Pilate hovers above the fray. In Gibson's bizarre worldview, this classical villain emerges as a sensitive soul, a Clintonian politician who feels individuals' pain while seeking the golden path of least resistance.

As for the Jews, the movie's cartoonishly bloodthirsty mob has nothing to do with me, my friends or my relatives. Gibson's rendering of the dialogue in the "authentic" Aramaic makes it sound like they are speaking Klingon. The Pharisees' get-ups look like rejects from Lost in Space. The Sanhedrin's soldiers look like refugees from Planet of the Apes. The film's look and sound thus provide a protective distancing. Gibson's Jews – who are not so clearly identified as "Jews" – are too foreign and demented to reflect on us. Anyone who chooses to transpose feelings about Gibson's "Caiaphas and company" caricature onto real people 2,000 years later must already have been predisposed to hate Jews.

In the kind of personal outreach sadly lacking but so desperately needed today, my college roommate, who is now a Jesuit priest, sent me a reassuring letter conveying similar thoughts. "Some Christians will tendentiously find justification for anti-Jewish thought in their adherence to some element of the sad legacy of Christian (including Catholic) intolerance and insensitivity," he wrote.

Having been "truly touched by the concerns" expressed about the movie, my friend hopes "that the true strengths of our traditions will sustain those who remain faithful to them, and stand out as human dignity and divine grace to the world."

Inspired to try viewing the film through my friend's eyes, I speculated that if I were Christian, I would find the movie doubly offensive.

For starters, Jesus' teachings are relegated to flashbacks that have all the sophistication of a Lethal Weapon script. The movie assumes Jesus' greatness without demonstrating it in any way beyond his capacity to endure torture. There are many soulful looks from Mary, Peter and other disciples, but these gestures do not a great religion make. And Gibson's glee in splattering Jesus' blood borders on sacrilege.

Jews worried about The Passion feeding a new round of anti-Semitism should note that the Roman torturers come off the worst in this flick. The two brutes who flail Jesus delight in their task, and end up physically and emotionally spent after indulging their passion for torture. But the sins of these two – like the sins of movie meanies set in all kinds of historical epochs – stand alone, independent of their descendants today, as it should be.

As my mind wandered during this boring epic, I could not help wondering how much of the Jewish community's wrath had turned the movie from Mel's forgettable eccentricity into a blockbuster.

Throughout these last four years of Arafat's War, I have mourned our community's inability to choose the right battles. On campus, we have spent too much time arguing with Palestinian and leftist fanatics who are impervious to logic or evidence, without noticing that the shouting from both sides alienates moderates. Beyond the campus, rather than forcing mayors, ministers, priests and imams to confront our discomfort amid Islamicist threats, we silently budget extra money for security.

Sometimes, certain offences should be ignored – not out of our grandparent's "Bontsha the Silent" insecurity, but because we feel secure. There is great power – and greater wisdom – in choosing your battles, in knowing when to fight. Let The Passion get spent, and let's focus on building constructive mutual understanding with our Christian friends.

That, my Jesuit friend insists, "would be the most eloquent statement and most effective dialogue of all."

Where is La Place de l'Étoile?

Never mind the odd shade of aqua blue. Seeing the Champs Élysées lined with Israeli flags was a rare sight indeed.

Paris was festooned with the French-made flags to mark Israeli President Moshe Katsav's visit to France earlier this month – the first visit to France by an Israeli president in more than 15 years. Hanging side by side with the tricoleur, this institutional display of amity between France and Israel suggested a momentary thaw in the chilly relations between the two countries and signaled official concern with the rise of anti-Semitic incidents in France.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Coinciding with the EU summit on European anti-Semitism held in Brussels (co-sponsored by European Jewish groups), the public display of the Magen David offered a silent, yet ironic commentary on the feelings of many European Jews. These days, for example, many French Jews refrain from wearing a Magen David, or any visible markers of Jewishness.

At the Brussels conference, European and Jewish leaders debated the extent of contemporary European anti-Semitism. Is it as bad as in the 1930s and 40s? Worse? No, no – not that bad.

That, of course, referred to Europe under Nazism. The fact that, more than 60 years later, there is debate about whether European anti-Semitism surpasses or falls short of that benchmark is astonishing. Or perhaps not. Who remembers the extermination of the Armenians?

In order to deal appropriately with anti-Semitism, to see it clearly for what it is today, the European community needs to deal, in some appropriate way, with the burdens of memory. Some countries have taken on this difficult challenge. However imperfectly (and there is no perfect way), some have struggled with what has been called an unmasterable past. A visitor to Germany, for example, will see highly visible ways in which that country acknowledges its role in the nightmare of Hitler's rule. The "Topography of Terror" exhibit at the site of the SS and Gestapo prison, the museum at Wannsee and other places of memory bring the past into the present for accountability and contemplation.

What of France? As the flags waved over the Champs Élysées and the leaders convened in Belgium, I wandered the streets of Paris looking for signs of the debacle, such as the camps of Paris. French historian Jean-Marc Dreyfus refers to them as presque-camps – almost camps. Three slave-labour camps existed in the heart of Paris during the Vichy government. Not on the outskirts of the city, like Drancy, but in the 10th, 13th and 16th arrondissements, Jews with non-Jewish spouses, and children of such marriages, worked as slave labourers.

Today, at the first site – a former department store, now a design firm, near the Gare du Nord – there are no visible markers of its function during the war, no sign of the Jews who would later be transported to death camps in the East. The site in the 16th is also not marked. The elegant building in which confiscated Jewish couture clothing was sorted, altered, and distributed to SS is now a tony apartment house. The camp of Austerlitz, near the railroad station of that name, is no longer standing. A university library was erected in its place.

Once pens of human misery, these sites have been reabsorbed into the Parisian cityscape. They are sites of non-memory. The absence of any commemorative plaque or other connection between past and present is an anti-sign, a paradoxical reminder that France has yet to fully embrace the complexities of its history and its checkered relationship with its Jewish inhabitants. With the recent spate of anti-Semitic episodes in France, as elsewhere in western Europe, it's becoming clearer that France will have to do so.

Walking along the Champs Élysées toward La Place de l'Étoile, flanked by the flags of two nations, I recalled a joke told among the Jews of wartime Paris, as recounted by the French writer Patrick Modiano. In 1942, a German visitor to Paris stopped a young man and asks him, "Où se trouve La Place de l'Étoile?" (Where is La Place de l'Étoile, literally, the place of the star.) The man silently points to the left side of his chest, where a yellow star had been affixed.

Looking up at the aqua and white flags running from the Place de la Concorde to La Place de l'Étoile some 60 years later, I thought "There, too. There are the stars."

The Kirshner File

Palestinians look to a one-state solution

In the past few months, an old idea for resolving Israel's historic, increasingly violent impasse with the Palestinians has been gaining ground and making something of a comeback in important Palestinian circles.

Prominent Palestinian figures have begun dropping hints that a two-state solution could be beyond reach and that a one-state solution – a euphemism for Israel's dismantlement as a Jewish state – may be the answer to defusing the long-festering Arab-Israeli conflict.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Call it old wine in new bottles.

The concept of a single, binational, secular, democratic state stretching from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean Sea – once promoted by Jewish thinkers such as Martin Buber and Judah Magnes – was popularized by the Palestine Liberation Organization during the heyday of the "armed struggle" period from the 1960s to the 1980s.

Under international pressure, however, the PLO moderated its position and formally accepted United Nations Resolution 242 – which acknowledges the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of all states in the region – and renounced terrorism. With these tentative steps, the PLO seemingly abandoned its quest for a binational state in favour of a two-state solution.

The process gathered momentum after the first Gulf War. The 1991 Madrid conference was convened. The 1993 Oslo peace talks took place. Israel belatedly recognized the PLO. Israeli and Palestinian negotiators tried to flesh out the Oslo accords.

But even at the height of the Oslo process, before former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's tragic assassination, the two-state plan was fiercely resisted by antagonistic forces: right-wing Israelis who dreamed of a greater Israel and sought to retain the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, and rejectionist Palestinians – from Islamists to Marxists – who could not reconcile themselves to the implantation of an alien Jewish state on land they resolutely conceived of as Arab.

Despite the opposition to a two-state solution, the notion was increasingly embraced by Israelis and Palestinians alike and wholeheartedly backed by the United Nations and a coalition of diverse countries from Canada to the United States and from Egypt to Syria.

Though it was, and still is, a pragmatic and realistic approach to solving an intractable dispute, the two-state model was badly shaken by the failure of the Camp David summit in July 2000, the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising two months later, the gradual dissolution of the Oslo process and, most recently, the unravelling of the "road map" peace plan.

The intifadah, with its spate of road-side shootings and suicide bombings, has left a bitter taste in the mouths of many Israeli Jews, turning them rightward. In the last two general elections, they have cast their ballots for Ariel Sharon, whose idea of territorial compromise not does even meet the minimum expectations of mainstream Palestinian opinion: a viable, contiguous state in all of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

On the Palestinian side, disillusionment has grown with the conviction that Sharon will not give them more than about half of the West Bank, the equivalent of about 10 per cent of historic Palestine. And a whole host of facts on the ground have caused further despair in Palestinian ranks– from Israel's occupation of Palestinian autonomous areas in the West Bank in the spring of 2002, to the doubling of the Jewish settler population in the West Bank since Oslo.

But long before the promise of Oslo disintegrated, anti-Oslo Palestinian intellectuals such as the late Edward Said – a Columbia University English professor – were in the forefront of advocating a one-state solution. "Oslo," Said wrote in a revealing 1998 New York Times op-ed piece, "set the stage for separation, but real peace can come only with a binational Israeli-Palestinian state."

The leadership of the Palestinian Authority, whom Said often disparaged, does not officially share his view and supports a two-state solution. But lately, some of its top officials, from President Yasser Arafat on down, have hinted they may embrace a one-state solution if Sharon continues to build the security barrier through the West Bank and around Jerusalem and follows through with his threat to separate unilaterally from the Palestinians.

Two months ago, in a pointed reference to a disputed route of the fence, the current Palestinian prime minister, Ahmed Qureia, declared, "This is an apartheid solution to put the Palestinians into cantons. Who can accept this? We will go for a one-state solution."

Taking his cue from Qureia, Nasser al-Kidwa, the PA's envoy to the United Nations, told the International Court of Justice in The Hague last month that the fence would "render the two-state solution... practically impossible." Arguing in the same vein, the former Palestinian culture minister, Yasser Abed Rabbo, has warned that the barrier would leave Palestinians in bantustan-like enclaves and thus embolden them to fight for a binational state.

Marwan Barghouti, the imprisoned Fatah leader whom Israel accuses of masterminding terrorist attacks, has framed the question more broadly. In a courtroom appearance last fall, he said, "If the occupation does not end unilaterally or through negotiations, then there is only one solution: one state for two people."

Ali Jerbawi, a Bir Zeit University political science professor, has warned that a two-state solution can only be attained if Israel freezes the building of settlements in the territories, stops construction of the fence, takes steps to solve the Palestinian refugee problem and acquiesces to a Palestinian state in the whole of the West Bank and Gaza.

The one-state scenario, which has been adopted by Israeli Arabs such as parliamentarian Azmi Beshara and Western intellectuals such as Tony Judt, a Jewish professor of history at New York University, may ultimately be a clever negotiating tactic to exert political pressure on Israel to give in to Palestinian political demands.

Ehud Olmert

But for radical Palestinians who cannot abide a Zionist state, a binational state is still the only acceptable solution.

"In the long run, there seems to be no alternative to a one-state solution," writes Naseer Auri, a professor emeritus at the University of Massachusetts. "The future is necessarily toward integration, not separation; toward a pluralistic existence, not exclusion; toward parity, mutuality and a common destiny, not apartheid, exploitation and separate futures."

Mazin Qumsiyeh, a Yale University professor, has a slightly different spin. "Palestinians cannot accept offers that limit Palestinian sovereignty regarding borders, air space and water resources." He adds: "The two-state scenario is untenable, pitting Israel's security and emotional needs against Palestinian freedom and self-determination."

Mohammed Dahla, a Hebrew University graduate and the first Arab law clerk in Israel's Supreme Court, is just as emphatic. The American feminist, Phyllis Chesler, in her new book, quotes Dahla as saying: "To live by the Jewish character of the State of Israel is to live by the point of the sword... and over time, you will not be able to live by the point of the sword. The world will change, the balance of forces will change, demography will change."

Far from ignoring such rhetoric, Israel appears to be taking it seriously.

Having given up on the possibility of an agreement with the Palestinians, and borrowing the language of Israel's peace camp, Ehud Olmert, Israel's deputy prime minister, recently called for a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from much of the West Bank and Gaza so that Israel can redraw its borders. Using the demographic card to buttress his case, Olmert said the time is fast approaching when Arabs will outnumber Jews between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea.

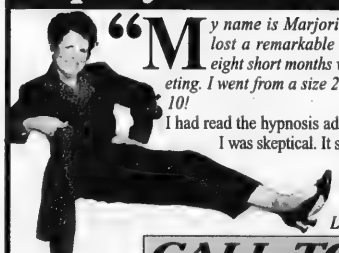
When that moment dawns, the Palestinians will no longer be content with a separate state, he claimed. They will demand a "one-man-one-vote" system in a South African-style binational state. "The day we come to that, we will lose everything."

Olmert may well have been influenced by Arnon Sofer, a Haifa University geographer who believes the biggest threat to Israel stems from the "demographic time bomb." If Israel does not separate from the Palestinians, he has written, it could face vocal demands from a Palestinian majority for equal political rights. And if they are denied these basic rights, Israel could be branded as an apartheid state and face international sanctions.

Support for a binational state – Israel's ultimate nightmare – is extremely limited in Israel. Only post-Zionist Jews on the far left, and a number of disaffected Israeli Arabs, are for it. But Palestinians will universally rally behind that idea should the likelihood of Palestinian statehood recede.

As Edward Abington, the former U.S. consul in eastern Jerusalem, has said: "What the Palestinians want is their own state. But increasingly they feel there is less and less of a possibility for that to happen. That inexorably leads them to look at alternatives."

"I prayed for a miracle.... I found hypnosis and lost 71 lbs.!"



Marj After Hypnosis.

"My name is Marjorie Garst. I lost a remarkable 71 lbs. in eight short months without dieting. I went from a size 20 to a size 10!

I had read the hypnosis ads. Frankly, I was skeptical. It seemed too good to be true. Now it's happened to me.

I dreaded my yearly visits to the doctor. My weight was climbing by ten or more lbs. a year. My blood pressure and cholesterol were sky high. I could barely lift myself out of a chair. Yet I couldn't stop eating. I was a career snacker.

Diets made me crave and binge. I only lost weight by starving myself.

Immediate Results. My hunger pangs disappeared after my first session. My taste for pop vanished.

One day I walked through the grocery store and marched right past the bakery, candy, chips and pop. That's when I was convinced.

Doctor' Delight! My last visit to my doctor confirmed my 71-lb. weight loss. For the first time in my life my blood work and cholesterol are normal without pills!

You don't have to suffer any more. Hypnosis worked for me, and it can work for you. Call now!"

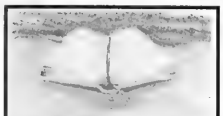
Taking pleasure in His servants' labour

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

Television has often been the target of social critics, and for good reason. In a medium that values sound and sight over substance, important issues tend to be trivialized and trivial issues tend to be exaggerated.



Rabbinic Reflections

In a Jan. 2, 1977, article in the Washington Post, Frank Mankiewicz reworked Sir Thomas Gresham's 16th century observation about economics into "Gresham's TV Law." This rules states that, "In a medium in which a 'news piece' takes a minute and an 'in-depth' piece takes two minutes, the simple will drive out the complex."

No doubt Marvin Kitman had the same idea in mind in his 1967 book, titled You Can't Judge a Book by Its Cover, when he wrote, "Pure drivel tends to drive ordinary drivel off the TV screen." What is worse, pure drivel is often repeated in re-runs and then repeated again in syndication.

Yet the repetition that is a failing of television is an asset in Torah. For example, the scriptural narrative is quite detailed when it describes the events that led up to the selection of Rebeccah as a wife for Isaac by Abraham's servant Eliezer. But the Torah then virtually repeats the same details when Eliezer recounts his actions to Rebecca's family.

To the midrash, the repetition is neither redundant nor unnecessary. It is instructive. It teaches that the conversation of the servants of the patriarchs is more precious to God than the Torah of their descendants. God cherishes the words of those who loyally fulfill their obligations and perform their mission with dedication. Therefore, God includes the words of Eliezer a second time.

Similarly, in his commentary to the Torah, Nachmanides suggests that the Torah repeats all the details regarding the items in the Tabernacle in Chapter 36 that were already described in chapters 25 to 27, because "God takes pleasure, as it were, from the labours of His servants." That the Israelites dutifully followed all of God's instructions and set themselves to the task of building the Tabernacle with enthusiasm is worthy of being repeated. This is not unnecessary repetition or editorial duplication. It is a message of praise for those who act in good faith.

The same lesson is aptly applied to Passover preparations. This Shabbat is Shabbat Hachodesh, on which we inaugurate the new month of Nisan. This means that Passover is a little more than two weeks away.

At this time of year, we find ourselves engaged again in preparations for the holiday. The labour involved is intensive and the effort substantial, and it is repeated year after year. But if there is any encouragement that we might derive from the endeavour – aside from the fulfillment of the mitzvah – it is the presumption that God takes pleasure from the labours of His servants.

Rabbi Allen is spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto.

Rabbi Pearlson to receive Negev Award

Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, founding rabbi of Temple Sinai Congregation, will be honoured by the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University at a tribute dinner on May 16.

Rabbi Pearlson

Rabbi Pearlson is a founder of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and served for a number years as national president of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University.

He is a founding member of every Canadian and international interfaith group, and is a recipient of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews National Humanitarian Award.

At the dinner, he will receive the Negev Award, Ben-Gurion University's highest distinction.

Leo Marcus, national executive vice-president of Canadian Associates of BGU, said Rabbi Pearlson has played a unique role in the absorption of Ethiopian youth in Israel.

"The largest group of these youth live in Be'er Sheva, yet when we discovered that not one of them studied at the university, Rabbi Pearlson became afraid that their fate would be to become 'drawers of water.'

"He mounted a campaign to raise money in order have these kids tutored so they could be brought to a level in which they could cope with university studies."

Proceeds from the dinner will be used to establish a Pearlson chair in internal medicine at the university.

"This will spark new medical research," Marcus said. "Findings will be used to improve medical knowledge and practice in Israel, and will be shared with Canadian medical institutions."

The event will be held at Toronto's Sheraton Centre. Guest speaker will be columnist Charles Krauthammer, a Pulitzer Prize-winner for distinguished commentary.

For more information, call Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University at 416-665-8054.

Jewish Life

Communicating with God

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Next week, we will begin reading the weekly Torah portions from the book of Leviticus. Leviticus in Hebrew is "Vayikrah," which translates as "and he called." The book begins with God calling out to Moses. The first discussion after this "calling out" contains a description of the sacrificial system instituted by God and communicated to Israel by Moses.

Normally, the books of the Torah are named after the first significant word to appear in the text. We therefore might wonder at the significance of the word "vayikrah." There must be a message to the word itself for us to designate it as the name of the book and not skip over it to the first word of significance. The midrash for Leviticus points out that the only time we see the word "vayikrah" used by God is when God is calling to Moses. In no other instance does God call out.

Certainly, we have instances of people calling to God. We have instances of people calling to each other. However, whenever we see the word "vayikrah" expressed in connection with God calling out, it is only used in connection with Moses. Yet certainly God spoke with many people before speaking with Moses, so why the difference?

According to the midrash, there is a difference in tone and power between someone speaking and someone calling out. God is speaking with most people in the Torah, but He is calling out to Moses. This is to show us Moses' unique strength. Should God call out to any of us, we would surely perish from His power. Yet Moses could withstand the call and even respond and argue when needed.

Interestingly, Leviticus begins with God calling out to Moses, but then continues instructions about sacrifice. The word for sacrifice in the text is "korban," which comes from the Hebrew word for drawing near. In other words, God is stating that when someone in Israel wants to "draw near" to God, they are to engage in the sacrificial system that facilitates the communication. It is not safe for God to call out to us and so we need another method of communication, or drawing near.

In time, prayer replaces sacrifice as the vocabulary of communication. Now when we want to "draw near" to God, we engage in prayer and when it is effective, we feel transformed and moved. We hope to see God's answers to our prayers in the world around us. We do not expect God to call out to us, for what was true in the midrash years ago is still true today: we could not withstand the call. Each individual is unique and requires a different approach.

The book of Proverbs states that we must educate each young person according to his or her individual way. It already assumes that we are all different and therefore it does not state the obvious.

"Vayikrah" invites us to recognize that God communicates with us, whether by calling out to the unique one who can bear it, or by speaking, by revelation or by event. Each communication is uniquely fashioned for its listener. Our response is to draw near.

Although prayer has replaced sacrifice, that doesn't mean we no longer learn about sacrifice. On the contrary, we must completely understand how to "draw near" so we can continue to express ourselves through prayer with the same power and impact, each according to his or her own way.

Keeping kosher at home and abroad

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at people who decided to start keeping kosher. Today, we'll nourish your kosher soul and stomach as we look for reasons behind the traditions and find out how to keep your pantry and appetite satisfied.

Rabbi Mordechai Becher's Soul Food: the Jewish Dietary Laws starts with the basics and then looks at reasons for keeping kosher, such as enhancing our self-esteem and dignity, and preserving the Jewish people as a distinct nation. [www.ohr.org.il/yhiy/article.php/993]

To learn the details of kashrut, check out Judaism 101 [www.jewfaq.org/kashrut.htm], as well as Wikipedia, the Web-based encyclopedia. [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kashrut] (As always, consult a rabbi for the final word on any halachic practice.) Steven Weintraub's "Kashrut Class Lecture" also explains different observances among Jews in such areas as the use of grape products, rennet, gelatin and fish. [www.chelm.org/jewish/kashrut/all.html/]

Speaking of fish, if you ever tire of lox, try a piece of Arctic char, mahimahi, mutton hamlet or, would you believe, porkfish? Don't worry, they're all kosher. But avoid treif lomosuckers, lamprey and ratfish. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?J22F12B77].

Most of the large kashrut supervisory bodies have excellent websites that explain the intricacies of kashrut at personal and institutional levels. The Orthodox Union (of the famed OU symbol) has an interesting article about dairy products and asks this question: Which of the following could be dairy: ices, non-dairy creamer, tuna, margarine, salad dressing and potato chips? Apparently all of them, because of milk-based components that might not be obvious from an ingredient list. [www.ou.org/kosher/] The OU also has a huge section devoted to rules and products for Passover. [www.ou.org/chagim/pesach/] If you can't find the answer to a kashrut question on OU's comprehensive site, you can e-mail the "Vebbe Rebbe." [www.ou.org/kosher/rebbe.html]

The OK Kosher Certification site has a section for manufacturers who are considering going kosher. A New York Times article suggests it makes business sense. "The greatest boon to the industry has been people seeking out kosher food for health reasons: lactose-intolerant consumers who buy pareve products… and vegans, vegetarians and people with food allergies who favour kosher foods because the industry's labelling practices are considered to be more rigorous." OK supervises 114,000 products from some 1,500 companies. [www.okkosher.com/]

Other major U.S. supervisory bodies include Kof-K [www.kof-k.com/], Triangle K [www.trianglek.org/] and Star-K. [www.star-k.org/] In Canada, two of the best-known agencies are Toronto's Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) [www.cor.ca] and Montreal's MK Vaad Haïr [www.mk.ca/]. Add to them all the other kashrut agencies around the world and a newcomer (or even a veteran) can be flummoxed by the alphabet soup of supervisory seals, emblems and symbols. To help, I recommend the World Wide Kashruth Authorities Listing, which has the names, symbols and contact information of almost every kashrut agency. [www.kosher.co.il/orgs/] There is a similar service at Kashrus Magazine's Kosher Supervision Guide. [www.kash rusmagazine.com/]

As an aside, I was struck to find that some of the major kashrut bodies maintain sections on their websites in Chinese! I don't think this reflects burgeoning Jewish communities in Beijing and Shanghai. Rather, the Orthodox Union [www.ou.org/kosher/china] Star-K [www.star-k.com/fe-welcome. htm] and others understand the growing importance of China in the global food export market. Read "China, the Sleeping Giant Awakes" by Rabbi Aharon Steinberg for what it's like to be an American mashgiach in the Far East. [www.ou.org/pdf/symbol/china.pdf]

If you decide to hit the road, you might not be too far from a kosher meal. Shamash's excellent Kosher Restaurant Database lists more than 1,800 restaurants in some 40 countries. I particularly like reading customers' comments for many of the restaurants. [http://shamash.org/kosher/]

Passover is on the way, and if you just don't see yourself shlepping out the holiday dishes yet again, and if money is no object, why not break matzah in an exotic locale? According to Kosher Today, 33,000 hotel rooms were booked last year for Passover in Europe and the United States. [www.okkosher.com/Content.asp?ID=238] Or you could choose something really different and set sail on a luxurious kosher-for-Passover cruise ship. [http://maven.co.il/search. asp?S=cruises]

After all, when you consider that this is the festival of the Exodus, what could be more appropriate than a seder at sea?

Christian professors flay Gibson's The Passion

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Mel Gibson came in for an almost biblical scourging last week at a panel discussion on his controversial movie, The Passion of the Christ.

Three professors – all non-Jewish experts on the Christian Gospels – blasted the film as historically inaccurate, scripturally untrue, perniciously anti-Semitic and deserving of little else but scorn.

In the second of a two-part discussion sponsored by Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, held at Beth Tzedec Congregation, the academics had little positive to say about the film, save for some of the flashbacks that convey Jesus' spirituality and philosophy of forgiveness.

Gibson took many liberties with the Gospels' account of the crucifixion, said New Testament expert Prof. Colleen Shantz of St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto.

Among the "most disturbing" scenes surround the crucifixion, she said, including one in which a tear falls from the heavens, ostensibly from God, which triggers an earthquake that shatters everything, including the Jewish Temple.

"That's not in the Gospel," Shantz said flatly.

She said only the Book of Matthew describes an earthquake at the moment of Jesus's death, but it is not meant to be destructive, and it certainly did not wreck the Jewish Temple, which the Romans did not level until nearly 40 years later.

"Every moment of grace [in the film] is turned into judgment," Shantz stated, "and that just feeds into the misrepresentation of the Jewish priests' participation [in the Crucifixion]."

> Film 'appeals strongly to emotion'

The film "appeals strongly to emotion. It is very strange theologically." Shantz suggested one way to blunt the film's harshness is to mock it.

"The way to deal with it is to make fun of it, ridicule it and treat it with righteous indignation. Let's start making jokes about some aspects and ignore the others."

She dismissed the movie as "lightweight."

Prof. Stephen Scharper of U of T's religion department labelled Gibson's movie "intentionally inflammatory... offensive to my [Roman Catholic] faith and to the integrity of the Jewish people."

He said the effort is "quite disparaging" of the Jewish community at the time. "Only two high priests spoke out for Jesus, and they are quickly stifled by the Sanhedrin [the temple's rabbinic council]."

As well, Pontius Pilate, whom history records as a sadistic despot, is depicted as reluctant to execute Jesus and as "thoughtful."

Gibson, an avowed member of an ultra-conservative Catholic sect, "is doing an end-run" around the advances emanating from the Second Vatican Council of 1962 to 1965, which modernized the Church and absolved Jews of the charge of deicide, Scharper said.

He added that he's been left "speechless" by the aggressive marketing of souvenirs of the film, including necklaces made of the kind of spikes that nailed Jesus to the cross.

Prof. Peter Richardson, also a U of T religion expert, cited many historical inaccuracies in the film. "It's a very bad film – completely unhistorical," he said. "There's no serious attempt at historical accuracy. It adds to and alters the scriptures."

Gibson, he said, has constructed a typical Hollywood scenario of "good guys and bad guys. It's very misleading."

For one, the film is In Aramaic and Latin, with Jesus and Pilate speaking both languages. Richardson said the language of the day was neither – it was Greek.

Richardson served as an advisor to producer Garth Drabinsky's 2003 film The Gospel of John, a word-for-word rendition of the biblical book of the same name. That movie was also accused of fanning the flames of anti-Semitism.

Richardson said the scenes in Gibson's film that have the most potential for stoking anti-Jewish sentiment are ones which show a black-hooded satanic figure that lurks mainly among Jews, and one in which kippah-wearing children morph into demons while they attack Judas, Jesus's betrayer.

Richardson said Gibson "lifted" the demonic imagery from medieval texts that were often anti-Semitic.

Walk With Israel: a very special date

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

This year's UJA Federation Walk with Israel, scheduled for Sunday, May 30, promises to show the world Jewish Toronto's unyielding support for Israel, while at the same time, helping single participants find their soul mates.

Singles who register will be given the option of a special number for the six-kilometre walk and festivities following the walk at the RioCan Festival at Ontario Place.

At Ontario Place, volunteers from J.Date will operate a booth where those interested in meeting another walk participant can mark down the number of the person that he or she would like to meet. If the feeling is mutual, and a shidduch (match) is made, the two participants will be introduced to one another.

"We're going to help promote UJA Toronto's Walk With Israel on our website, as well as encourage volunteers and participants to come out," says Gail Laguna, Vice President, MatchNet, in Los Angeles. "Our 'Giving Back' Campaign is all about helping your community, and by providing the opportunity for J.Date members to meet one another at the Walk With Israel, that's exactly what we're doing."

Organizers of the walk, chaired by Peter Ekstein and David Peltz, hope to better last year's turnout of 20,000 participants. Money raised from this year's event will go to support Israel's victims of terror and other vulnerable Israelis.

Some 20,000 people participated in last year's UJA Federation Walk With Israel.

The UJA Federation Walk With Israel - starting at Coronation Park with registration scheduled to begin at 9:30 a.m. - is the world's largest Israel solidarity walk.

For more information, call the UJA Federation Walk with Israel Hotline at 416.631.5700 or visit www.jewishtoronto.com legacy of life

Benjamin A. Himel 1904 - 1994

If Ben Himel believed in a cause, nothing could stand in his way.

"The term 'a little old man' would never describe my zaidy," says granddaughter Alison Himel, co-chair of UJA Federation's Young Adult Division. "He was small in stature, yet he had such a strong personality that he always commanded a great presence no matter where he went. He was a real character and never hesitated to tell you what he thought. Truth be told, you always knew where you stood with Ben Himel."

But what some considered obstinacy proved to be a tremendous benefit for the Jews of North America and Israel. That's because B.A., as he was affectionately known, was a devoted Zionist whose lifelong ambition was to preserve Yiddish culture for generations to come.

He was chairman of the Canadian Association for Labour Israel and a founder of Toronto's Borochov Cultural Centre that now bears his name. He established endowment funds for Yiddish at the University of Toronto, Tel Aviv University and Bar Ilan University. He was a major supporter of Bialik Hebrew Day School in Toronto, which uses Yiddish and Hebrew to teach Jewish culture, tradition and ethics. It was his idea that led to the teaching of Yiddish at Israeli elementary schools. B.A. also worked tirelessly for such organizations as UJA Federation and its Board of Jewish Education, Canadian Histadrut, and State of Israel Bonds.

And although B.A. still found the time to grow Union Felt Products into a major supplier of raw filling materials to the furniture and bedding industries, those close to him recognized that his real love was all things Yiddish. As his son Irving Himel puts it, B.A. "built the Borochov Centre twice" by almost single handedly raising the money to construct the original building downtown and then by building and expanding the current centre located uptown, which includes a school and a synagogue.

"Dad would leave the house at 6 a.m., go to the Borochov Centre to make sure everything was working, go to work, and come home again at 7p.m.," says Irving. "Then he would eat and was out the door again – going to lectures, playing cards with his many friends, or working for the community. He was so involved that my siblings Pearl and Mel and I never knew what he was campaigning for at any given time."

As Gershon Winer, former Professor of Yiddish Literature at Bar Ilan University, once said, Ben liked to joke that he earned his B.A. not in formal schooling but in the "University of Jewish Living." He was just a teenager when his brother Sam brought him over from Lugov, Poland – where their family shared a small home with Yiddishist J.B. Salsberg's family – and he worked hard as a junk collector to make ends meet. He knew little English so he joined the Independent Friendly Workers Circle to make friends.

Here B.A. met the lovely Edith Myzels and married her shortly after. With his charm, wit, determination and strong interpersonal skills, B.A. swiftly became a leader and a doer, and the community respected him for it throughout his life.

"If there was one thing I learned from Ben it was honesty," recalls Gertrude Weinberg, executive director of the Canadian Association for Labour Israel, who has worked at the uptown Borochov Centre for more than 30 years. "There were no politics with Ben – whatever he said he meant. Sometimes he made decisions without calling a meeting or discussing it with anybody, but that was because he felt so strongly about Israel and Jewish education. They were his greatest loves, aside from his family."

B.A., an avid fisherman whose cottage was on the same stretch of Lake Simcoe as those of his brother and his card-playing buddies, died in 1994 at the age of 90. But his legacy lives on. The B.A. Himel Family Foundation at UJA Federation continues to enrich Toronto's Jewish and non-Jewish communities. Thanks to B.A., youngsters are getting their first taste of Yiddish at Bialik's Ben and Edith Himel Pre-school Wing and adults can continue their Yiddish learning at the University of Toronto Yiddish Program.

His grandchildren have picked up his passion for community, too.

"I always knew zaidy was involved," says Alison, who has served on UJA's board of directors and with Women's Campaign & Advocacy. "I guess it's just in my genetic makeup."

Legacy of Life is a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to honour the memory of those who were exceptionally devoted to the community.

Thriving BJCC looks to the future with optimism

Complete recovery from a decade ago

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Ten years after the Jewish Community Centre was teetering on the financial brink, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre is not only on healthy financial footing, but is looking forward to a thriving future.

The Bathurst JCC – a fixture on Bathurst Street between Finch and Sheppard since opening its doors in 1961 – has now emerged as one of the strongest organizations of its kind in North America.

That strength, according to Bathurst JCC Executive Director Sherry Kulman, is a tribute to the strength of Toronto's Jewish community.

"The fact that we have sustained our success over the years is testament to the loyalty of our members, the support of the community, our many partnerships, the dedication of our volunteer leadership, and the excellence and hard work of our professional staff," says Kulman. "Our revenues have increased by more than 25 per cent over the last six years which has enabled us to make strategic programming and building improvements."

Shane Giddens takes advantage of some of the new work-out equipment at the Bathurst JCC.

"It was definitely a difficult situation to come into..."

In fact, in its last fiscal year alone, the Bathurst JCC spent more than $800,000 on new athletic equipment and capital improvements, including renovations to the outdoor pool and the health club and whirlpool.

Brian Yellin, director of finance for the Bathurst JCC, recalls the mood at the centre in 1994, just after he was hired as a consultant.

"It was definitely a difficult situation to come into," recalls Yellin. "But looking back, to go from a position where our financial prospects were so dim and tenuous, to a position today that has seen us achieve a break-even bottom line in each of the past seven years, is quite remarkable."

Today the Bathurst JCC hosts more than 100 programs and services that all play a role in enhancing the quality of Jewish life for individuals and families, regardless of their backgrounds or economic status. The centre welcomes 1,800 people a day, ranging in age from newborns to seniors.

"We have doubled our summer camp enrollment to just over 900 children, ensuring that all children in our community are able to have a Jewish day camp experience," says Kulman. "We have substantially increased our membership base and have succeeded in attracting significantly more young families. The breadth of our programs has also increased substantially, enhancing our ability to provide value to our members and meet the growing needs of the community."

"The combination of funding from UJA Federation, in addition to financial assistance from the United Way and the generous support of our donors, coupled with fees and program revenue, enables the Bathurst JCC to stay in the black," says Bernie Fishbein, the volunteer president of the Bathurst JCC, who is optimistic about its future.

"We have proven that we have a sustainable membership and financial base and the ability to meet the needs of a growing number of members," he says. "Over the coming years, as the plans for redevelopment come to fruition, we will continue to set an example for other communities to follow."

The Bathurst JCC will be the focus of an ambitious redevelopment project, sponsored by UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, on its current site and surrounding area. Current plans call for a state-of-the-art facility housing eight centres of excellence covering the arts, wellness, seniors' services, early childhood education, historical remembrance, recreation and celebration.

Tiana Koffler Boyman, president of The Koffler Centre of the Arts – the cultural arm of the Bathurst JCC since 1977 - looks forward to the centre's role down the road.

"Everything there now works as it should..."

"Since its inception, The Koffler Centre has grown - in partnership - with the Bathurst JCC," says Koffler Boyman. "The centre has become a preeminent cultural organization within both Toronto's Jewish community, and the community-at-large. Looking ahead, our goal continues to be to provide leading edge programs and exhibits at the Koffler Centre through our international dance gala and our concert and lecture series. The Koffler Centre will be a highlight within the new Central Campus project for decades to come."

For Bathurst JCC board member Jeff Awenus, 51, who has been with the centre since it opened, the facility has improved by leaps and bounds since going through its problems.

"I go to the Bathurst JCC every morning at 6:00 a.m. to work out, and unlike years ago, everything there now works as it should. There are no more worries that the steam won't be working, or that there's a problem with the showers," says Awenus. "The customer service has improved vastly too. There's always somebody behind the desk with a smile on their face, ready to answer your questions and help you in any way possible. It's a pleasure."

The recent Bathurst JCC Annual Purim Carnival attracted an audience of more than 800 community members.

JRCC looks back on the past 20 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Arkady and Diana Ulitsky credit Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, founder and senior rabbi of the Russian Jewish Community Centre (JRCC), with helping them taste Shabbat.

The Ulitskys, who each have their own children and have a 14-year-old daughter together, married 15 years ago. They began taking classes with Rabbi Zaltzman in 1994.

"Until then, we were completely secular," says Arkady, a scientist. "The rabbi showed us a different world. We learned that there is no contradiction between science and Torah."

The couple spoke in an interview prior to the community centre's 20th anniversary celebrations on March 30 at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts. The celebration includes a dinner, a reception and a concert featuring singer David "Dudu" Fisher, who is travelling from Israel for the event.

Ulitsky, who arrived in Canada from Kiev in 1980 – Diana came in 1976 from Odessa – says "life is much busier now, but we see the world in three dimensions.

"The rabbi did not only help change our lives, though. He is the main driving force behind the entire organization."

They measure the growth of the 40,000-member Russian Jewish community by Rabbi Zaltzman's birthday celebrations. "Each year, he invites the entire community to celebrate his birthday. We used to fit in one synagogue," Ulitsky said.

Igor Korenzvit, chair of the JRCC's board of governors who came to Toronto from Kiev with his mother and sister in 1973, says the Jews who left Russia many years ago, left for ideological reasons.

"[For the most part] they wanted to live in a capitalist country; being Jewish was not a priority for them. Although they were Jews by birth, they knew little about being Jewish," Korenzvit says.

"The objective of the JRCC is to integrate Russian Jews into the larger Jewish community, but they cannot be integrated if they do not understand about being Jewish."

Russian Jews have had no flavour of Judaism, he says. "Many have not attended a bar mitzvah, brit milah or seder, or taken part in synagogue services. They have missed everything. If we don't teach them now, we will lose them completely."

The success of the centre has been "drastic," he says. "We have had the largest group in North America attending High Holy Day services and many of our children go to Sunday school. I can see people embracing Judaism."

To celebrate 20 years is quite an accomplishment, Korenzvit says. "Sometimes organizations get tired after 20 years. We are providing more and more services. Our budget, mostly from private donations, is about $4 million. All that goes towards programming. We do a lot with our money.

"There is no substitute for doing this. Unless we teach them, they will not be Jewish."

Rabbi Zaltzman agrees.

The rabbi, who has been here since 1981 – he immigrated to New York from Russia in 1971 – was sent by the Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson to work with the Russian Jewish community.

"The Rebbe sent me here to help Russian Jews recover their Judaism, but where do you start? After 70 years, is it possible?"

Yes, he says. "The essence of Judaism is always there. A diamond can be in dirty water for centuries, but it is still a diamond. The fact that it was covered up does not change the diamond.

"Every Jew is a diamond. Every Jew has a special, Jewish soul. We have to help them get in contact with that heritage."

Looking back, he says, "I see positive results. When I arrived, we had no synagogue. Today we have eight places of worship in different areas of the city. We also have a day school, day care, Sunday school, adult education classes and a young adults program. There are also two monthly publications in Russian and English, and two calendars and program guides for the year.

When the JRCC started up, he says, they had a budget of $100,000, five to 10 per cent of which came from the Russian community. "Today two-thirds of our budget comes from the Russian community.

"Hundreds of families are involved in the Jewish pursuit of learning, and are embracing Judaism in a serious way."

He says, however, "I cannot hide from the fact that I still want more.

"The Talmud says that when a person has 100, he wants 200. When he has 200 he wants 400. That is only a negative trait if we want material things. [At the JRCC] we use it in a spiritual way. If we have brought one Jew closer to Judaism, we want two. If we've brought two, we want four."

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman

His goal, he says, is to stop intermarriage. "If there is intermarriage, there is no continuity. Despite our success rate, every year we are losing our children to intermarriage.

"Our challenge is still great. We have to bring more children to education, more youth to programs and more adults to Jewish awareness."

The JRCC needs help from the Jewish community, he says. "We need financial help, we need volunteer help. We need help on every level.

"We need to get more Russians involved Jewishly and stop assimilation. If we do not not do that now, I don't know when we'll ever get the chance."

Parents, leaders explore options in education

By STEPHANIE LEVITZ
Special to The CJN

Just as Tevye, the patriarch of Fiddler on the Roof, deliberates about his daughters' futures by weighing the possibilities – "On the other hand," he says repeatedly – so too did parents gathered for a recent meeting on options in Jewish education realize that they have many choices to consider when deciding where their children will go to school.

But the one message that came through at last week's meeting, sponsored by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE), was that for community leaders, there is no "other hand," when choosing whether to enrol a child in a Jewish educational environment.

"We do Jewish education because it is the way of the Jewish people," said Seymour Epstein, executive director of the BJE and vice-president for Jewish education of UJA Federation.

"We do it because that's the way we are. We've been teaching the western world about the transmission of values for a long, long time."

With a table of pamphlets on various schools and programs eagerly snapped up by the more than 200 parents in attendance at the meeting, it was clear that parents are hungry for the option of enrolling their children in Jewish schools.

Still, concerns ranging from the quality of that education to how to pay for it dominated the question and answer session.

Parents said they wanted their children to get the best education possible, and some questioned whether Jewish day schools were equipped to provide it and whether their own children could handle the double load of having to study both secular and Jewish topics.

"The double load is a myth," Epstein said. "Studies show that a normal, average child can handle the entire curriculum of education in a couple of years."

Parents were also concerned about teacher-student ratios and the accreditation of teachers in the Jewish school system.

Yael Seliger, director of educational services for the BJE, told parents that most Hebrew teachers are required to obtain certification within five years of starting to teach, but she conceded that it was a process that wasn't running 100 per cent smoothly.

Sill, Seliger said, several professional development days and courses are available to teachers to help them maintain the highest standards of teaching.

During the evening, a video was shown, aimed at convincing parents that giving their children a Jewish education should be their top priority.

At the Options in Education meeting.

While parents said the evening was beneficial, some would have liked the panellists to offer more specific information about different programs, schools and funding options.

"I guess we learned a few things," said Gabriel Shaffer, a 31-year-old analyst, who said he was hoping to learn more about individual programs and schools.

With some 30 Jewish day schools at the elementary level to choose from in the Greater Toronto Area, Gabriel and his wife Jennifer came to the meeting looking for some guidance for when their 18-month-old child is ready for school.

Jennifer, a 33-year-old physiotherapist, went to day school in Toronto, and her husband is a graduate of the public school system. Both were satisfied with their own educations, but said they want to enrol their child in the best possible education they can find at the most appropriate price.

"The middle-income parents really have trouble," Gabriel said. "Cost is a major factor. In the video – those parents haven't taken a vacation in years."

Few parents disagreed with the importance of the values learned through Jewish education, but many at the meeting were concerned about the price to be paid.

With tuition at day schools running thousands of dollars, the burden, many said, falls upon parents in the middle-income bracket who don't qualify for a share of the $7.8 million the BJE and UJA Federation provide for tuition assistance.

Those concerns are valid, said Sandy Brown, former chair of the BJE, but she implored parents to talk to the individual schools to try and work out funding arrangements.

Alison Epstein, whose 16-year-old stepson is at a Jewish school, said she's not enrolling her younger daughters simply because of financial constraints.

"I know that socially it will be difficult for them, because they won't be associating with Jewish kids in public schools," said Epstein, but on the other hand, she said, public schools do have a lot to offer by way of education.

Epstein said she and her husband believe in Jewish education, but they don't want to be so stressed at trying to find a way to fund that education that they can't spend time with their kids to reinforce the Jewish values they would learn at school.

"It is hard financially," agreed Marina Hayek, 29, whose children attend a Jewish day school.

"But it is important that my children also get that education, exposure to that atmosphere. I keep going back and forth on whether to leave them in or take them out, but this meeting reinforced my decision to leave them."

"It's about the Jewish community and that's important to me and my children."

For more information about Jewish schools, you can contact the BJE on the web at www.bjetoronto.com.

Anti-Israel rhetoric concerns Jewish students campus by Prof. Norman Finkelstein, author of The Holocaust Industry and a strident critic of Israel; $1,000 to fund buses to the anti-World Trade Organization demonstrations in Montreal, as well as $5,000 for legal defence needed as a result of those protests; and $10,000 to a Solidarity Fund.

A recent sample of graffiti scrawled on a wall at York University. Some students claim this is not typical of the atmosphere on campus and that when informed, the administration acts quickly to remove it. [Shawn Taub photo]

CUPE 3903 documents show that the local has also approved $1,200 to fund the legal expenses of Mostafa Henaway, a York student who took part in protests against Israel's separation barrier this past fall in the West Bank and was arrested in Qalqilyah by Israeli police.

In an e-mail sent from the West Bank to Toronto, Henaway wrote that "the action [included] about 250 people ... and a good amount of PFLP [Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine] participation as well."

The PFLP is a Marxist-Leninist group that has taken credit for many terror attacks against Israel, including the assassination of Israeli tourism minister Rechavam Ze'evi and the 1976 Entebbe hostage crisis. It has been listed as a terrorist organization by the government of Canada.

In June 2003, before leaving for the West Bank, Henaway, the former president of York's Founders College Council (FCC), was arrested and charged for allegedly embezzling $4,424 from the council during his tenure last year. The case is still before the courts and there have been no judicial findings.

CUPE 3903 has also helped fund Critical Times, a York campus newspaper that describes itself as publishing "articles and letters that assist the work of building a culture of progressive union-friendly critical political debate on campus."

The newspaper is jointly produced by CUPE 3903, the York University Faculty Association, the Graduate Students' Association, CUPE 1281 (representing Ryerson University Students' Administrative Council employees) and members of the York Federation of Students.

The February 2004 edition of the paper included an interview with Henaway in which he says that "in order to address this [Palestinian poverty], a lot of people emphasize dialogue. They figure that, if people talk to one another – Shalom-Salam [a York student group that promotes dialogue between Muslim and Jewish students]– things will get better. But occupation isn't the residue of a difference of opinion."

The October 2003 issue of the paper included lyrics from a song by Iron Sheik, a Palestinian-American hip-hop artist, in which he raps, "What did Israel do the Palestinian Nation? Forced transfer of population... humiliation, discrimination, and collective punishment or straight out assassination... It gets me so mad I just want to kill."

Jewish students say that all this anti-Israel rhetoric is making them worried about what their teaching assistants are thinking and about whether they can express themselves openly in class.

Universities are supposed to offer students the opportunity to reflect on issues and engage in honest debate, Winberg said.

"A university environment should allow students to present both sides of a very complex situation so that efforts can be made to move forward," he said.

A union official, who asked not to be named, said, "I'm sure that [local 3903]. has not supported any pro-Israel presentation on campus. They believe the Israeli government acts in an oppressive fashion which needs highlighting and don't believe there is any need to present any evidence or justification for what is being done by the Israelis."

Jewish 'neocons' tilt U.S. policy toward Israel, magazine says

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The editor of a left-wing Vancouver-based magazine is defending his own recent article that singles out prominent American neo-conservative Jews for, he says, tilting the Mideast policies of President George W. Bush toward Israel.

The March/April issue of Adbusters checked off the names of 26 Jews on a list of 50 hawkish "neocons" said to have cozy relations with the war-minded U.S. Defence Department.

The Jewish names include writers Norman Podhoretz and Irving Kristol; Deputy U.S. Defence Secretary Paul Wolfowitz; former arms negotiators Richard Perle; and academic Daniel Pipes.

They appear alongside U.S. Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Vice-President Dick Cheney and former UN ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick. But the religions of those people are not identified.

"A lot of ink has been spilled chronicling the pro-Israel leanings of American neocons and the fact that a disproportionate percentage of them are Jewish," states the article, titled "Why won't anyone say they are Jewish?"

"Some commentators are worried that these individuals – labeled 'Likudniks' for their links to Israel's right-wing Likud party – do not distinguish enough between American and Israeli interests," it goes on. "For example, whose interests were they protecting in pushing for war in Iraq?"

Adbusters, an alternative bi-monthly known for its biting anti-consumerist, anti-globalization stance, says it decided "to tackle the issue head on."

What those on the list share "is the view that the U.S. is a benevolent hyper power that must protect itself by reshaping the rest of the world into its morally superior image. And half of them are Jewish."

Kalle Lasn, the article's author and the magazine's editor, told The CJN he felt compelled to write the piece because "the mainstream and alternative media are somehow scared of talking about the Jewishness of the neocons and the Zionism there… and the influence this has on American foreign policy in the Middle East."

Other media outlets "just don't have the guts because they're afraid of this kind of vociferous backlash that I have experienced over the past few weeks."

Lasn said he's received much abusive mail and even personal threats. "I really do understand what it feels like to be targeted by people who hate you."

He said the negative responses show a "kneejerk political correctness. It's almost as if… many of them are Jews themselves. They're in some sort of denial. They really think that somehow it is wrong to have a debate about the Jewishness of the neocons who are, after all, the most powerful political/intellectual group in the world today.

"They [neocons] literally have the power to start wars and stop wars and they are the driving force behind the Bush administration's foreign policy, not just in the Middle East, but throughout the world. They're the people who make it possible for the American administration to give $3 billion a year to Israel, and many of them are connected to the Likud party.

"It's almost as though we have become so politically correct that we don't even want to discuss the obvious anymore."

Lasn said he has "an incredible amount of respect" for Jews, who, owing to the Holocaust's "deep imprint" on them, have developed a keen ability to spot dictators such as Saddam Hussein.

"In that way, Jewish influence is wonderful."

However, "if 50 per cent of the neo-cons were Arabs or Palestinian, then this war [in Iraq] would not have started."

Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, director Erwin Nest said CJC "will be considering action" against Adbusters, but declined to elaborate.

BONDS CAMPAIGN LAUNCHED: The 2004 Israel Bonds campaign was recently launched in the home of Linda Frum and Howard Sokolowski. The reception served as a formal changing of the guard, with Edward Sonshine taking over from outgoing chair Stanley Hartt. Sonshine is best known as the president and CEO of RioCan, Canada's largest real estate investment trust and retail landlord. Seen here, from left, is Warren Kimel, Israel Bonds co-chair; Barry Zagdanski, Israel Bonds co-chair; Eric Slavens, Israel Bonds president; Edward Sonshine, Israel Bonds chair; Howard Sokolowski, co-chair, Israel Bonds financing committee; George Grossman, member of Israel Bonds national executive; Eddie Weisz, co-chair, Israel Bonds financing committee.

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The owners of Levitts Kosher Foods Inc., once the largest glatt-kosher meat processor in Canada but now staving off bankruptcy, were in negotiations with at least one serious party last week in an effort to stay in business.

Michael Rich, who has no financial interest in the Montreal-based Levitts but is the owner of its Ontario distributor DSM Foods in Vaughan, Ont., said he understands the goal of the negotiations is to "bring new investment into the company."

Rich said he hopes Levitts will be back in production after Passover.

"From what I understand, no offer has yet been made to creditors, but they are in the process of putting all that together."

The 65-year-old company ceased production about a month ago.

"It was all a surprise to me. They just told us one day," Rich said.

Levitts president and one of it principal owners, Derek Patterson, did not return phone calls from The CJN.

Rich said the company, which opened a new $6.5-million plant in La Salle almost four years ago to much fanfare, was already struggling with this huge investment when it was hit hard by the U.S. ban on Canadian beef imports during the mad cow disease scare earlier this year. The strengthening Canadian dollar also had a negative impact on Levitts' bottom line.

One of the major reasons Levitts built a modern, 40,000-square-foot plant and head office was to increase its exports to the United States, as well as to Europe.

In addition to supervision by the Montreal Jewish Community Council (Vaad Ha'ir), Levitts had international kosher certification from the Baltimore-based Star-K.

Levitts is well-known for its hot dogs, salami, smoked turkey and smoked fish, but it also produced fresh beef and veal, as well as pickles.

At the time of the La Salle plant's opening in November 2000, then-president Murray Brookman said annual sales were $7 million, mainly in Quebec and Ontario, to both the retail and food-service sectors. He predicted sales would soar to $50 million in a few years, and spoke about extending Levitts' product line to include ready-to-eat items such as TV dinners, soups and hors d'oeuvres.

The Brookman family sold its interest in Levitts not long after the new plant opened, but continued to work for the company.

Anti-Jewish policy alleged at golf club

TORONTO — Businessman George Cohon was travelling last week and unavailable to comment on the widely-reported testimony of a former employee of Toronto's Rosedale Golf Club that Cohon was denied membership because he is Jewish.

Michael Geluch, who is suing the 111-year-old club for wrongful dismissal from his job as general manager, told a Toronto court that prominent members informed him in 1996 that an attempt by Cohon to join would be blocked because it would result in a wave of applications from other Jews.

Geluch testified that he attended a meeting at which some members "did not wish to have Mr. Cohon as a member because he was loud, aggressive and not a very good golfer, and should Mr. Cohon become a member, it would be opening the floodgates to allowing more Jewish members" at Rosedale.

Cohon, founder and senior chairperson of McDonald's Restaurants of Canada (and a member of The CJN's board of directors), was forced to withdraw his application in 1996 or risk being blackballed, Geluch's trial heard.

Geluch, who is suing for $475,000, said there were other victims of the club's bias, but he was not asked to provide names.

The club eventually changed its "blackball system" of processing prospective members, and Cohon's application was accepted on his second try in 1997. He became the club's first Jewish member.

Geluch is alleging he was fired in late 1997 from his $129,000-a-year job due to "personality conflicts" with three club board members including a disagreement over the Cohon membership application. He claims there were other "egocentric" issues with members.

Geluch said some members felt strongly that no Jews should be allowed into the club, which has a 12-year waiting list and whose members reflect the elite of Toronto's business and legal communities.

"There was a strong feeling that Mr. Cohon would have been the first Jewish member of Rosedale. There were other disparaging comments, too."

Geluch, 60, said he was concerned that barring Cohon from membership would harm the club's reputation.

"Ethically and morally, it was wrong," he said, adding he made his views clear on anti-Semitism.

Membership was not based on money, but "on who you were and who you knew."

The club's lawyer, Brian D. Mulroney, told the court that Geluch was fired for cause, including improper use of club money for personal expenses, abusive behaviour toward staff and inappropriate advances to a female employee.

Geluch has denied those accusations.

March 19, 1944: A fateful date for Hungarian Jews

By JUDITH WEISSENBERG COHEN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

As I write this article, memories rush at me. Some are so sharp that even 60 years cannot dull them. Did this really happen six long decades ago, when I was only 15 years old?

I see my mother's bone-weary body and worried face, asking my father: "Sándor, did we pack all the basic necessities? Will we have enough food?

My father, a defeated look in his eyes, just shrugs his shoulders. He was thinking about my three brothers who were, two years prior, conscripted into the Hungarian army's forced "labour" battalion, along with tens of thousands of other Jewish men, and we had not heard from them for quite a while.

We learned after the war that of the 50,000 Jewish men who were sent to the Ukrainian front, as "cannon fodder," 43,000 did not return, including two of my brothers Jeno and Miklos.

A few hours later we were forced to leave our home — the home where my parents had lived for 35 years and raised seven children. Reluctantly, we were "ready" for our forced "journey" to the brick factory, the first station to the deportation.

We didn't know then that in less than three weeks both my beloved parents, my nephew and sister-in-law, and all my female cousins with children would be murdered in the gas chambers of Auschwitz-Birkenau.

The Hungarian policeman entered our home, by then stripped of all our valuables, and demanded that the watches and rings that we might still possess be handed over to him, or else! Stepping outside into the yard, my beautiful, brave sister Klári, 22 years old, took off the valuable little watch she received on graduation from high school, looked squarely into the policeman's eyes, and said "here," smashing it against the wall. "Now you can have it." Surprisingly, nothing happened to her then. Little did she know that nine months later she would starve to death in the Stutthof concentration camp in Germany, along with my oldest sister Erzsébet.

Debrecen, Hungary, June 28, 1944, is etched in my memory forever. The freight rain's wheels started to move with a screech and a jolt. Bolted tightly shut by SS and Hungarian soldiers, the train carried us to an unknown destination. Our cattle car was full to the brim with people. Among them were my parents, three sisters, baby nephew Peter, his mother and many female cousins with their babies and children. We numbered 78 in the hot and airless cattle car, its tiny windows barely letting in air and light.

Within hours, the stench from the lone pail that served as toilet mixed with voices of prayers, crying, wailing and children's quiet whining. Our elders sat on the meagre belongings we brought along, with children on their laps. We, the young girls and women, stood like tightly-packed herrings in a jar. Perspiring profusely, totally stunned, we were barely able to breathe.

The foreboding atmosphere in the cattle car foreshadowed something ominous to come. On July 1st the train, with its large, pitiful cargo, arrived in Auschwitz-Birkenau, the hellhole of the world — the largest, most efficient death factory of all times.

This, of course, was the end result of a process that started in 1920 with the first "Numerus Clausus" law passed by the Hungarian parliament — followed, in 1938 by numerous anti-Jewish edicts and laws, including a Nuremberg-type racial hygiene law. Hungary became an ideological and military ally of Nazi Germany.

Six decades, laden with tears, pain and memories, have passed since March 19, 1944.

March 19 was the fateful day when Adolf Eichmann entered Budapest behind the German army occupying Hungary. His task was to round up and oversee the deportation of Hungary's Jews. The German Nazis linked arms with their Hungarian counterparts and together they ushered in the eventual annihilation of the last, large Jewish community in Europe and a refuge to thousands of Slovak and Polish Jews from Central Europe. With total cooperation of the Döme Sztojay government, and its three branches, the city police, the infamous gendarmerie, and the bureaucrats, it took less than three months to accomplish this dreadful task.

The deprivation, ghettoization and deportation of close to 450,000 Jews living in Hungary's provincial cities, towns and villages, had been completed. They were sent to labour and death camps in Nazi-occupied Austria, Poland and Germany; all done with lighting speed, efficiency and utmost brutality.

The majority of Jews in Budapest, while also suffering a great deal, especially during the brief but deadly, terror-laden reign of the Arrow Cross Party under Ferenc Szálasi, were spared the initial mass deportations.

In the camps, the Nazis murdered 75 per cent of the Hungarian Jews.

During the spring and summer of 1944, with the arrival of the Hungarian Jews, the gas chambers and crematoria worked day and night in Birkenau. Orange flames contimuously lit the skies and the air was laden with the heavy, sweetish odour of burning, human flesh.

To paraphrase Dr. Randoph Braham, Professor Emeritus, City University of New York, and renowned historian of the Hungarian Holocaust:1 The destruction of 600,000 Hungarian Jews was the third largest — and among the worst — atrocities committed in the Shoah, during the final year of the Second World War and on the eve of Allied victory.

It is our moral obligation to pass the knowledge and the torch to subsequent generations to carry remembrance and education into the future.

Judith Weissenberg Cohen is a survivor who lives in Toronto.

Reports of Post's purchase denied

WINNIPEG — The Asper family's CanWest Global Communications Corp. is dismissing reports that it is negotiating to buy the Jerusalem Post from Conrad Black's Hollinger International Inc.

The Wall Street Journal reported this month that CanWest's late founder, Israel (Izzy) Asper, made a $40 million (US) offer to Hollinger for the Post before he died last October.

But Winnipeg-based CanWest calls the report "speculative."

"Our response is that we never comment on speculation," company spokesperson Geoffrey Elliot told The CJN.

He said the Wall Street Journal reporter based her story on a conversation she'd had "with people outside the company, not CanWest."

CanWest acquired most of Hollinger's major Canadian newspapers in 2000 for $1.8 billion (US).

The Journal report noted the Asper family's strong editorial support for Israel, making them a logical buyer for the Jerusalem Post.

The Aspers have been accused of editorial interference and outright censorship of articles on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Chief executive Leonard Asper has said the newspaper chain's editorial position is "pro-Israel," but that does not mean "good, sound, opposing material" cannot appear.

Late last month, a court in Delaware blocked Black's plan to sell Hollinger holdings to Britain's Barclay Bros. The court permitted Hollinger's international bankers, Lazard LLC, to accept offers for the purchase of the company and its assets, including such marquée titles as the London-based Daily Telegraph and the Chicago Sun-Times.

Linda McQuaig's own deft sleight of hand

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week's column dealt with the media's perennial fascination with Israel. It quoted Rex Murphy's Feb. 28 Globe and Mail column, where he pointed to excessive, hyperbolic rhetoric directed against Israel as a more troublesome source of anti-Semitism than Mel Gibson's recently released controversial movie The Passion of the Christ.

The following week Toronto Star columnist Linda McQuaig proffered exactly the opposite opinion, squarely citing Gibson's unflattering depiction of Jews, rather than extreme criticism of Israel, for anti-Semitism ("Fanning flames of anti-Semitism," March 2).

"The claim that the Jews killed Christ has been the feeding ground of anti-Semitism for centuries, all the way up to the Holocaust," writes McQuaig. "Gibson, the son of a Holocaust denier, is personally familiar with this terrain ... [I]s it too much to expect him to avoid vigorously fanning the flames that's led to so much hatred and misery throughout history?"

McQuaig goes on criticize "the media" for having been soft on Gibson, ignoring a slew of negative reviews and opinion pieces, including the Globe and Mail's view that the film verged on the "pornography of violence"(editorial, "The Passion's Porn," Feb. 27).

McQuaig proceeds to attack analysts who believe that criticism of Israel incites anti-Semitism. She calls their arguments a "deft sleight of hand." But by transforming a valid concern about anti-Israel invective into a worry about any criticism of Israel at all, it is McQuaig herself who commits the manoeuvre.

She writes: "The suggestion that criticizing Israel is inherently anti-Semitic is of course being made with increasing frequency these days to silence critics of Israel, whose ranks include Jews inside and outside Israel and even Holocaust survivors."

McQuaig argues that critics who accuse journalists critical of Israel of being anti-Semitic are, in fact, attempting to silence them. Such a far-fetched accusation makes it appear that McQuaig herself is trying to censor her own critics by alleging a slander where none exists.

> She herself twists the facts when she says that Israel's occupation of 'Palestinian land' – that is the West Bank and Gaza – is 'illegal'

McQuaig chastises Gibson for distorting the facts against the Jews. But she herself twists the facts when she says that Israel's occupation of "Palestinian land" – that is the West Bank and Gaza – is "illegal."

This basic distortion underlies her disapproval of Israeli policy. The CIC has challenged McQuaig to explain her claim, but has yet to receive a reply. Since McQuaig is certainly not the only journalist to echo this distortion, it is vital to set the record straight:

In June 1967, Israel fought a war of self defence, came into possession of land, and under UN Security Council Resolution 242 (of November 1967) has been involved in a process of trading land in exchange for peace and security. That's what happened in the peace treaties with Egypt (1979) and Jordan (1994). And that's what was happening in Israel's negotiations with the Palestinians under the Oslo process until Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat walked away from the negotiating table at Camp David II.

The disputed land of the West Bank and Gaza will become "Palestinian" only through negotiations (as happened in Oslo II in 1995). This is another key point McQuaig fails to understand.

The bottom line is that Israel's presence in the territories is legal under international law, and its withdrawal is dependent upon full peace and security guarantees. McQuaig ought to do her homework and read Resolution 242. She should also consider how her own distortion of essential facts affects her understanding of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

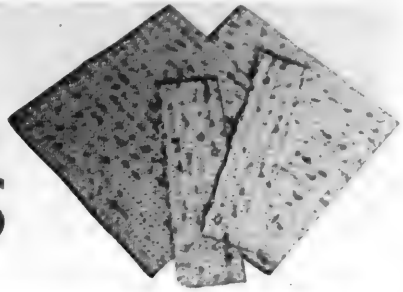
Passover Food Ideas



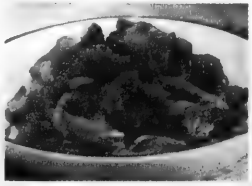
Use wine for more than drinking

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR

To most people, the words kosher wine bring to mind that sweet concoction we remember on Grandma's table as we raised our glasses to Grandpa's prayers. Times change, and 20 years ago, observant Jewish baby boomers, hipper and more sophisticated than their parents, demanded the same selection and quality found in the non-kosher world. Winemakers took notice.

"Kosher wines have exploded onto the market," noted Susie Fishbein, author of Kosher by Design (Mesorah Publications), who set off an explosion of sorts herself, selling 20,000 copies of her cookbook in the first week of publication. "There are award-winning wines from all over the world. It's no longer Malaga and blackberry syrup."

"I really felt this was a book about entertaining and celebrating, so after considering what to serve and how to present it, my next thought was what are the appropriate wines. I've been so impressed with what I've been reading recently about how kosher wines are winning awards, not just in the kosher world, but in the real world. That's how the idea came to include wines."



For wine pairing ideas Fishbein consulted Miriam Morgenstern-Laufer, a self-declared "kosher wine guru" with an advanced degree in wine, an associate publisher with Wine Spectator magazine.

"There is no difference today in quality between kosher and non-kosher wines," Morgenstern-Laufer noted. "We have great kosher wines from just about every wine-making region of the world – even Hungary, Bulgaria, South Africa, Australia – and from very renowned vineyards in the non-kosher world."

What makes a wine kosher is the use of certified kosher yeast and filtering agents, the exclusive use of equipment under rabbinical supervision and its handling by Sabbath observant Jews from the crush to the bottle. Flash pasteurization renders some kosher wine "mevushal" with no sacrifice in quality or flavour. Mevushal wines may then be handled by anyone.

Kosher By Design

"Royal Wine Company, the largest importer, distributor and owner of kosher vineyards in the world, has worked with companies to get kosher versions [of wines]," said Morgenstern-Laufer. "They work with beautiful chateaux to create separate areas to produce kosher wines. There is every reason to believe that if there's a great winery that's not kosher, they can produce a kosher wine of equal quality."

Who is buying kosher wine? Not just observant Jews, but millions of others who associate the word "kosher" with purity and higher standards. And the choices are endless. In fact, last Passover Wine Spectator ranked 23 kosher wines with an 80 or above. In addition, kosher wines are consistently winning gold medals.

Because kosher wines are virtually indistinguishable from their non-kosher counterparts, Morgenstern-Laufer said, the same rules apply to pairing wine with food. "You match the weight of the wine with the weight of the food, lighter wines with more delicate dishes and richer wines with more medium-weight dishes. You don't want the wine to overwhelm the food, and you don't want the food to overwhelm the wine.

"The challenge with Kosher by Design was that these were holiday menus, feasts really, so I chose wines to match the fest. Because the sauces were rich, I needed to pair the wines to match the richness or fruitiness in the sauces."

Pairing holiday dishes with wines that augment their flavours only heightens the experience, she added. "The food makes the wine taste better, and the wine makes the food taste better."

For our Passover menu, Morgenstern-Laufer recommends a flavourful red, such as a California Zinfandel or full-bodied Merlot, to accompany the hearty Beef Short Rib Stew.

The Purple Cabbage Salad calls for a Moscato di Asti to echo the orange flavour in this recipe. "This type of wine pairs well with spicy dishes too, " she said. "The spicier the dish, the fruitier and less dry the wine should be, so I recommended some off-dries to counter the sweetness in the sauces."

Experimenting with wines and exposing your palate to new combinations will enhance your holiday celebration, she said. "In my opinion, wine is food; wine is a journey. It's a lifelong learning process. It's all about history, geography and taste. That's why people are passionate about it. There's always something new to learn."

BEEF SHORT RIBS WITH HORSERADISH

5 lbs. beef short ribs
4 tbsp. flour, divided
1 tbsp. margarine
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 onion, sliced into thick rings
2 carrots, thickly sliced
1 rib celery, sliced
2 cups beef stock or broth (can be made from bouillon)
1 28-oz. can chopped tomatoes, if using whole canned tomatoes, drain, seed, and chop them
1 cup red wine
1 bouquet garni of 6 parsley stems, 3 sprigs fresh thyme, and 1 bay leaf
2 cloves garlic, 1 chopped and 1 minced
1 tbsp. tomato paste
6 tsp. bottled white horseradish, divided freshly ground black pepper chopped fresh parsley

Preheat the oven to 350. Dredge the short ribs in 3 tbsp. of flour. In a large pot, melt the margarine with the oil over medium-high heat. Get the oil mixture hot enough so that the meat sizzles when added. If your oil is heated to the right temperature it will sear it on contact, not burn it.

Add meat in a single layer; you will need to do this in 2-3 batches. Brown the meat well on both sides, about 6-8 minutes. Remove the meat from the pot. Reduce the heat to medium. Add the onion, carrot, and celery. Cook about 7-9 minutes, scraping up the brown bits as the onions caramelize.

Return the short ribs to the pot. Sprinkle with the remaining tablespoon of flour, stirring to coat. Add the beef stock, tomatoes, wine, bouquet garni, chopped and minced garlic, and tomato paste. Raise the heat and bring to simmer. Add 2 teasoons of the horseradish and mix in.

Cover the pot and place it in the oven. Simmer, stirring occasionally until the meat is tender, about 1¾-2 hours. Just before serving, add the remaining horseradish and season with pepper. Sprinkle with parsley for garnish. Yield: 6 servings.

PURPLE CABBAGE SALAD

Salad:
16 oz. shredded purple cabbage
⅓ cup chopped scallions
⅓ cup pine nuts (if you use them), or slivered almonds
3 carrots, julienned, or 1 (8-oz.) bag shredded carrots
1 11-oz. can mandarin oranges, reserving juice
1-2 handfuls dried cranberries (can be the sweetened kind)

Dressing:
4 tbsp. brown sugar
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
¼ tsp. salt
4 tbsp. red or white wine vinegar
1 tbsp. reserved mandarin orange juice
½ cup vegetable oil
1 vegetable or pareve chicken flavour bouillon cube, or 1 tsp. dried consomme powder garlic powder

Place the cabbage, scallions, pine nuts, carrots, oranges and cranberries into a large zip-lock bag. Set aside. In a jar or cruet, mix the brown sugar, pepper, salt, vinegar, reserved orange juice, oil, bouillon cube and garlic powder. Close and shake until thoroughly mixed. Pour over the salad. Refrigerate to let the flavours mix for at least 1 hour. Can prepare early in the day. Yield: 8-10 servings.

Author, TV host, food expert shares special recipes

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

I love serving this dish as an appetizer all on its own. Mound the onions on small bread and butter plates for utmost effect.

GRILLED ONION SALAD

4 extra large yellow onions
⅓ cup extra virgin olive oil
1 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

Preheat oven to 425. Cut onions into 1-in. thick slices, keeping the rings intact as much as possible.

Brush large rimmed baking sheet with half of olive oil. Place in oven for 5 minutes. Carefully place onion rings in single layer on hot pan. Brush tops with remaining olive oil. Sprinkle with salt. Return to oven and roast for 25 minutes. Using wide spatula, turn onions over. Roast for an additional 20 to 30 minutes or until tender and golden brown. Let cool.

Mound onion rings on small plates. Drizzle balsamic vinegar evenly over. Sprinkle with parsley. Makes 8 servings.

When not serving a meat meal, sprinkle with Parmesan cheese before sprinkling with parsley.

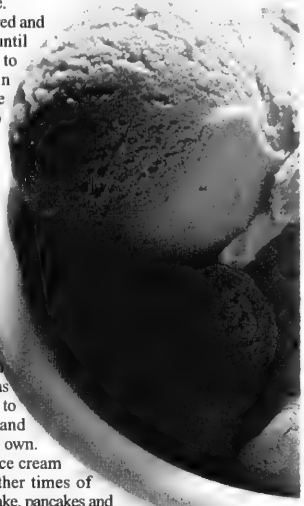
GLAZED CARROTS WITH SHALLOTS AND THYME

To make things as easy on the hostess or host as possible, have everything ready for this side dish before cooking it. Then as your guests and family are finishing up their soup or first course, this can be cooking away, without needing much babysitting.

2 lb. carrots (about 8)
½ lb. shallots
¼ cup chicken stock
2 tbsp. pareve margarine
2 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. granulated sugar
1 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme

Peel carrots and shallots. Cut carrots diagonally into coins. Cut shallots into quarters. Place carrots and shallots in large skillet. Add stock, margarine, salt and sugar; bring to a boil. Reduce heat to medium-high and boil gently, partially covered, for about 10 minutes or until carrots are tender but not yet soft. Stir in thyme.

Cook, uncovered and stirring often, until vegetables start to turn a golden colour and are very tender, 5 to 10 minutes. Serve immediately. Makes 8 servings.



SORBET WITH MIXED BERRY SAUCE

This sauce is so absolutely scrumptious, you may be tempted, as I have often been, to just sit down and consume it on its own. It's terrific over ice cream as well and at other times of year over pound cake, pancakes and waffles.

1 container fruit sorbet

Sauce:
1½ cups each frozen strawberries and raspberries, thawed
¾ cup frozen blueberries, thawed
¼ cup granulated sugar
1 tsp. grated lemon rind
1 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ tsp. kosher for Passover cinnamon
4 tsp. potato starch
½ tsp. kosher for Passover vanilla

With ice cream scoop, scoop out balls of sorbet; place on baking sheets lined with waxed paper or parchment paper. Freeze for at least 1 hour or up to 8 hours.

In saucepan, combine strawberries, raspberries, blueberries, sugar, lemon rind and juice, cinnamon, ¼ cup water and potato starch. Bring to boil over medium-high heat, stirring gently to avoid breaking up the berries. Cook for 1 minutes or until thickened. Stir in vanilla. (Sauce can be made up to 24 hours ahead. Reheat gently over low heat.) Place scoops of sorbet on dessert plates or nappies. Top with warm or room temperature berry sauce. Makes 8 servings.

Food is a family affair

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Food is a family affair for Perla Azulay and Jimmy Kadoch.

Azulay's husband Ely runs Ely's Fine Foods, and her brother Kadoch owns Kosher City Plus, both in Toronto. They learned about cooking more than 30 years ago when their parents started a grocery and catering business in Montreal.

"Before that, our father ran a grocery store in Morocco so our family has been in the food business for half a century. You can say it's in our blood," says Kadoch.

Azulay who started the Bathurst Street catering and take-out business with her husband about 10 years ago, says she developed many of the dishes they offer while her four children were growing up.

"Now, especially during Passover, I try to introduce new dishes so people can have a variety of foods. I begin planning my Passover menu by February."

She always offers Passover "staples" such as roast chicken, chopped liver and gefilte fish, but has expanded her repertoire to include such dishes as honey garlic chicken wings, grilled vegetables, Oriental fish balls, peach kugel, tzimmes souffle and a variety of Chinese dishes and salads.

"People think they are limited during Passover, but we've shown them that we can keep things interesting."

To help make things interesting for cooks, Kadoch says that among his Passover products, he carries an extensive line of premium spices such as paprika, cumin and garlic. "These spices are pure, not diluted, so when cooks use them in a recipe they can use less. These pure spices make quite a difference in a dish."

He also carries a number of specialty items including honey pecans, cashews and macadamia nuts, high-end vinegars, and a variety of sauces.

"Believe it or not," he says, "there are more cooking sauces available for Passover than there are the rest of the year."

Azulay offers the following recipes:

TZIMMES SOUFFLE

5 eggs
2 cups gated carrots (about 6 carrots)
1 cup sugar
¼ cup matzah meal
½ cup vegetable oil
1 tsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. orange juice
1 can crushed pineapple

Beat egg whites until stiff. With spatula, fold in carrots, sugar, matzah meal, then egg yolks, oil, lemon and orange juice. Add pineapple with syrup. Pour into a 9x9-inch pan, spray with nonstick cooking spray and bake for 45 minutes at 350. Makes 10-12 servings.

PEACH KUGEL

1 lb. matzah farfel
1 16-oz. can sliced peaches
7 eggs
1 cup pareve margarine melted
1 cup sugar
2 tbsp. vanilla
cinnamon powder

Put farfel in colander, pour boiling water over and let it drain. Drain peaches. Keep liquid set aside. Beat eggs, then add margarine, sugar, vanilla, farfel, peach liquid. Cut up about half of peach slices and add to mixture. Mix well. Pour mix into a greased 13x9-inch baking pan. Place remainder of peach slices on top, press down into batter, sprinkle with sugar and cinnamon. Bake for 1 hour at 350. Makes 12-15 servings.

FISH BALLS

1 lb. ground fish
1 egg
1 handful of matzah meal
½ bunch coriander
1 tsp. cumin
¼ tsp. salt
1 tsp. paprika
2 cloves chopped garlic
¼ tsp. pepper

Mix all the ingredients. Make fish balls, boil them until almost ready and transfer to the sauce.

Sauce
1 can tomato sauce
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
3 cloves garlic
1 tsp. cumin
1 cup water
¼ cup oil
½ bunch coriander
1 tbsp. paprika

Mix everything and bring to a boil. Add fish balls. Cook on low for about 40 minutes. Serves 6.

Fundraising cookbook has great ideas

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Andrea Ruth set out to raise funds for the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation she did what she does best – she began cooking.

Ruth, a Thornhill mother whose son Matthew, 14, attended Ventura Park Public School, published a cookbook, The Ventura Park Public School's Divine Dessert Cookbook, to raise funds and to show her "respect and affection" for Randy Shapiro, a French teacher at the school who is struggling with breast cancer.

After raising almost $6,000 with the book, Ruth has embarked on a new venture – Your Favourite Passover Cookbook, a compilation of all her favourite Passover recipes.

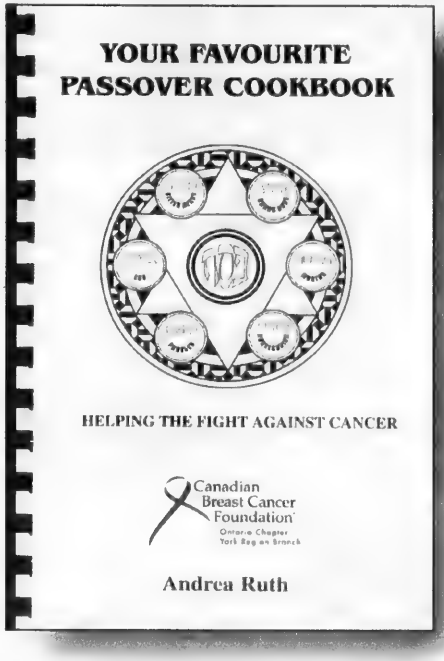
A paralegal by profession, Ruth said she wrote the new book in order to let Shapiro – she was Matthew's teacher for two years – know that "she has made a difference, and that people are thinking about her.

"She has given the great gift of fun and enthusiasm for learning to our children," Ruth said.

"I don't have a culinary background but I cook and cook and cook," she said. "I love to cook because I love to eat."

The book is available for $18 in Thornhill at Sobey's, 441 Clark Ave. and John's No Frills, Centre Street west of Bathurst. All proceeds will go The Breast Cancer Foundation, York Region.

Ruth offers a selection of recipes from the book:



MOCK GEFILTE FISH

1½ lb. ground chicken
1 carrot
1 small onion
½ cup sugar
2 eggs
¼ cup matzah meal
salt and pepper to taste

Water for Cooking:
3 litres (12 cups) water
1 large carrot
1 small onion
1 stalk celery
salt and pepper to taste

Process onion and carrot until finely chopped. Combine with other ingredients and process for five seconds more. Form into oval, egg sized patties.

Bring water, vegetables, salt and pepper mixture to a boil. Place chicken patties in boiling water mixture. Reduce heat and simmer, partially covered, for one hour. Remove from liquid to maintain firm texture and refrigerate until serving. Slice carrot from water and use to garnish when serving.

POTATO SOUP

4 potatoes, peeled and cubed
1 onion, diced
2 cloves garlic, minced
6 cups vegetable stock or bouillon
1 tbsp. margarine
1 bay leaf
½ tsp. basil
salt and white pepper to taste
⅛ cup white wine
1 cup whole milk

In a large pot over medium heat, melt margarine. Add onion and garlic and cook for 4 minutes, stirring constantly. Pour in stock. Add potatoes, bay leaf, basil, salt and pepper. Simmer for 25 minutes, stirring occasionally. Stir in wine and cook 3 minutes more. Remove bay leaf. Pour mixture into a food processor and puree. Return to pot, heat again to a simmer and add milk.

CHICKEN CACCIATORE

1 chicken cut into 10 pieces
¼ cup oil
¼ cup cake meal
1 onion, diced
8 mushrooms, sliced
¾ cup chopped carrots
1 green pepper, seeded and diced
3 tbsp. garlic, minced
1 can tomatoes
1 can tomato sauce
½ cup kiddush wine
1 tsp. each, oregano, basil and pepper

Place cake meal in a large zip lock bag. Place chicken pieces in bag and shake around to coat on all sides. Heat oil in a large saucepan. Place chicken in pan and brown on all sides.

Remove chicken and set aside. To pan, add onion, mushrooms, carrot, green pepper and garlic and sauté for 8 minutes. Stir in tomatoes and sauce. Add wine, seasoning and chicken. Simmer covered for 30 minutes.

SERIOUSLY BEST EVER BROWNIES

1 cup margarine
1 cup cocoa powder
2 cups brown sugar, firmly packed
4 eggs, well beaten
6 tbsp. cake meal
¼ cup almonds, chopped and toasted
¼ cup chocolate chips

Melt margarine in a medium sized saucepan. Remove from heat and whisk in cocoa powder. Stir in brown sugar and eggs and mix well. Add cake meal, almonds and chocolate chips.

Line an 8-in. square pyrex or cake pan with parchment paper. Spoon batter into pan and spread evenly. Bake at 325 for 30-35 minutes or until tests done. Do not overbake or brownies will be dry.

Remove from pan and peel off parchment paper. Allow to cool completely before frosting.

Icing:

6 tbsp. margarine
6 tbsp. cocoa powder
1½ cups icing sugar
2-3 tbsp. non-dairy creamer
1 tsp. vanilla

Melt margarine and pour into a small bowl. Add cocoa powder, vanilla and icing sugar, and beat until smooth. Pour in creamer a tablespoon at a time until mixture is frosting consistency.

APPLE CRISP: Always a delight with a side of pure vanilla ice cream.

Passover Food Ideas

Sephardi charoset a rich, exotic taste

By LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

The first time I tasted Sephardi charoset, I knew I was far from my Atlanta home. Unlike the pale Ashkenazi chopped apple and nut mixture from my family's seder, this combination was deep mahogany and thick with dried fruits softened under a mysterious blend of spices.

When I asked the host of this large Portland family seder what was in the charoset, she said lots and lots of raisins and dates. It was spread on piece after piece of hard, dry matzah, and I was grateful for its smooth, rich texture and sweet, lingering taste.

Charoset, one of the elements of the Passover seder plate, is prepared with various combinations of fruits and nuts, depending on family background. During the seder, it is eaten with bitter herbs, such as fresh horseradish, and with matzah, to symbolize the mortar Jewish slaves made for laying bricks in Egypt.

But to me, preparing fruits, juicy and sweet, warmed and softened, is the only way to balance the long Passover days without soft bread.

According to Michael Strassfeld in The Jewish Holidays A Guide & Commentary, Passover matzah, whose only ingredients are flour and water, is lacking in sensory pleasure by design. Its flat, course texture is intended to remind us of the Israelites fleeing Egypt, in the middle of the night, with no time to let dough rise. Rootless and troubled, they wandered through a hot, dry desert with their unleavened bread or matzah, bravely searching for 40 years for their new home.

Wisely, in addition to honouring the long and difficult trials of Jewish liberation, Passover, by design, falls in the spring. This, Strassfeld says, is to remind us that every year, the bright, blossoming days of spring follow the dark days of winter.

Eight years after pulling up roots from my Atlanta home, I remain uncertain as to where my new home will be. Recently when I called my mother on one of my challenging days, weighed down by the financial and emotional price of my long journey, she said through my tears, "There will always be new beginnings."

So the next day, when I prepared my charoset, toasting sesame seeds, pecans, and walnuts before warming soft dates, raisins and figs in a fruit sauce of aromatic spices, I embraced the far-away scent. I looked out my small Los Angeles kitchen window, and instead of seeing the white stucco walls of the building next door, I imagined the deep, brave footprints of a people wandering through a sprawling, lonely desert, their triumphant passage through the last shadowed sand dune, and finally the joy at waking one morning, under a pale yellow sun trickling through the shade of an oasis blooming with fruit trees.

Maybe that is why, throughout the long days of Passover, I can't get enough of the rich, exotic taste of Sephardi charoset spread on piece after piece of matzah, or the feeling that without leaving home, I would never have discovered this flavour, and that without the base of hard, dry matzah, the softened, spreadable fruits would not taste nearly as good.

SEPHARDI CHAROSET

The cardamom-infused flavours of this wonderful fruit mixture only intensify with time, so feel free to make this a day or two ahead of the seder.

¼ cup sesame seeds
½ cup pecans, chopped
½ cup walnuts, chopped
1½ cups medjool dates, chopped small ½ cup calmyrna figs, chopped small

1 cup raisins
2 tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ tsp. ground cloves
¼ tsp. ground ginger
¼ tsp. ground cardamom
⅛ tsp. salt (or to taste)
1 tsp. lemon juice
1cup orange juice
¼ to 1½ cups water

In heavy saucepan, toast sesame seeds, walnuts and pecans over medium-low heat, stirring constantly, until lightly toasted and aromatic, approximately 2-3 minutes. (Nuts burn quickly, so you must stay with it.) Add dates, figs, raisins, spices, lemon juice, orange juice, ¾ cup of water, and mix well. Bring to a boil, then turn heat to low, cover and simmer for 5 minutes. Remove top and simmer uncovered, stirring every few minutes, adding water ⅛ cup at a time as needed, until fruits soften into preserve texture, approximately 10 to 15 minutes. Cool and refrigerate covered. Makes 4 cups.

Serving Suggestions: After the seder, Sephardi charoset makes a healthy and satisfying breakfast or snack spread. After Passover, I love it as a spread on quick breads, such as date, nut or pumpkin.

BETTY GOODFRIEND'S TURKEY TZIMMES

Like stew, tzimmes tastes better a day or two after it is made, so this is a good dish to prepare ahead of time. Goodfriend said since this recipe makes a large quantity, she usually freezes half or uses one-half for each of the two seder meals.

4 medium white potatoes
2 lb. sweet potatoes, approximately two large
3 lb. baby carrots, peeled
1 lb. large, moist prunes, pitted
1½ lb. turkey thigh, with skin and bone
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ cup honey
5-6 cups of water
1 tbsp. salt (or to taste)
½ cup dark brown sugar

Peel and cut white potatoes into ¼-inch slices and layer on bottom of large Dutch oven, to prevent them from burning. Peel and cut sweet potatoes into chunks, approximately 8 pieces per potato. (Hint: Cut in half, half again, then quarter each half.) Rinse baby carrots and prunes in cold water. In large bowl, combine carrots, sweet potatoes, and prunes. Put one-half of carrot mixture over white potatoes. Add turkey thighs, skin side up. Cover with remaining carrot mixture. Sprinkle cinnamon then pour honey over top carrot layer. Mix salt and brown sugar in two cups of water and pour over vegetables.

Add remaining water until liquid is approximately 2-3 inches below top of carrot mixture.

Preheat oven to 325.

On stovetop, bring vegetable and turkey layers to a boil then simmer covered for 20 minutes. Taste for seasonings and add more honey, salt, or brown sugar to taste.

Place uncovered in oven for 3 to 4 hours, checking every 30 minutes to add water if needed, making sure meat stays in liquid. If sauce is watery, add a tbsp. of potato starch mixed with ½ cup of water in last half hour. When finished cooking, vegetables should be tender and moist and turkey cooked in a thick, reduced sauce. Remove bones and skin and cut meat into generous bite-size pieces and mix back into vegetables. Serve warm, or refrigerate and reheat covered, in 325-degree oven, for about one hour or until warm. Makes 12-14 servings.

Jewish, Arab children's art display warmly received at York U

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Although York University has been plagued by tensions between pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian students in the past few years, a recent campus art display with Jewish and Arab components was received warmly by all who saw it, organizers say.

"The Art & Soul of Peace Through Humor," which was displayed in the high-traffic York Lanes indoor mall on Feb. 26, was created by Jewish and Arab children in Israel between 1995 and 1998.

According to Lance Davis, director of National Jewish Campus Life – a Toronto-based national resource for Jewish campus groups – 3,000 to 4,000 people a day pass through York Lanes, "and, I would say, one out of 10 people stop.

"Our message is that Hillel is committed to peace. We want people to be uplifted."

The stop at York followed similar displays, first at three American campuses and then, starting this January, at McGill, Concordia, Waterloo and Wilfrid Laurier Universities. After the York event, the display was scheduled to go to the University of Toronto, Ryerson University, McMaster University and the University of Western Ontario, then to the London Jewish Community Centre on Mar. 16. It will be at Toronto's Koffler Gallery for April and May.

The teacher who devised and executed the project – Maureen Kushner, a gregarious New Yorker in her 50s – was on hand at York to talk about the 26 paintings on display and how they came about.

In 1995, Israel's Ministry of Education commissioned Kushner to go into 36 Jewish and Arab schools to teach about peace.

It's not common for a Jewish teacher to go into Arab schools, confirmed Kushner, who has a working knowledge of Hebrew and Arabic. But humour "lightens everything," she said. "You try to create a fun-loving atmosphere, even if you're dealing with difficult subjects."

When young Arab children asked, "Are you a Jew?" she created rapport with a big smile, friendly tone of voice, and the enthusiastic reply, "Yeah! Are you Arab?"

Kushner, who divides her time between Israel and the United States, continued to travel to Arab schools, even after the onset of the intifadah, for a more recent art-based project. Although sometimes Arab villagers question why a particular school is bringing in a Jewish teacher, that "doesn't happen within the school if the principal is positive."

She mentioned one principal in particular, a "Muslim from a long line of honourable people" who is "in love with peace" and insisted that she come to his school. The problem now, she said, is that there is increased opposition to "anything to do with coexistence."

Usually she would start a lesson by asking the children to think of words pertaining to peace, and to war. One of the lessons that ensued had to do with the similarities between Hebrew and Arabic words, a theme that cropped up repeatedly in the artwork.

One painting, titled Friendship, depicts weapons dancing together "because they never have to be used again," said Kushner. The four artists, ranging in age from seven to 11, include Jewish and Arab children.

A work by four 11-year-old Arab children whose school is located near the Lebanese border, is called Peace Bus. One of the children, recalled Kushner, came up with the idea of creating a bus to "go to all the countries in the Middle East and bring all the children to Israel for a big picnic."

Reaction on North American campuses, including that of Arab and Muslim students, has been "so positive," said Kushner. "Not once for one second has it gotten political."

Jewish students to rally against anti-Semitism at York

York University's Jewish students are calling on the community to join them outside Vari Hall on March 18 at 2 p.m. for a Jewish unity rally and a day of solidarity, pride and celebration.

"The classical themes and rhetoric of anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism and racism are becoming socially acceptable on campus as in the wider community," said president of Hillel@York Jordie Saperia in a press release.

"While we recognize that the university is deeply committed to fostering multiculturalism and has a zero-tolerance stance toward any form of bigotry, we cannot ignore the basic reality that the tone of our campus is changing," Saperia said.

"Our history and traditions have taught us that the struggle against racism, anti-Semitism and oppression belongs to us all," said Michael Ferman, who is vice-president of Hillel@York, in the press release.

For more information, call Hillel@York director Talia Klein at 416-736-5179 or 416-910-9032 (e-mail: talia@hilleltoronto.org), or Saperia at 416-419-6096.

Administrative Assistant

A progressive Jewish women's membership organization seeks an experienced Administrative Assistant to provide support to the Executive Director and to ensure efficient administrative functions of the office.

The ideal candidate will have excellent verbal and written communication skills, a multitasker and be able to work under pressure.

The Administrative Assistant will assist with the coordination and preparation of materials for fund raising and social events and event logistics in order to insure efficient and effective communication on projects and any issues that need follow through.

Qualifications include excellent computer skills: Microsoft office at a proficient level, Excel, PowerPoint, navigating the internet and research. Shorthand is an asset but not necessary. She should have at least five years related experience. Knowledge of the Jewish Community an asset.

Panel concludes security at port was insufficient

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A committee appointed by Transportation Minister Avigdor Lieberman to investigate security at the port of Ashdod concluded Monday that the level of security there is insufficient to counter the threat of an attack on the strategic target.

The committee, appointed on Sunday following a double suicide attack that killed 10 people, recommended increasing security at the port by using sniffer dogs and installing an electronic fence.

The Israel Defence Forces (IDF) confirmed Monday that air force helicopters carried out strikes against targets in Gaza City late Sunday night.

The army said two buildings, which had been used by Hamas to manufacture arms, Qassam rockets and mortar shells, were targeted. The buildings were located in the Zeitun and Nasser neighbourhoods of the city.

A military source said Monday that Israel plans to resume strikes on Palestinian militant leaders in response to the double suicide bombing.

> 'Authorities believe Hamas may have hoped to see a toxic cloud hanging over Ashdod'

Authorities believe Hamas may have hoped to see a toxic cloud hanging over the Israeli city of Ashdod – which would have represented a new, higher level of terrorism for the anti-Israel group.

Israeli sources said the bombers, carrying sophisticated plastic explosives, were headed for the port's tankers of ammonium and bromine. If ignited, the chemicals would have thrown up a lethal cloud over Ashdod one mile in radius.

But the first bomber, who had worked nearby as a construction worker, apparently got cold feet. "He stopped to ask for a glass of water, and one of the guys recognized him as a local labourer. As he was led away, he blew up," a stevedore told reporters. Seconds after the first explosion, which tore apart a warehouse holding heavy machinery, the bomber's partner detonated himself outside the port gate.

The bombs the terrorists used were considered more powerful than those used in previous suicide bombings, said Israel's southern region police chief, Moshe Karadi.

The double blast, which threw body parts and mangled metal into the air, sent shock waves through the coastal town, which has been largely untouched by more than three years of intifadah despite its proximity to Gaza.

Indeed, authorities thought the blasts were labour accidents until they discovered two distinct bomb sites and assessed the situation.

The bombers, both of whom died in the attacks, were identified as 18-year-olds from the Jabalya refugee camp in the Gaza Strip.

Although the country was spared a chemical cataclysm, Sunday's double suicide bombing at Israel's second-largest port devastated scores of families, killing at least 10 people. The attack wounded at least 16, and raised alarm in the Israeli government.

The two teenage bombers came from the Gaza Strip, and their attack was the first successful terrorist strike launched by Palestinian infiltrators from the fenced-in area during the current intifadah. The bombers broke through tight Israeli security.

"This shows that resistance will continue until the enemy leaves all of occupied Palestinian land," said Yassin, whose group has sworn to destroy the Jewish state.

The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, the terrorist wing of Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement, claimed joint responsibility with Hamas for the attacks.

Meanwhile, the Palestinian Authority, whose prime minister, Ahmed Qureia, was slated to meet on Tuesday this week for the first time with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, issued its customary condemnation of the attack. Israel nevertheless called off the planned summit.

"We are not looking for a photo opportunity," said Sharon spokesperson, Ra'anan Gissin. "We want a real undertaking from the Palestinians to crack down on terrorism."

The only other terrorist attack in Israel to have come from Gaza during the current intifadah was a suicide bombing in April 2003, when two Britons of Pakistani descent attacked Mike's Place, a Tel Aviv nightclub.

Those terrorists, posing as tourists who had travelled through Gaza, used the same plastic explosives as this Sunday's bombers, Israeli security sources said.

Hezbollah is the main suspect as the supplier of the rare explosives, probably through tunnels linking the southern Gaza city of Rafah to nearby Egypt.

"This was meant to be a strategic, mega-terror strike. Now we have to review our own strategy," a Jerusalem official said, referring to efforts to discover how the two Palestinians got through the Gaza security fence.

IDF officials believe the terrorists got to Ashdod from Gaza. They are also considering the possibility that the pair burrowed into Egypt through underground tunnels from Rafah in the southern Gaza Strip, then snuck into Israel's Negev Desert in a border area that is not secured by a fence. "They found a weak point and they exploited it," Israeli cabinet minister Yosef Paritzky said. "A port, by nature, is a very busy place," he said. "There are many people coming and going. It is impossible to seal the entire country hermetically."

The investigation into this bombing could have ramifications for the security barrier Israel is building in the West Bank to keep out terrorist infiltrators. Palestinians, who say the fence is a land grab, say such an effort is futile.

Amid the investigation after Sunday's bombings, a Jerusalem official said, "What we learn from this incident will have to be implemented everywhere in the territories – and fast."

U.S. supports PM's disengagement plan

By ALUF BENN and MAZAL MUALEM
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The U.S. government, which believes Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan poses risks, but has "historic potential," has decided to support the proposal.

Top-level consultations last week with U.S. President George W. Bush culminated in the decision to support Sharon's plan as much as possible, pending clarification of details with Israeli officials.

The U.S. administration believes it is important that any pullout from the Gaza Strip, and also perhaps from parts of the West Bank, not be perceived as a concession to terror.

On a recent visit to Israel, U.S. envoys Steve Hadley, Elliott Abrams and William Burns said an Israeli withdrawal should implement "Bush's vision" and the vision of the road map peace plan, which calls for the establishment of a Palestinian state.

The envoys also said Washington views the disengagement proposal as an Israeli plan, and that Bush will not dictate details regarding the scope of the pullout or the settlements to be evacuated. Instead, the envoys said, Washington will decide how to respond based on the policies Israel puts into action. The nature of American support will be determined when Sharon and Bush meet March 31 or April 1.

The Bush administration wants to add to the ceremony of Sharon's upcoming visit. One of the possibilities being considered is inviting him to the presidential retreat at Camp David.

Meanwhile, Sharon's bureau chief, Dov Weisglass, leaves for Washington at the start of next week for another round of preparatory talks with U.S. officials. Weisglass and U.S. officials will work on drafts of a statement to be issued at the end of Sharon's visit, which will outline the details of U.S. assistance in exchange for Israeli withdrawal.

The three U.S. envoys met in Israel with Sharon, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The meetings focused on whether an Israeli pullout from the Gaza Strip is to be supplemented by dismantling settlements on the West Bank.

Sharon was originally inclined toward a relatively large-scale withdrawal from West Bank settlements, but in the face of strong opposition from Likud colleagues, he is now considering a withdrawal from the Gaza Strip alone.

Sharon decided Sunday to postpone a meeting scheduled with Likud ministers about the disengagement plan. Sources said the postponement reflects Sharon's concern about mounting opposition in the Likud to disengagement.

Of 13 Likud ministers in the government, three (other than Sharon) are certain supporters of the plan: Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, Minister of Industry and Trade Ehud Olmert and Minister Gideon Ezra. The Likud ministers known to oppose the plan are Uzi Landau, Yisrael Katz and Tzachi Hanegbi.

Netanyahu met with the envoys at Sharon's request, and told them the Gaza Strip must not become a base for Hamas or Al Qaeda terror groups and asked the envoys about security and diplomatic guarantees. The envoys said Bush has devised a policy of beating terror and not surrendering to it, a rule that applies to the Gaza Strip just as it applies to every part of the world.

The envoys wondered whether an Israeli withdrawal would calm events on the ground, comparing a pullout with the Israel Defence Forces withdrawal from Lebanon in 2000. Netanyahu objected to the comparison, saying that conditions are different in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

After their meeting, Netanyahu released a statement saying "the [disengagement] plan which is being considered is complex and problematic."

The statement said the nature and scope of guarantees and assistance to be provided by the U.S. remain unclear.

Meeting with American officials last Thursday, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz emphasized the differences that separate the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. The security model to be followed regarding Gaza is simple, since the region is surrounded by a fence, Mofaz said. On the West Bank, events are more complicated, Mofaz said, and the timetable must be different, due to the need to complete the separation fence.

Most Israelis support the fence: poll

By EPHRAIM YAAR and TAMAR HERMANN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli-Jewish public overwhelmingly supports the construction of the separation fence, despite the internal debate and international pressure against it, a recent poll shows.

Support for the fence is based on the assessment that it can significantly reduce terror attacks, though only a small minority believe it can prevent them completely, the Peace Index survey conducted March 1 to 3 indicates.

In other findings, the survey shows a majority also believe the route of the fence should be determined according to the government's security considerations and not necessarily follow the Green Line, even if the route causes suffering to the Palestinian population.

The assumption is that in deliberating the case of the fence, the International Court of Justice at The Hague is biased in favour of the Arab side. Nevertheless, the public is still divided on the question of whether or not Israel should have appeared before the court.

Along with support for the separation fence, a large majority support the right of citizens who oppose the fence or its route to express their protest, as long as they use legal means. However, there is unanimous opposition to protest by illegal means.

In the present situation in which the negotiations with the Palestinians are not being renewed, the unilateral separation plan is widely supported and the majority view it as preferable – because of its immediacy – to the alternative of waiting to achieve a peace agreement with the Palestinians.

In the context of a unilateral separation, a majority support the evacuation of all the settlements in Gaza and of the small, isolated settlements in the West Bank, but only a minority support the evacuation of all the West Bank settlements.

Most of those polled also approved of the targeted-assassination policy, even though it involves harming innocent Palestinians, because of the general belief that the assassinations reduce terror that kills innocent Israelis.

Despite the domestic and foreign criticism of the separation fence, the Israeli-Jewish public almost unanimously (84 per cent) supports it (13 per cent oppose it and three per cent do not know). Although only 16.5 per cent think the fence and the other physical means of partition can completely prevent terror attacks, 70 per cent believe these can significantly reduce the number of attacks. Support for the fence crosses all political parties.

About two-thirds of the Jewish public believe the route of the fence should be determined according to government security considerations, and only a 20 per cent minority favour the idea that it should run along the Green Line.

The public's adamance on the fence is combined with a low level of consideration for the suffering caused to the Palestinian population, such as harm to its ability to cultivate lands and difficulties in moving from place to place within West Bank territory. Only 31 per cent believe this suffering should be taken into account in determining the route of the fence, compared to 64 per cent who see it as a secondary if not negligible consideration.

But despite the overwhelming support for the fence, a majority (71 per cent) support the right of people who oppose the fence or the chosen route to express their protest, as long as that protest takes a legal form (26 per cent oppose even legal protest and four percent do not know). A full 92 per cent oppose illegal protest (six per cent also support illegal protest and two percent do not know).

A majority support the evacuation of all the settlements in Gaza and of the small, isolated settlements in the West Bank

This finding corroborates earlier findings of Peace Index surveys that the Israeli-Jewish public has a strongly legalistic worldview. Protest is acceptable, but only if done in ways permitted by the law. The moment it involves deviation from the law – whatever the content of the protest – public opposition is overwhelming.

On the question of whether Israel behaved properly in deciding not to attend the deliberations of the International Court of Justice at The Hague on the issue of the legality of the fence, the Jewish public is currently divided. Despite the prevalent view – 69 per cent – that the court will be biased toward the Arab position (a similar assessment was found last month), only 53 per cent think the Israeli government acted properly in not attending, whereas 42 per cent believe it would have been right to attend.

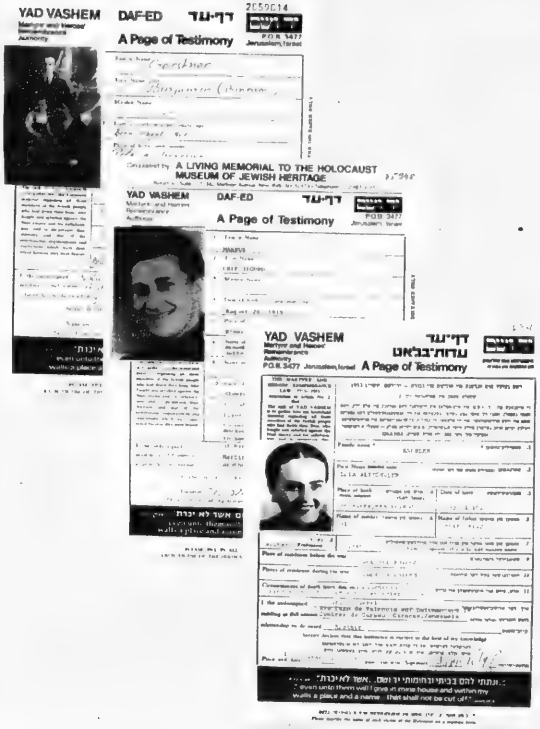
The current policy on the issue of a unilateral separation is also favoured by a majority of the Jewish public, 62 per cent supporting it with only 28 per cent opposed.

At the same time, it is worth recalling that a constant, considerable majority – this month, 63 per cent – want to renew negotiations with the Palestinian Authority.

As for the steps involved in a unilateral withdrawal, 60 per cent support evacuating the Gaza settlements, 32 per cent oppose it, and the rest have no clear opinion (last December the Peace Index found an even larger majority – 80 per cent – supported the evacuation of these settlements in the framework of a peace agreement).

The Peace Index project is conducted at the Tami Steinmetz Center for Peace Research of Tel Aviv University, headed by Prof. Ephraim Yaar and Dr. Tamar Hermann.

"UNTO EVERY PERSON . . . A NAME"



Since 1955, Yad Vashem has been collecting names, photographs and biographic details of the martyred Jews. Millions are already commemorated on special documents (Pages of Testimony) stored in Yad Vashem, Jerusalem, but many more are still unknown.

Yad Vashem has recently launched a concerted campaign to record names of Holocaust victims. We urge you to assist us so that a lasting testimony will be preserved for future generations.

The entire Pages of Testimony database, contained in the Hall of Names at Yad Vashem, will be available on the Internet over the coming months.

The project will provide worldwide access to the database, allowing people to discover whether lost relatives are commemorated in the Hall of Names and enable new Pages of Testimony to be added.

Egypt to send delegation

Egypt will send two members of parliament to a special Knesset session set for March 23 to mark 25 years since the signing of the peace deal between Israel and Egypt. Ahmad Fathi Sorour, the speaker of the Egyptian parliament, wrote to his Knesset counterpart, Reuven Rivlin, saying that Dr. M. al-Faki, chairman of the Egyptian parliament's foreign affairs committee, and his deputy, Mohammed Bassiouni (who once served as Ambassador to Israel), will attend the event.

Columbia families to visit

The families of the astronauts killed last year in the Columbia space shuttle disaster will visit Israel next week. They will meet top Israeli leaders, including President Moshe Katsav and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, and will also will visit sites connected to Ilan Ramon, the Israeli astronaut killed in the disaster. They will also plant trees in a Jewish National Fund forest in honour of the seven astronauts.

Israel offers assistance

Spain said last Friday it did not need the help of Israeli forensic experts to identify the victims of last week's bombings in Madrid that killed at least 198 people and wounded some 1,430 others. Jerusalem mayor Uri Lupolianski had also offered to his Madrid counterpart to send grief counsellors to the Spanish capital. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom both extended Israel's condolences to the Spanish government and people.

Gazan workers prevent attack

Palestinian workers waiting at the Erez crossing to enter Israel from Gaza beat and overpowered two Palestinians planning to carry out a terror attack at the site a few days after the suicide attack there on Jan. 14, an inquiry conducted recently by the Defence Ministry has revealed. It is unclear what happened to the two youths.

Jordan may support plan

Jordan may help Israel to leave Gaza and parts of the West Bank. "If this is done in the context of the 'road map' [peace plan] if this is done in co-ordination with the Palestinians, then this might present an opportunity," Jordanian Foreign Minister Marwan Muasher said after discussing the Israeli plan with U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell.

German-Israeli co-operation

Germany and Israel signed up for a multi-million-dollar bio-tech research program. The new Bio-Disc program was announced last week during Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's visit to Berlin. Olmert and Germany's minister for education and research, Edelgard Bulmahn, signed a deal for joint bio-tech projects to receive about $65 million (US) over the next five years. The Bio-Disc program is designed to improve the transfer of basic research into application. Germany and Israel each will contribute to the fund, as will private companies.

Jewish summer camp opens its doors in Israel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

It is difficult to imagine a place more beautiful than the Mevo'ot Yam beach village of Michmoret just minutes from Caesarea, where Israel's first overnight camp will welcome its inaugural round of campers this summer.

Camp Kimama, sandwiched between a secluded section of beach on the Mediterranean seashore and the lush greenery of the Alexander River nature reserve, is open to Jewish campers around the world aged eight to 18. It offers the same activities as Canadian overnight camps, including arts and crafts, cooking, horseback riding, swimming, nature hiking, boating, drama, dance and music lessons.

But Camp Kimama also offers scuba diving and underwater archeology; access to the on-site Sea and Environment Center, where resident veterinarians rescue and raise threatened populations of saltwater fish and sea turtles; hikes along the cross-Israel hiking trail that runs parallel to the Alexander River; visits to the nearby Center for Environmentally Friendly Aquatic Farming; a specialized curriculum on Jewish identity, social action and Israeli culture; and a high school-accredited community connection program, which will place campers in facilities such as the Bayit B'Kfar Senior's Home, the Kfar Yona shelter and the Hillel Yaffe Hospital.

"There are not many places like this in Israel. It's green, just like a camp in Canada," says Mike Dacks, Camp Kimama's assistant director. "It's a pearl in this country."

Dacks, a law student at the Inter-Disciplinary Center in Herzliya who came to Israel in 2001, brings more than 11 years of Canadian camp experience to Kimama.

"Nowhere is camp culture as developed as it is in North America. Jewish camping in Canada is a very deep tradition and we are taking it to an entirely new level here in Israel," says Dacks. "We want to give Canadian Jewish campers the same amazing experience that they would get in Canada and we want to expose Israeli Jews to the Canadian camping tradition."

Canada Israel Experience (CIE), which oversees all Israel programs for Canadian youth, has gotten involved in the project and will bring several hundred Canadian high school youth to the camp this summer.

"Jewish camping is one of the greatest components of Jewish identity," says Lorne Klemensberg, director of CIE in Israel.

"When Camp Kimama came along, we recognized it as a unique project in which we wanted to include our young, Canadian Jewish tourists."

Dacks envisions an exchange of values between Canadian and Israeli campers.

"There is something to be said about the environmental ethics you learn at camp in Canada. It's something that is lacking in Israel," says Dacks. "On the flip side, a very big part of getting to know Israel and getting to love Israel is getting to know and love its nature.

"The camp's name is the perfect symbol of North American Jewry bringing a positive influence to Israel," he says.

Kimama is the North American native Navajo word for "butterfly."

"It's a very symbolic name because kids really do undergo a transformation at camp," says Camp Kimama co-founder Ronen Hoffman.

Hoffman, who has worked for summer camps in North America for the last 10 years, knows this from experience.

"Working with camps abroad was the most powerful experience I ever had," says Hoffman, who currently serves as a lecturer in the School of Government at the Inter-Disciplinary Center.

"But when I returned to Israel after camp and tried to share my experience, it was impossible to explain because Israelis had no idea what I was talking about. There is not one single overnight camp in Israel.

Some of the campers at Camp Kimama

"At the same time, there was no camp that invited Jewish kids and teens from different communities to meet each other and spend the summer together," Hoffman says.

Until Camp Kimama.

"We want to create a big family," says Hoffman, who convinced friend Erez Rol, CEO of toy conglomerate Lafayette Agencies, to come on board.

"We want Jewish kids to gain the kind of exposure to each other that will result in long-term friendships and relationships."

There was a time when summer camp was the furthest thing from Hoffman's mind. The advisor to the Ministry of Defence on international and political affairs, personal assistant to the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, co-ordinator of the Israeli delegation to peace negotiations with Syria, and co-founder of the International Policy Institute for Counter-Terrorism, Hoffman only decided to take a break from his professional career about a year ago.

"I needed some time off from my political and governmental activities in order to focus on this project," he says.

Hoffman found the location, on the Ministry of Education-owned campus of the Mevo'ot Yam aquatic boarding school. It was a perfect match, since the campus facilities were not being fully utilized during the summer months.

"Everything is here and it would be such a waste not to use it for anything," says Yitzhak Gelber, the school's headmaster, who himself once served as director of Camp Solelim in Sudbury, Ont., and Camp Shalom in Cambridge, Ont. "When Ronen came to me with the idea, I was all for it."

The fully-secured and guarded campus is equipped with dormitories, a 500-seat kosher cafeteria, an air-conditioned sports complex, a natural outdoor amphitheatre, a 300-seat auditorium with a jumbo movie screen, a synagogue, a library, a computer centre, a medical clinic, a laundromat and best of all, the school's year-round waterfront staff.

All members of Camp Kimama's head staff have had at least three years of experience in counselling and management positions at North American summer camps.

So far, 100 kids have registered and the staff to camper ratio is 1:4. But each two-week session ($1,350 US) – the first runs from July 18 to July 29 and the second from Aug. 1 to Aug. 12 – can take a total of 400 campers.

After camp ends, kids from abroad can take a five-day tour of Israel for an additional $450 (US). When they return home, they can keep in touch with their new Israeli friends through the camp's Internet messaging site.

"Bringing international Diaspora Jewry to Israel and having them meet their Israeli friends and cousins is literally a revolution in Jewish camping," says Dacks. "I personally don't understand why this hasn't happened up until now. But what's important is that we're doing it this summer."

Dacks will be conducting informational seminars in Toronto from March 29 to April 11. For more information, visit www.campkimama.com.

Shopping for clothes can be a nightmare

By ORNA COUSSIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

One can't avoid shopping for clothes every now and then. So what's the problem?

According to the stories in magazines, movies and advertisements, it's supposed to be a real pleasure – hours of wandering around the stores to find a bra, a pair of pants, a shirt and a jacket. Undressing, dressing, feeling, looking at oneself in the mirror; trying on first this piece of clothing and then that one. What fun! It's every woman's favourite way to have a good time, a party.

But now would be a good time to reveal a well-guarded secret: shopping for clothes can be a nightmare. The usual symptoms are nervousness, a cold sweat, hot flushes – not only do one's cheeks get red, sometimes it feels like one's entire body is blushing – and a profound difficulty in trying to concentrate.

Headaches are not uncommon, and neither is a touch of angina, with the initial diagnosis that comes to mind being a minor anxiety attack.

It's easy of course to put it down to a private problem that needs to be ironed out with a psychologist, but it appears that many women with varying tendencies, shapes and tastes, some of whom actually function well in other contexts, suffer similar symptoms.

As American journalist Naomi Wolf wrote in her resonant book, The Beauty Myth, that despite feelings of shame and guilt, and despite the efforts to repress them, more and more women are wondering whether they are completely neurotic and all alone.

Not all women are anorexic, but most suffer from some kind of worry about their bocy. In the same way, almost all women suffer to some degree from dressing room difficulties.

The Zara fashion chain in Israel has an apt name for the problem – "fitting room fever."

> The Zara fashion chain in Israel has an apt name for the problem – "fitting room fever."

"Fitting room fever is a phenomenon we have been aware of for the past year or two," says Rachelle Even-Haim, who manages the Zara chain in Israel. "Women have an increasing need for privacy. Women are averse to trying on clothes in the expanse of the store, even jackets and coats, which can be tried on without undressing. Today, many women prefer to go into the fitting room... Often you realize – not when you're at home, but rather under the lights of the store – that you have put on weight."

And this, after all, is not something you want to see happen – and certainly not in public.

The fitting rooms in clothes stores are the most obvious part of the problem. On a shopping circuit in one of the malls last week, I fleetingly thought certain items appeared desirable. But in all three of the stores I was in, the fitting rooms are narrow. There's no room to put your jacket down. And if you bend over for a moment to take off your shoes, your bum hits the wall. The mirrors are on the outside.

You have to try the clothes on in front of everyone, the lighting is white and bright, your skin looks pale, the small sore on your chin has grown, the electronic music is frenetic and loud, the sizes are sometimes misleading (Is a size 3 at Fox a medium? A large?). You have to speak to the salesperson. She makes a face and mutters, "You're a size 3," and doesn't give an explanation, and it doesn't look good, and you feel under pressure, and it's impossible to decide.

"The time spent in the fitting room is the time for making decisions," says Hamashbir's chief designer, Revital Ostreicher. "In recent years, we have become increasingly aware of women's need for quiet and privacy when making decisions."

> Women need quiet and privacy when making their decisions.

Ostreicher puts new problem-solving principles into practice at Hamashbir's new branches in Haifa and neighbouring Krayot and the recently refurbished store in Tel Aviv. She has made sure, for example, to separate the area of the fitting rooms from the sales area, "to enhance the sense of security and intimacy."

She also believes the lighting should be yellowish rather than white – a softer light so that "the flaws aren't accentuated." (The white lights at the chain's refurbished stores are being replaced with yellowish ones.)

All things Art Deco

For many people, spring is one of the most exciting times of the year. From the rapidly changing temperatures to the fresh colours in and out of the fitting rooms, spring is grand in every way.

With the new obsession for all things Art Deco at its peak, the word "grand" has an added special meaning. This year's biggest trend takes us back to a time when beauty and excess reigned.

With design houses such as Marc Jacobs, Balenciaga and Ralph Lauren exploring the palettes and attitudes of the 1920s, it is clear that the jazz age is back and bigger than ever. And this time, not only the fashions are affected.

The ethos of Art Deco urges us to indulge in that frivolous attitude that we usually repress. Whether it be in your wardrobe or everyday activities, now is the time to really explore and have fun!

Add spice to your clothes by mixing things you usually wouldn't. Whether it be fur and pearls or even a blazer and jeans, spring is the time to play.

Since this year's biggest colours are green and yellow, be sure to inject a little citrus as well.

This spring also sees a resurgence of femininity. Grab some sea salt spray instead of the straightening iron. Strut in a kitten heel instead of a platform. Just like the flapper dress itself, you can loosen up when you're dressing up.

As the days get lighter, so should your attitude. This spring, un-furrow that brow and indulge in something new. Now more than ever, you can really enjoy!

The looking glass war

The mirrors must of course be inside the fitting rooms, and it is very important to hang them "at an angle that makes you look taller and narrows dimensions. It's an optical-illusion technique," she says.

All of this, she says, stems from the fact that it is important to allow women to look their best when they are buying clothes.

"No one wants the zits to pop out and the fat to show pronouncedly in the store itself when trying things on," she says.

A., 30-something, pretty and thin, is another sufferer from dressing room anxiety. She says the fitting room experience is only the tip of the nightmare iceberg.

"It's easiest for me to buy underwear because you can't try it on, or shoes because you don't have to undress. But this isn't the main issue. All one's self-image problems are channelled into the issue of one's appearance and the clothes," she says.

Therefore, A. adds, the most difficult part of her experience is a fear of failure. "Buying clothes is the area in which I fail more than in any other. Even if I have finally managed to try on and choose a piece of clothing, I usually get home and realize it isn't cool, or chic, and doesn't compliment me. In other words, I have failed the simple task and I have to go back and change it and choose all over again. And then my strongest sense is one of anger: Why do I have to live in this consumption-oriented society that makes me feel guilty if I don't always buy beautiful clothes? It infuriates me. Why can't I make do with a few items in which I am comfortable and that's it?"

Buying a bathing suit is not a must; you can get by without one. You can go into the water in a pair of shorts or tights and cover the top half of your body with a tight-fitting undershirt. If you want to sunbathe, you can lift the undershirt up a little and expose your tummy, but you don't have to.

After all, buying a bathing suit is the mother of all nightmares when it comes to buying clothes. Many women, as it turns out, simply stop buying bathing suits when they hit 30.

G., 43, a lecturer at a university, clearly remembers the last bikini she ever bought. "It was six years ago," she says. "I was going to Sinai with my boyfriend. I found a simple and pretty black bikini at Hamashbir, and I tried it on alone in the fitting room. The experience was so shocking that I have never repeated it.

"I remember how I felt shrunken, how I was disgusted by the sickly tone of my skin under the pale light, how I hated seeing the cellulite and how ridiculous I felt when I tried on the bottom half over the comfortable grandma-panties I wear. And I tried to imagine how I would look out in the sunlight, shaved and exposed. And yes, my stomach looked so fat all of a sudden and my thighs looked so thick. I tried on six different ones until I decided. It was a nightmare."

In her brilliant piece, An end to the fitting room nightmare, which appeared in the New York Times about three years ago, columnist Michelle Slatalla describes the nightmare of trying on a bathing suit in a store: "To get through it, I repeated the mantra, 'My skin isn't really green. My skin isn't really green.'"

Slatalla tested out an alternative method suited to the new age in which we live – buy a bathing suit over the Internet. This appears to be the perfect solution to the fitting room fever problem, buying clothes online and trying them on in the comfort and security of one's home.

But, she revealed, this is the worrying truth: even online shopping isn't the solution, and not only because of the high price and the slow and clumsy mechanism of returns and exchanges. Buying clothes is tough in general – in small stores, large chains and through the Internet.

In many cases, a woman's aversion to her body is profound and comprehensive, a complete internalization of the stringent myth of beauty that sanctifies slenderness and youth. This aversion is fully bared, not in the expanse of the store for all to see, but, instead, when we stand in our private bedroom, alone, in front of the mirror.

Support your feet...and Israel too

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

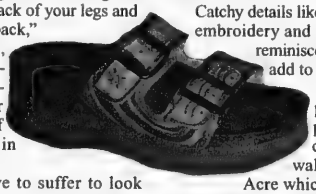
With the fresh new looks, comfort and support of a pair of Naot fashion sandals, you'll walk with a new bounce in your step, this spring.

Always known for their lasting support and ease of wear, Naot shoes make a fashion statement too. In a variety of styles and colours to suit every taste, this Israeli-made shoe holds its own whether combined with evening-wear or beachwear.

The beach is where it all began in essence for Naot shoes. Founded in 1942 on Kibbutz Naot Mordechai, near Kiryat Shmona, Israeli technicians discovered that a footprint in the sand represents the most natural imprint of support.

They modelled their foot bed on it, with a natural cork sole for shock absorption, a layer of cushioning latex and a suede foot bed that conforms to the shape of your foot for a custom-fit feel.

"The cushioning takes the weight of your body, of the back of your legs and the small of your back," Corinne Lissoos, president of Solemates Inc., the exclusive importer and distributor of Naot footwear in Canada, says.



"You don't have to suffer to look good anymore. People have changed their thinking." All the materials used are environmentally friendly.

Production of this former footwear of choice for many a kibbutznik has grown so that it is now Israel's most popular sandal and most manufactured and exported shoe.

"I think they are really outstanding in their quality and design. [Israeli designers] travel all of Europe to see what designs there are, but every new design has to accommodate the foot bed. There's no compromise on design, comfort and orthopedic quality," Lissoos says.

A new feature to select Naots is that they are orthotic-friendly with removable foot beds to accommodate orthotics in a shoe. This new feature is available in many fashionable styles including Mary Janes, clogs and fisherman's sandals, which the men can enjoy too. Foot discomfort need no longer be an accepted part of formal wear. Classic black pumps are also available with removable foot beds.

Only the finest of Italian leathers are used in the production of Naots, in tasteful fashion colours like red pepper, tomato, tan and also in various whites - the colour of choice for doctors, nurses and even brides.

Catchy details like flower appliqués, embroidery and two-toned leather reminiscent of saddle shoes add to the fun.

A screen-printed Yemenite pattern was duplicated from the walls of a house in Acre which a woman decorated after she'd emigrated to her new home in Israel from Yemen. The Israel museum now owns the house, which is open to visitors, but you can don a piece of Israeli art history on your feet.

Also new to Naots is a line of sports socks, designed with the same attention to support and comfort as the shoes. The pairs come marked for the right and left foot and provide support and padding for those areas of the foot most strenuously used. Naot hand and foot creams made with Dead Sea minerals are also available.

By wearing Naots footwear, you can support Israel and your feet at the same time. As Lissoos so aptly puts it, "to look good, fit in with the clothes you're wearing and never think about your feet…you're in the right shoes."

Naots are available in Toronto at the newly expanded Prairie Dog, Capezio and Brown's or call (416) 650-5637 for other locations. Outside of Toronto call their toll-free number 1-800-461-NAOT, or check the website www.naotcanada.com.

NEWS, NEWS, NEWS: Makeup is light as air and sexy as the women wearing it. A sensuality and freshness is known to this season alone. Colorful bouquets of color set the whimsical mood a drift in a sea of femininity.

SpaMedica has the hottest new non-surgical facelift around. The ThreadLift (also known as the FeatherLift or Aptos suture lift) is part of the popular SpaMedica PanG Lift program. It's a non-invasive office procedure performed under local anesthetic, similar to the freezing your dentist might use.

In the ThreadLift, tiny threads inserted painlessly by Dr. Stephen Mulholland under the skin of the droopy portions of the brow, cheek, jowl or neck. The threads are passed into the droopy facial elements with a special guide needle. These fine threads are the same sutures Dr. Mulholland uses to support the deep structures of the face when he does a surgical facelift. The threads stay where they are inserted and, like all internal sutures, are generally well tolerated by the body.

Most patients experience little swelling or bruising and can return to work within one to three days. Immediate lift effects are visible and can last several years. Fabulous!

Check out Lise Watier's Eden collection's Jumbo Crayon, a no-transfer eye and lip colour that's superb!

Clinique's Superfine Liner for Brows is an ultra-slim, automatic pencil that creates naturally defined brows and makes application a cinch. It's resistant to water, sweat and humidity!

Lancôme's Color Dose has such intense pigment that the colour lasts for eight hours and remains watertight. Eight magnificent shades can be worn solo or as a base. Another favourite from Lancome is its new Quat shadow compact – gorgeous colours and very sleek.

Illusionist Waterproof Maximum Curling Mascara from Estee Lauder is absolutely immune to effects of humidity – a must have! Also from Estee Lauder is a new pure colour cool eye mousse: these creamy eye shadows glide across your skin with a yummy aerated texture imparting an immediate cooling and sensorial feel to the touch.

A quartet of vibrant colours from Shiseido the Makeup create the most vivacious eyes with incredible texture and last for endless hours.

Beauty products from Chanel.

Body cleansers from Estee Lauder, above.
A touch of sensual colour, below, from Chanel.

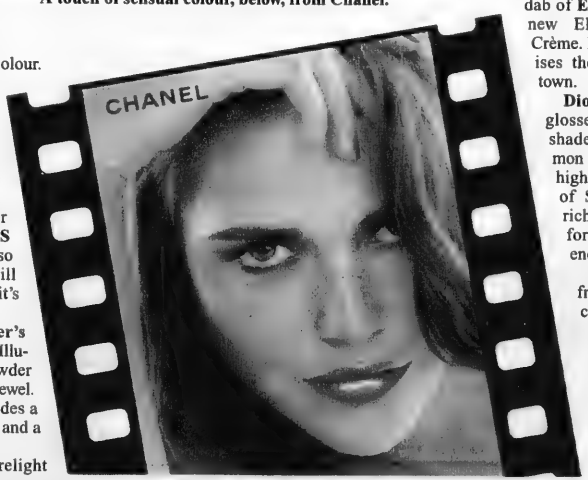
BLUSH: The blusher duo from Chanel works to create great contrast effects. The light shade highlights contour while the coppery pink adds a touch of sensual colour.

Get cheeky with Clinique's Limited Edition Pink Loose Powder with Puff that just kisses the face with warmth.

Passion powder blush from NARS in warm peach is so natural you will hardly know it's there.

Estee Lauder's new Pure Fantasy Illuminating Face Powder is spring's newest jewel. Its rosy hue provides a little bit of colour and a touch of sheen.

Dior blush Firelight 863 is more intense, but still perfectly sheer and quite exotic.



LIPS: New at Holt Renfrew is a very innovative cosmetic line called DuWop. Their Lip Venom in clear gloss or coloured lipsticks contains a blend of essential oils that tingle and provide lips with "bee stung" fullness as well as shine.

Estee Lauder's latest Pure Color Lip Vinyl comes in eight glorious shades. Each foursome is neatly aligned in colour cubes – joined at the hip – and includes lip brush and great case. Sexy confidence comes with a little dab of Estee Lauder's brand new Electric Intense Lip Crème. It glides on and promises the poutiest mouth in town.

Dior's ultra-gloss lip glosses pulsate in two new shades: A Dash of Cinnamon 531, with sensual gold highlights and A Sprinkle of Sugar 651, a tangy, richly shimmering syrup for lips that looks good enough to eat!

Jilted Love Lip Liner from NARS in soft coral is a hot little item.

Revlon's Super Lustrous Lip Gloss features an exclusive LiquiSilk Formula that leaves the lips feeling like a silk cushion.

Rimmel introduces the power of Lycra for the "shock proof" nail, new breakthrough technology.

HAIR: Kerastase introduces a new line called Nutri-Sculpt. It includes six new products that provide a balance of nutrition, hold and shine. Their "Brushing Protection" helps protect hair against repeated thermal and mechanical aggressions.

L'Oreal Paris presents Vive, based on Citrus Ceramide - a unique technology that infuses freshness and shine. It provides cleansing without damage. It smells so fresh and includes six different collections to cleanse and condition all types of hair.

FRAGRANCE: Givenchy's Organza First Light has an aromatic soul that sparkles and flirts with warmth. It has an unexpected exotic twist, a fresh oriental which compliments the original Organza, a floral oriental. They actually stand out as the only Oriental fragrances in the Givenchy portfolio.

Omnia is a tribute to the tradition of great Oriental perfumes.

Dolce&Gabbana announces Sicily, a scent that represents the sensuality and heat of the Mediterrean. Stefano Gabbana said that "if wearing a perfume is like wearing a dress, then the fragrance is our black bra: an essential."

The house of Versace introduces the new Versace Man. It's fresh and seductive and much like a woody, spicy oriental scent that will envelop your guy in warmth and seduction.

Roberto Cavalli known for cloths that exalt the body, has a new fragrance: Roberto Cavalli Man. It is masculine and very elegant. The packaging is perfect Cavalli style with his signature python, zebra and leopard designs.

Salvatore Ferragamo's latest bewitching fragrance called Incanto claims to be "the maker of dreams" for the elegant, sincere real woman who loves life. Need I say more?

Bvlgari's latest woman's scent Omnia is a tribute to the tradition of the great oriental perfumes, with a modern twist. It is destined to re-awaken a woman's senses to a new dimension of pleasure.

Amerispa at Fairmont Tremblant, Mont Tremblant Quebec

Skiers, snowboarders, hikers and snow bunnies can indulge in a number of luxurious spa treatments at Amerispa at Fairmont Tremblant.

The picturesque, four-diamond, year-round Mont Tremblant resort, a 10,000-square-foot premiere spa in the heart of the hotel complex, is nestled at the base of the highest peak of Quebec's Laurentian Mountains, just 120 kilometres from the Montreal International Airport in Dorval, yet worlds away.

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Amerispa at Fairmont Tremblant boasts 17 treatment rooms designed to reflect the natural mountainous environment outside, and the spa's relaxation area used by clients between treatments has a spectacular mountain view. Also at the facility are an exercise centre, a mixed sauna steam bath, interior and exterior heated pools and whirlpools. The outdoor water amenities are open throughout the winter for those brave or crazy enough to face the frozen temperatures in bathing suits.

Esthetic and massage therapists minister to the entire body and specialize in preparing the body for the slopes and tending to the aches and pains a day at the slopes might bring.

"We offer body wraps, exfoliations, facials, manicures and pedicures and many kinds of massage, including traditional Swedish and a massage under a five-headed Vichy shower. We also do a four-hand massage, done by two therapists at the same time. It is unusual, but it is very relaxing to have four hands all over you," says Ginette Lanctôt, director of Amerispa at Fairmont Tremblant.

"Our signature treatments include hot stone therapy and pressotherapy, where our clientele put long boots on their legs that inflate and deflate with air. The treatment takes about 20 to 30 minutes and works to promote blood and lymphatic circulation," she explains.

Another treatment not to be missed is a maple sugar body scrub followed by the application of a light maple sugar body milk. This treatment, developed by chemist Ben Kamins exclusively for Quebec-based Amerispa, both oxidizes and exfoliates the skin. And the maple sugar concoction smells so yummy; you can't help but get hungry.

The spa's relaxation area has a spectacular view, above. Massage therapists, below, tender to the entire body.

At the spa, therapists use high quality French products including Darphin and Algotherm Cosmétique Marine, a line devoted to ingredients from the ocean.

Treatments are available à la carte and in a variety of spa packages. Also on offer are spa/hotel packages that include accommodation in one of the 316 warm and inviting rooms and suites overlooking incredible scenery and lots of action.

Après spa, you can go boutique shopping within the Fairmont Tremblant or steps away at a European-style village. Through the resort you can book fun activity packages that include dog sledding, available off the premises.

In the summer guests of the resort can enjoy golfing, great hiking trails and pristine lakes nearby. Women planning to experience the abundance of nightlife at Mont Tremblant might want to consider looking their best with the help of a glamorous makeup makeover at the resort spa.

For spa information, call Amerispa at Fairmont Tremblant at 819-681-7680 or go online to www.amerispa.ca. For reservations, contact the Fairmont Tremblant at 1-800-441-1414 or online at: www.fairmont.com.

Reena to get government funds for supportive housing

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Ontario government is providing $14 million in capital funds and $14 million in operating funds for supportive housing for adults with developmental disabilities.

The announcement was made last week by Sandra Pupatello, minister of community and social services and women's issues, at a press conference at the Reena Foundation's Toby and Henry Battle Development Centre in Thornhill.

The money will support 44 projects in 27 communities across Ontario.

Among the projects is five of the 10 beds that Reena is creating in Richmond Hill. The rest of the funds for Reena's Elderhome 2, said Reena vice-chair Harold Seidel, will be raised by the foundation, partly at a gala dinner to be held June 24.

The hope, he said, is to complete the home this summer.

This is in accord with Pupatello's assertion that "today is not the big day. We expect action by June."

The spaces are needed because the population of people with developmental disabilities is aging, as are their parents and others responsible for their care. As well, their needs change as time goes by.

Ontario providing $28 million for projects for developmentally disabled

The new facilities will free up space in existing homes for young adults currently in childrens' homes, and thus allow youngsters to be served.

"We have a responsibility to our most vulnerable citizens," Pupatello said. "We [the McGinty government] believe that fairness and dignity matter to Ontarians, and that investments like this build stronger communities for all of us."

Racco said the new places will allow some people with developmental disabilities "to live more happily and independently in a community near family and friends."

Among those at the press conference were Mario Racco, MPP for Thornhill riding, where Reena is located; Vaughan councillor Susan Kadis; and Richmond Hill councillor David Cohen, as well as Reena staff, clients, board members and clients' families.

Diabetics observe mitzvot and stay healthy

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

It is possible for diabetics to take care of their health and observe Passover, says Rabbi Chaim Sacknovitz, director of guidance at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

"Passover is a holiday of food and it is significant to all of us, but we can observe the mitzvot and remain healthy," Rabbi Sacknovitz, himself a diabetic, said at a meeting of the Jewish chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association.

The Jewish chapter, which meets every second month from September to May, offers a support system, brings in guest speakers and provides recipes and tips related to diabetes and the Jewish dietary laws.

Diabetes is considered a potentially life-threatening condition, Rabbi Sacknovitz said, and "because people on insulin must know their sugar level, they are allowed to test it on yom tov. That takes precedence."

Issues that have an impact on a person with diabetes at the seder include the mitzvot of drinking wine and eating matzah, he said.

"We have to drink eight ounces of wine throughout the seder, but we can dilute the wine and still have the taste. That is the best way to deal with the issue."

As well, he said, by drinking white wine instead of red wine, we are consuming fewer carbohydrates and there is less impact on our health.

It is possible to eat the matzah that is required if we are careful to measure it and keep count of what we have eaten, he said.

Brandi Propas, a registered dietitian at Lawrence Heights Community Health Centre, said that getting enough fibre is a big challenge throughout the week of Passover.

"Fibre is found in whole grain products, lentils and beans, and fruits and vegetables. It prevents constipation, lowers cholesterol levels, stabilizes blood sugar and helps regulate appetites, but it is difficult to get during Passover."

"We can get whole wheat farfel and matzah meal for the first time this year, and although people with diabetes need to watch their fruit, they can try and get more vegetables by adding them to dishes and making soup."

She suggested eating salads with every meal, choosing "free" vegetables such as broccoli, cauliflower, bok choy and cabbage, and eating three small fruits a day.

To control fat, she suggested replacing whole eggs with egg whites, trimming meats and removing the skin from chicken.

"As for portion size, I always recommend the plate method. If you divide the plate into three, vegetables should take up the biggest portion, and starch and protein should take up the rest of the plate equally."

She recommended trying quinoa, a grain-like food that is high in fibre and protein, and offered the following recipe:

SUNDRIED TOMATO QUINOA

1 cup quinoa
2 tbsp. chopped dry-packed sundried tomatoes
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 cups chicken stock
salt and pepper to taste

Rinse quinoa under cold running water until water is clear. Set aside. Soak tomatoes for 10 minutes in boiling water. Drain and chop. Set aside. In medium saucepan, combine quinoa, tomatoes, garlic and stock. Bring to a boil. Cover, reduce heat and cook for 25 minutes or until all liquid is absorbed and quinoa is tender. Season with salt and pepper to taste.

Division of pensions in cases of marital dissolution

Part One of Two

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

In Ontario, if spouses agree in writing, or if a Court orders it, the pension-holding spouse can assign a portion of certain types of pensions, such as his Teacher's pension or death benefits, to his spouse for use after his retirement or death. So spouses can agree do this, but will Courts order such assignments when spouses do not agree?

In the 1999 case of Best v. Best 2 S.C.J. No. 40, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled against Courts normally ordering such arrangements, even though the Court admitted that "it avoids exposing the pension-holder to the hardship of having to pay a lump sum immediately." What does all this mean in dollars and cents? The Court ruled that a current cash valuation and payment to the non-policy holder is what Ontario's Family Law Act intended and that it would not be practical to tie one spouse's future to the other's after divorce. They adhered to a "clean break" principle: in other words, pay the lady and go away.

Strangely enough, the Courts have the opposite view when it comes to spousal support. They have consistently ruled in a number of cases that payments should be "periodic" or "monthly." This principle is sacrosanct. For whatever reason, our Court system seems to frown on one-time lump sum payments in spousal support matters but not in pension-related matters.

Pension equalization after separation agreements

By valuating the current future value of a pension according to the number of years married, pension-holding spouses often are required to "equalize" their pension entitlements shortly after separation, even though they will not receive their pensions for several years thereafter. In many "defined" pension plans this can mean a transfer of "current" cash in the tens of thousands of dollars. Often this "payment" takes the form of one's equity or part of one's equity in the matrimonial home. For instance, it is not unusual after a marriage of more than 15 years to see Pension valuations equal well over $100,000 net after taxes. Then, half of that figure must be allocated today — not on retirement! — to the other spouse.

The influence of Best on negotiating separation agreements has been formidable, even though the case deals only with how Courts make orders when parties can't agree on splitting pensions, and not on whether these Courts will enforce such agreements if the parties make them. In addition, a circular delivered by the Law Society of Upper Canada several years ago warned lawyers not to negotiate a separation agreement that was based on the recipient getting her share of the pension or death benefit when the pension holder retired or died. Since that time, many lawyers have been careful to tell their clients that such negotiation is not feasible, fearing that they could be sued for negligence if they acted otherwise.

Changes in family law never cease to amaze me. In early February 2004, the Court of Appeal of Ontario clarified the law that permits spouses to split a Pension or death benefit entitlements in a realistic way that many lawyers, until now, thought was too complicated and therefore legally impossible. It also appears to contradict the aforementioned Law Society warning, at least in those cases of "defined" pensions such as Teacher's pension plans.

Death benefit assignation pits former wife vs. current

In the case of Stairs v. Ontario Teachers Pension Plan Board [2004] O.J. No. 331, the Court ruled against the Teacher's Board that attempted to ignore the separation agreement signed by a teacher who had remarried and had died before he could collect his pension. In the agreement, under a formula based on length of marriage, a large percentage of his death benefit was assigned to his former wife. The new wife refused to give up her rights to the entire death benefit.

The Teacher's Board refused to honour the agreement. After years of litigation, the Court of Appeal agreed with Ms. Stairs that under the Ontario Pensions Benefit Act, the Board was obligated to pay her pursuant to the formula in the separation agreement. They based their ruling on section 51 of this Act that directs plan administrators to follow the formulas for division (up to 50%).

The Court has ruled that this section directs the administrator to follow such formulas because the spouses have entered into such agreements. However, a close reading of the section also reveals that it empowers the Courts to make such orders for division, whether or not the parties have agreed and even if only one spouse requests such a division. The legislation gives the Courts such powers even though the Supreme Court has ruled that the Courts should not normally split pensions this way.

Interestingly, the Stairs' agreement, although enforceable, is precisely what the Supreme Court of Canada ruled in Best that Courts should not normally be ordering if asked to do so by spouses who can't agree. The Court of Appeal in Stairs, when quoting approvingly from Best in its decision, quotes only those parts of the Supreme Court's comments about the "if and when" method that helped the Court of Appeal make its policy decision. The Court of Appeal respectfully fails to remind the reader that in its decision, the Supreme Court ultimately decided against allowing Pension plans to pay on retirement or death. It also fails to quote the Supreme Court's negative comments on this approach.

Manaus opera house built during the rubber boom

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

MANAUS, Brazil — Improbably enough, one of the world's finest 19th century opera houses, the Teatro Amazonas, lies smack dab in the middle of the huge Amazonian rainforest.

The elegant pink and white neo-classical structure, sporting an iridescent dome sprinkled with a dusting of colours, is in old Manaus, the commercial capital of the Amazon and the gateway to jungle tours.

Manaus, hemmed in on all sides by an impenetrable jungle, is spread along the northern bank of the Rio Negro, a tributary of the Amazon River.

The Teatro Amazonas, far and away Manaus' number one tourist attraction, was finished in 1896 after 15 years of painstaking construction. It has since been renovated several times.

Designed by the Italian Domenico Angelis, it was built during the brief rubber boom, when Brazil was virtually the only country producing that valuable commodity.

The monopoly enriched a few rubber barons, who spared no expense to pursue an extravagant lifestyle. It was their idea to bring a world-class opera house to the heart of the Amazonian wilderness.

Still in use after more than a century, the building – which can accommodate an audience of 700 on the main floor and in three imposing galleries– was made of the best materials by craftsmen from Europe.

The floors were hewn from Brazilian hardwood, Latvian pine and Italian marble. The elegant chandeliers and mirrors were imported from France. The cast iron columns and railings were manufactured in Scotland.

The elaborate frescoes on the ceilings and the walls, painted by a corps of Italian artists, show Greek goddesses, pink-cheeked Rubenesque maidens and quintessential Amazonian scenes.

The seats were upholstered with Chinese silk, while the banisters were sheathed with the softest velvet.

In deference to the tropical climate, ventilation shafts were installed under seats.

Last restored in 1990, the Teatro Amazonas is adjacent to a deep blue 19th-century colonial-style building and to St. Sebastian Square, whose wavy black-and-white tiles are so typically Portuguese.

Manaus, whose name derives from an Indian phrase meaning the mother of gods, was founded by Portuguese explorers as a fort in 1669.

But it was not until the short-lived rubber boom, which began in 1890 and fizzled around the outbreak of World War I, that Manaus come into its own as an important mercantile city.

The customs house, which opened in 1906, and the floating docks, which were inaugurated in 1902, are associated with this bygone era.

Imported from Britain in prefabricated blocks, the floating docks are a marvel of engineering, rising and falling with the level of the Rio Negro. During the rainy season, which runs from January to June, the river can be 13 metres higher than normal.

An enduring symbol of Manaus' openness to the world and its reliance on exports and imports, the docks serve ocean-going vessels of any draft the whole year round.

The customs house, fitted with ceramic bricks to withstand the humid weather, was also constructed in Britain.

Manaus' municipal market, a cast-iron affair that bears a striking resemblance to the Les Halles market in Paris, carries an eclectic selection of fresh fish from the Amazon, exotic fruit from the rainforest, mounds of vegetables from southern Brazil, slabs of glistening meat from the region and a plethora of handicrafts from the interior.

It's best to visit early in the morning, when the market buzzes with activity and excitement.

In front of the market, stretched along the shores of the Rio Negro, are the so-called water taxis.

There are about 65 towns in Amazonas, and the fastest and cheapest way to reach them is by boat via the Amazon River and its tributaries.

The taxis are jammed with passengers, much like second-class train compartments in India. Passengers who intend to spend several days on the boats bring their own hammocks.

No visitor should leave Manaus without taking Fontur's "meeting of the waters" excursion.

Near Manaus, the inky waters of the Rio Negro meet the muddy yellow waters of the Solimoes, a local reference to the Amazon River.

The waters touch but do not merge, and it is an amazing sight to behold.

The full-day tour includes a visit to Lago do Janauary, where you can feast your eyes on the Amazon's famous water lily pads, which look like giant pizza pies and bloom in May.

In Manaus, you can check into the five-star Tropical Hotel, whose manicured grounds feature a swimming pool complex, tennis courts, walking and jogging paths through the remnants of a rainforest and a mini zoo whose denizens include two jaguars. The Tropical also has a selection of fine restaurants and shops. If you're on a tighter budget, you can opt for Mango House, a pleasant motel with a swimming pool, which is closer to the centre of Manaus.

Michael Rosenbaum: a villain with 'Lex' appeal

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

This year, Superman, one of the most popular comic book superheroes, turns 70. Of course in movies and television, he doesn't age one bit. Even Lex Luthor still looks like a teenager – at least on TV's Smallville.

Michael Rosenbaum, 31, steals scenes as the kind and suave Lex Luthor in Smallville, the hit series about the early life of Superman.

Now in its third season, fans of the show are anxiously awaiting to find out how Luthor turns evil and becomes Superman's arch-nemesis.

Smallville brings Superman back to its Canadian – and even Jewish- connections. Kal-El, Clark Kent's kryptonian name, is said to have been chosen because it is Hebrew-sounding. The way that Superman was sent to Earth also mirrors the story of newborn Moses sent through the waters in a basket.

Seventy years ago two Jewish friends, Jerry Siegel and Joe Shuster (a Canadian), created Superman. He then appeared in his own comic book in 1939. Smallville brings things full circle back to Canada, filming in Vancouver.

In the show, Lex Luthor is a boyhood friend of Clark Kent. Because of Rosenbaum's smooth take on Luthor, it didn't take much for him to become somewhat of an 'it' boy, as both the Internet and a plethora of magazines have competed for photo spreads, interviews, and 'inside scoops.'

Michael Rosenbaum

Equally adept at comedy and drama, Rosenbaum has previously played characters ranging from a transvestite and a poolhall shark, to a crazed fraternity boy. Other credits of his include the films Sorority Boys and Sweet November (with Keanu Reeves). He also starred in the thriller Urban Legend and appeared in Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil, directed by Clint Eastwood.

"I just like to stay challenged. I just keep challenging myself," says Rosenbaum. "It's boring to have the same character every week sometimes. You'll just go crazy. I want to take chances. I want to continue to work with great people who challenge me. I want to keep getting better and keep growing."

Recently, Rosenbaum also starred in Poolhall Junkies filmed in Salt Lake City. So, what's a nice Jewish boy doing in Mormon-country?

"Keeping his yarmulke in his pocket," he jests.

In addition to his broad range of roles in front of the camera, Rosenbaum is also a voice-over artist. Behind the scenes, he has voiced Flash in the animated television series Justice League and lent his voice in several episodes of Batman Beyond.

"It was completely a coincidence," he says of the several superhero-genre roles he's played. "I'm always doing impressions, and they asked me to audition for Flash. It just kinda happened. I wasn't a huge comic book fan growing up. But now I'm a fan,"he says.

With his newfound knowledge of various comic book characters, when asked who he thinks is the strongest superhero and who is the weakest, Rosenbaum replied: "The strongest superhero has to be Superman. Who else is there? And the weakest? I don't know - Wonder Woman? No, I can't say that. But she is. All she has is that whip. But I can't say that she's the weakest superhero because women are going to think I'm some chauvinist pig. But I can't think of anyone else who'd be the weakest."

What would Rosenbaum do if he were Superman? "I'd probably fly to every state and visit friends. I'd pick up women, check out the Nile, Africa, everything, and then the Eiffel Tower. I'd see what I can do to enemies I had in high school. I'd just do super bad things, like rip someone's wheels off a car."

Truly, a Lex Luthor in the making.

Miriam Waddington remembered for her contribution to Canlit

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

To the many friends and critics who feel that Canadian Jewish poet and writer Miriam Waddington did not get the full recognition she deserved in life, her recent death in Vancouver seems especially sad and ironic because it occurred only weeks before she would have gained what will likely become her largest popular audience and her most widely circulated stanza of poetry.

Obituary

Among a multitude of other poems, she was the author of the poem Jacques Cartier in Toronto, which has been excerpted on the back of the new $100 bill due to go into general circulation later this month.

Waddington, who died on March 3 at the age of 86, is remembered for her varied and wide-ranging literary output that includes nearly a dozen volumes of poetry, critical studies of A.M. Klein and other writers, short stories, translations of Yiddish stories and poems into English, and a series of semi-autobiographical essays on literature and life published under the title Apartment Seven.

"Her writing is what she would want us to remember – or better still, to read, and read again," William Toye, her longtime editor at the Oxford University Press in Toronto, said in comments that were to be read at a memorial service last Saturday in Vancouver.

Born in 1917 to Russian-Jewish parents who arrived in Winnipeg before World War I, Miriam Dworkin grew up in the city's immigrant north end in a home in which only Yiddish was allowed to be spoken, and in which a large portrait of writer Y.L. Peretz looked down at the family from the dining room wall. She was raised in a secular, socialist milieu filled with lively dinners, meetings, lectures, picnics, outings and other social events.

Educated in Yiddish at the local Peretz school, she developed an enduring affection for the works of Sholom Aleichem and other Yiddish writers and poets, some of whom she later translated into English.

"I could have found my way around Kasrilevke blindfolded and I readily identified with Sholom Aleichem's juvenile heroes," she would write.

When she was 12, the family moved to Ottawa and made new connections with like-minded Jews there and in nearby Montreal. The budding young poet was soon introduced into the salon of Yiddish poet Ida Maza and an effervescent sphere of writers, artists and radical thinkers.

Miriam Waddington died on March 3.

She received a BA in English from the University of Toronto in 1939 and an MA in social work from the University of Pennsylvania. She and her new husband Patrick Waddington then settled in Toronto, where she took a job in social work and immersed herself in the city's literary circles.

Moving to Montreal in the mid-1940s, she was drawn into the heart of what Ruth Panofsky, associate director of Com-Cult at Ryerson University, describes as "the cultural flowering that took place in Montreal [at that time]."

Panofsky, who studied with and became a close friend to Waddington, said, "She was at the centre of that movement but she's been forgotten because she was participating beside Irving Layton, Louis Dudek and others."

A first volume of poems, Green World, appeared in 1945. Later volumes would include The Second Silence (1955), The Season's Lovers (1958), The Glass Trumpet (1966), Say Yes (1969), The Price of Gold (1976), Mister Never (1978), The Visitants (1981) and The Last Landscape (1992).

A divorced, single mother of two sons, Waddington returned to Toronto and joined York University's English department in 1964, where she taught a trailblazing course dealing with the social voice in Canadian writing.

In 1970, she published a scholarly book on A.M. Klein and edited an anthology of his poems that appeared two years after his death in 1974. Many regard her as a pioneer in the now-burgeoning field of Klein studies.

Her book "was the first really important book on Klein," said Trent University professor and Klein scholar, Zailig Pollock.

"She tended to see Klein from her own very particular point of view and to emphasize the secular-reformist quality of Klein rather than the Orthodox aspect of his work. She tended to see him much more as a secular, enlightened Jew rather than an upholder of Orthodoxy," Pollock said.

"Not everybody agreed with this view, but she presented it very elegantly and compellingly, and she had a real influence on people's view of Klein and his place in Canadian literature."

After retiring from York in 1983, Waddington edited Canadian Jewish Short Stories, an anthology published by Oxford in 1990. Within a few years, she moved to Vancouver to be near her son Jonathan. She soon joined a Yiddish reading group in which she remained active until only last December.

Three years ago, she was honoured at a tribute dinner organized by Richard Menkis, a member of the Association of Canadian Jewish Studies, and held in Vancouver's Beth Israel synagogue.

"We decided to honour Miriam for her contribution to Canadian Jewish life," Menkis, an associate professor at University of British Columbia, recalled. "We wanted to celebrate her contribution as a poet. She dealt with a wide variety of themes, including some that were explicitly Jewish. She was a unique and wonderful and powerful voice."

While even friends acknowledge she could be strongly opinionated at times, most saw through her occasionally ironic veneer to the heart of gold that lay beneath.

"She was lovable, bubbly, adorable and just delightful," said her longtime friend, Frances Blugerman of Toronto. "She was a wonderful hostess, a great cook and a very warm and devoted friend to hundreds of people, if that's possible."

A recipient of the J.J. Segal award for poetry in 1972 and 1986, she published a short story collection, Summer at Lonely Beach, and contributed articles and reviews to Canadian Forum, the Globe and Mail and many other publications. Her work has been published in more than 200 anthologies.

She leaves sons Jonathan in Vancouver and Marcus in Nova Scotia, as well as brother Sol Dworkin, daughter-in-law Paula Grossman and three grandsons. She also leaves nearly 11 linear metres of her papers and other materials in the custody of the National Archives of Canada.

"She's part of the canon of Canadian poets, and in a week or two, one of her poems will be on the Canadian $100 bill," Menkis remarked. "Still, it would have been nice to see her get wider recognition."

Cultural dissonance roils small town in Iowa

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Sipping a cup of Red Zinger tea one morning at breakfast, American journalist Stephen Bloom read a magazine story that floored him.

The article was about a chassidic butcher from Brooklyn named Aaron Rubashkin. He had bought a derelict slaughterhouse in Postville – a declining white-bread town nestled in the cornfields of northeastern Iowa, where pigs outnumber people by almost five to one – and converted the facility into a thriving enterprise called Agriprocessors.

By 1996, Rubashkin's glatt kosher meat packing plant, managed by his son, Sholom, was processing 1.85 million pounds of beef, chicken, lamb and turkey per week, bound for markets in Chicago, New York, Los Angeles, Miami, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

The packing house, having created 350 jobs, had resuscitated Postville's flagging economy. Yet many of its residents were less than pleased by the presence of some 150 haredim, with their long black coats and black hats, in their insular town.

> The Jews were out of sync with Postville's 'natural symmetry.' As one man told Bloom, a secular Jew, 'These people don't belong here.'

Bloom, a seasoned reporter who teaches journalism at the University of Iowa in Iowa City, was so riveted by this tableau of religious and cultural dissonance that he wrote an intriguing book about it, Postville: A Clash of Cultures in Heartland America (Harvest).

"This tiny Iowa town had become ground zero as a testing site for issues such as multiculturalism, diversity and the limits of tolerance," he explains at the outset.

Postville was settled by German, Scandinavian and Irish immigrants and, much later, by Hispanics and Slavs. It was a closed community – a Christian shtetl – when the first Lubavitch families began arriving in the late 1980s.

The town was then in economic crisis. Banks were foreclosing on family farms, stores were going bankrupt and the local hospital had boarded up its doors and windows.

Postville was in such dire straits that several of its leading citizens offered Aaron Rubashkin $200,000 to re-open an abandoned slaughterhouse that had closed a decade earlier.

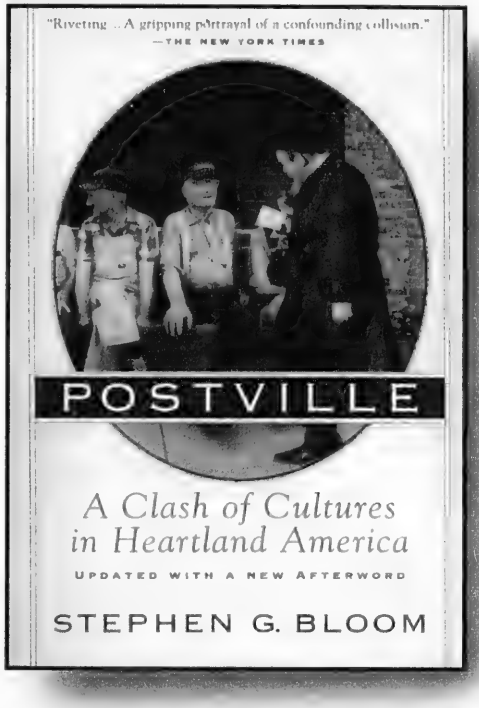
"The locals… needed the Jews," Bloom writes. "They figured that once the Jews came, the slaughterhouse would be re-opened, and with more people moving into town, property values might stop nose-diving."

At first, everyone was happy with the arrangement. But then the marriage of convenience turned sour.

Locals complained that the Chassidim were unsociable, rude and clannish; that their personal hygiene left something to be desired; that they would not allow their children to attend local schools; that they did not care properly for their homes; and that they bargained shamelessly at shops.

In short, the Jews were out of sync with Postville's "natural symmetry." As one man told Bloom, a secular Jew, "These people don't belong here."

Bloom himself was surprised by their physical appearance: "No matter what I knew about chassidic Jews, I wasn't ready for what I saw. Bearded rabbis with long woolen waistcoats marching down the main street. They gestured with their hands, engrossed in conversations that sounded like a mishmash of Hebrew and Yiddish. Everyone seemed to be in a rush, a Hester Street of confusion. A half-dozen Jewish men, some still wearing blood-streaked white-cotton butcher coats and aprons, walked past me, seemingly oblivious to me and everyone else on the sidewalk."



"Riveting ...A gripping portrayal of a confounding collision."
—THE NEW YORK TIMES
POSTVILLE
A Clash of Cultures in Heartland America
UPDATED WITH A NEW AFTERWORD
STEPHEN G. BLOOM

Not everyone in Postville, however, turned against the Chassidim, Bloom says. Shop owners who depended on their patronage thought they were good for business and considered them Postville's "future." Locals in this camp claimed that envy was really at the core of anti-Chassidic resentment.

There was another factor at play, too. The influential pastor of a Lutheran church, Rev. Chuck Miller, told Bloom he was miffed because the Chassidim did not show him respect, much less acknowledge his existence.

In Bloom's view, some of the Chassidim were hardly role models for their cloistered community. "The goyim will always be goyim, no matter how nice they are to you," he quotes one Lubavitcher, identified as Lazar, as saying. "So what's the point?"

Yet, as Bloom observes, plain old-fashioned anti-Semitism was also at work in Postville.

None too enamoured by the chassidim, some residents made sweeping generalizations about Jews. All Jews are greedy. All Jews bargain. All Jews renege on agreements. When the Rev. Miller preached the virtues of tolerance toward Jews, numerous parishioners complained and left his church.

Bloom acknowledges that the people of Postville tend to be close-minded, stubborn and unwilling to bend.

But he has few kind words for the Chassidim, either.

He claims they are insular, suspicious and paranoid, sometimes behave atrociously, demand complete submission and cry anti-Semitism when they disagree with a town ordinance.

Bloom, who sounds like an assimilationist, compares the Chassidim unfavourably with the Reform Jews of Iowa, who, he observes, have always sought to blend in and mix with their non-Jewish neighbours.

Clearly, Bloom fails to realize that assimilation is not the raison d'etre of the chassidic movement.

Sharansky criticizes Canadian government

He criticized the Canadian government for providing funding to the "Canadian NGO" branch of the pro-Palestinian Alternative Information Centre, which issued a recent report accusing Israel of "ethnic cleansing."

"This is a typical example of the new anti-Semitism," Sharansky said.

In his speech at Shaar Hashomayim, Sharansky said the line between legitimate criticism of the Israeli government and anti-Semitism is crossed when criticism starts to resemble the "lies" that were perpetrated against the Jewish people over the centuries.

"What has become unacceptable to say against Jews is now being applied to the Jewish state," he said.

Using Nazi metaphors to criticize Israel is also anti-Semitic, he said, as is singling out Israeli in international forums for denunciation out of proportion to its deeds.

Sharansky calls it the "3-D" test. If "demonization," "delegitimization" and a "double standard" are present when Israel is discussed, then it's anti-Semitism, he said.

Sharansky, once the most famous prisoner of conscience in the former Soviet Union, said in his speech he is saddened that 30 years after clandestinely documenting anti-Semitism in the USSR, he is essentially doing the same job today, only openly.

"We believed that after the Holocaust, there would never be anti-Semitism in the free world again... We thought the explanation for anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union was that it was a totalitarian regime. Now we don't have such an easy answer," he told the audience.

Jews are once again being depicted as "the symbol of evil," Sharansky said. It is most obvious in the Arab world where, for example, Syrian television recently broadcast a 25-part series based on the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, reviving the most vicious canards about Jews.

In Europe and some other Western countries, this demonization takes the form of calling Israel a Nazi state or accusing it of ethnic cleansing, even among journalists, intellectuals and human rights organizations, he said.

"It is legitimate to blame Israel for the fourth generation of Palestinians being in refugee camps, but calling it Auschwitz is not," he said.

Another aspect of the "new" anti-Semitism is the questioning of Israel's right to exist, he said. "In centuries past, Jews were told they were not a nation. In the last two years, more and more people say the Jewish state is not legitimate, that it is an anachronism of the colonial age, that there is no place for a narrow nationalist state."

In the past, Jews were subject to different laws than their fellow citizens, Sharansky said. Today, it is the Jewish state that is held up to a different standard in international organizations.

"The human rights committee of the United Nations has condemned Israel more than it has all the dictators of the world past and present over the last 50 years," he said.

Israel has been accused of violating the Geneva Conventions more often than states such as Cambodia, Rwanda and those of the Balkans, where mass killings have occurred, he said.

Even after Israel was falsely accused in 2002 of a massacre in the Jenin refugee camp by some Europeans, it never received an apology, Sharansky said.

"The Holocaust was possible, not only because of the power of an army, but because so many were convinced Jews were less than human. We can't permit this to happen to the State of Israel," he said.

Nevertheless, Sharansky said he is optimistic. "We are very strong and we have lots of friends who are ready to fight with us," he said, adding that Israel "can win only with the help of moral clarity to see the evil and the moral courage to defeat the evil."

Sharansky was introduced by Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, Sharansky's legal counsel during his imprisonment in the USSR. Cotler said all available legal means should be used to combat anti-Semitism, which he called "the most enduring of hatreds," "an assault on the fundamental values of a free society" and "a threat to peace and security."

He warned against indifference. "The political leadership must stand up against racist anti-Semitism and not look around to see who else is making a judgement. It must exercise moral leadership."

In his speech, Charest promised that his government would "listen attentively" to what comes out of the conference.

To a burst of applause, Charest made it clear that "the absence of a Jewish homeland" was a "determining factor" in making the Holocaust happen.

That plus the fact Canada and Quebec "closed their borders to thousands of people who came here in despair," Charest said.

"It is important that we respect these lessons, that we remind ourselves that this is the reason why Israel exists today."

Charest, who was warmly received by delegates, spent a significant amount of time praising the Jewish community and its contributions to Quebec society, as well as recounting Quebec's historical progress in the treatment of its Jewish citizens and reaffirming the commitment of successive Quebec governments, regardless of party, to fighting intolerance and promoting intercultural harmony and pluralism.

He said the province's financial support for the conference was in line with those ideals.

He said that, as a government leader, "I try to remind myself that no matter how small an act of intolerance might seem, you must never underestimate how important it is for us... to not let them go by in silence."

Other dignitaries at the opening event, co-chaired by Marc Gold and Frederick Krantz, included provincial Revenue Minister Lawrence Bergman and Citizenship and Immigration Minister Michelle Courchesne, and Israeli consul general Marc Attali.

Finding kosher love on the Internet

By SHAWN SHAPIRO
Special to The CJN

CJN Dating [www.cjndating.com], powered by JMatch, is one of the many Jewish Internet dating sites that has arrived on the scene in an attempt to serve the needs of Jewish singles and make Internet dating safe but fun.

Israel Alouf, who heads JMatch, wants to make Jewish dating on the Internet a positive experience. He says the industry has taken off in the past eight years.

"In 1996, 80 to 90 singles sites existed with no clear leader. Some of the bigger sites bought the smaller sites. Today, JMatch is number 2 in the Jewish world of dating services," Alouf says.

"It is part of the booming Jewish Internet dating industry. This is a big coup for the site, which prides itself on its great services."

Alouf said Jewish Internet dating is hot right now, in part because more people are getting married later and the divorce rate is higher. As well, he says, more people today are living on their own than they used to.

"By the time people are in their late 20s and early 30s and school is over, their primary way to meet a person is at the office. They have very little time for the bar scene. It is even more difficult finding someone who is Jewish and in your age range and in your geographical location.

"Jewish singles sites have been flourishing, and spending on these sites has risen about 500 per cent in two years. We have a new breed of matchmakers who are 30-year-old executives armed with laptops, who are there to provide solutions to find a suitable mate."

Alouf says people also like the convenience of being able to log on anytime, without having to dress up or look presentable to meet people. Internet dating also allows you to meet Jewish people from all over the world.

"It is a real great feeling to have all that control in your hands," Alouf says.

With regards to maintaining a safe chatting environment, Alouf says JMatch has it covered. Its staff searches through all the profiles to make sure that the person is Jewish and that the information is correct.

"Every single person is screened," he says. "We want to provide a high-quality service. Every profile is checked to make sure it is well-written and appropriate."

Many people are turning to Jewish matchmaker sites like CJN Dating/JMatch, as well as JDate [www.jdate.com] and other Jewish sites for help in finding the right match. Some users have had good experiences while others have had experiences they'd rather forget.

Adam, from Richmond Hill, Ont., says, "It definitely is a good way to meet singles and you meet a lot of nice people who you would not have normally met if not for the Internet."

Shani has had both good and bad experiences.

"I have made [many] good friends on these datelines; however, I've had my fair share of people who are weirdos."

Erica, from Thornhill, Ont., had a bad experience with Internet dating, but has since learned from her mistakes.

"I had one bad experience where I met someone alone and they sort of took advantage of me, so since then, I never meet a guy alone."

Alouf acknowledges that a lot of people wonder whether it is safe to meet others over the Internet, and offers this advice:

"It is important for people to realize [the Internet] is a channel like the phone, a party or a bar, and the same common sense should apply. Treat people as strangers until you know them better. Meet in a public place and gradually develop a relationship."

Despite its growing popularity, some people are not interested in the Internet and rely on the old methods of finding a date. John says he is not interested "because you just do not know who you are going to meet."

Janet, too, says she relies on more traditional methods.

"The only way I go out on a date is through an introduction from a friend. End of story."

Goalie backstops Cornell to playoff spot

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Hollywood scriptwriter couldn't have fashioned a more dramatic conclusion to the regular season for the Big Red of Cornell University.

With 13 seconds remaining in overtime in the last game of the season, and with a playoff spot on the line, sophomore Vicki Hodgkinson roofed a shot in the top corner to give the Big Red a 2-1 victory over the Vermont Catamounts of the University of Vermont.

At the other end of the ice, Big Red goaltender Flora Vineberg no doubt felt relief and joy that the goal ended the contest and vaulted Cornell into the first round of the playoffs of the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC). As eighth place finishers in a 10-team league, they earned the last playoff position available. Still, eight wasn't bad for a team that had trouble scoring goals and wasn't all that good at preventing them, either.

Netminder's confidence improved during the season

So, for the goalie who was recruited last year as a freshman to a young team and who fought her way to a starting position, the playoff date earned in the narrow win meant all her hard work was beginning to pay off.

True, the win left Cornell in a first-round face-off against a powerhouse Harvard University team that streamrollers the opposition. But playoffs are a new season and, in theory at least, anything can happen. And if confidence counts for anything, Vineberg knows she has made tremendous progress this season, finding a comfort zone and backstopping a weak defensive team that doesn't even have a full roster of skaters.

Although her statistics are not particularly impressive – a 3.26 goals against average (ninth overall) and a .903 save percentage (seventh overall) – Vineberg, 20, believes her abilities have improved a lot over the season. Cornell coach Melody Davidson, who served as an assistant with the gold medal-winning Canadian Olympic team at Salt Lake City, has instilled good team habits. The team is turning around and "I feel I have something to show. I get better and better with competition," she said.

From the time she stepped on the ice as a freshman last year, she believes she has "overcome confidence issues. I stepped it up this year."

Her coach, however, is a little more circumspect in her analysis. Yes, "Flo" has made strides, but she still has a long way to go, Davidson said.

"I would say she's done an average job of it," she continued. "I think she's well on her way to being an accomplished student athlete."

Davidson said Vineberg, like many other young players, must mature and learn self-discipline if she wants to continue to improve. She also has to develop consistency in her off-ice work habits and in her on-ice performance, so that she plays as well versus weak teams as she does against good ones, she said.

Prior to joining Big Red, Vineberg played for the Beatrice Junior Aeros in Toronto as well as the Aeros' senior team. She was recruited by both Cornell and McGill University, but with financial support, she chose to take her chances in the Ivy League.

Last year, she joined a team set with two senior netminders and played in seven or eight games. This season, she earned a starting position and has been in three-quarters of the team's games. In addition to facing off against Ivy League opponents such as Harvard, Brown, Yale and Princeton universities and Dartmouth College, Cornell also competes with other ECAC colleges such as Vermont and Clarkson and Union universities.

In addition to the contingent of Olympians on the Harvard roster, there is a smattering of Canadian and American Olympic players on other Ivy League teams. Vineberg is faced by some of the best women's players in the world and feels she can now compete with them on a daily basis.

"The calibre is amazing," she said on the phone from Cornell. "You're pretty well playing against the best players in the world."

Back when Vineberg was with the junior Aeros, exhibitions or tournaments were usually scheduled with American schools and in one contest against Harvard, she let in eight goals. Needless to say, her confidence suffered.

"That was a huge mental obstacle," she acknowledged. "But I got over it. I do the right things in practice."

Vineberg looked to Kim St-Pierre as her inspiration. As goalie for Team Canada, St-Pierre had been on the losing end of eight straight losses to the Americans prior to the Salt Lake City Olympics. Nevertheless, in the gold medal game, she put that history aside and backstopped Canada to a 3-2 win. "Her ability to focus and block out negative thoughts, that means a lot," Vineberg said.

Style-wise, Vineberg is a cross between a stand up and butterfly goalie. When she came to Cornell, she was more of a stand-up netminder, but with all the close-in plays and scrambles in front of the net, it was imperative she develop a butterfly style to block the bottom half of the net, Davidson said.

Her style a cross between standup and butterfly

During the summers, Vineberg works on her skills at goaltenders' hockey school. She's been playing hockey since she was a little older than five, when she tried the sport at a friend's skating and hockey birthday party. She enjoyed it and her parents signed her up for a boys' select team. She was put in the net for one game and surprised everybody by earning a shutout in her first attempt.

At 12, she left house league hockey for AA calibre in the MTHL, but she feels she wasn't given a chance because she was the only girl on the team.

Disheartened by her treatment, she shifted to girls hockey, playing with the Marlies and then moving to the Aeros.

Vineberg sees steady progress in her abilities and with Davidson as her coach, she believes she can legitimately aim for a spot on the Canadian national team.

"There are a lot of really talented female goalies, but I definitely feel I can compete for a spot," she says.

Davidson agrees – at least as far as the opportunity goes.

"It's totally up to Flo," she said. "She has to mature as a player and a person." She must also devote herself to year round conditioning and keep up with her school work, she said, adding that if she does, anything can happen.

Jewish journalists talking shop

By GARY ROSENBLATT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Guest Voice

More than 50 editors and reporters from Jewish newspapers in the United States met recently in New York for a three-day editorial workshop sponsored by the American Jewish Press Association. These sessions, held every couple of years, tend to be cathartic as well as informative. The journalists swap stories about various pressures they are under from their respective communities. We describe the kind of criticism we get for writing (or not writing) certain articles and seek advice and empathy from each other.

Who else, after all, can better relate to the often lonely, if not embattled, Jewish journalist than a colleague? We prefer to see ourselves as dedicated professionals struggling to balance a commitment to both journalistic integrity and communal sensitivity. But we know that others see us either as troublemakers trying to stir and spread controversy or shills for the Jewish establishment, papering over communal discord – or both.

No doubt there's an element of self-pity at play when we journalists get together, but it's always enlightening. We marvel at how some federation-controlled newspapers have stories vetted by charity professionals before they go to press, and how Jewish organizations and advertisers pressure us to promote their causes. It's a love-hate relationship much of the time, with the organized community wanting to control what the press writes – if not the press itself – while at the same time recognizing that the more independent the Jewish newspaper is, the more credibility it earns for itself and the community it covers.

I have spoken several times recently to audiences about ethics in Jewish journalism – some cynics would say that makes for a very short talk – and found them to be quite interested in how newspapers make tough calls. I shared what was for me an instructive lesson early on in my tenure at The Jewish Week. In fact, it took place during my second week on the job, in the summer of 1993, when I was still more than a bit intimidated by the thought of writing a weekly column intended to appeal to a large and diverse readership while still allowing me to express my views.

It was just before Tisha b'Av, and I wrote about how the rabbinic tradition taught that the Holy Temple was destroyed because the Jews at the time treated each other with disrespect. I said it was an important message for us today, and noted that Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, Reconstructionist and secular Jews could all learn from each other.

If anything, I thought the message was a bit too motherhood-and-apple pie, so I was more than surprised when an Orthodox rabbi from Brooklyn called me the day the paper came out to tell me he wanted to meet me right away. He was furious that I had mentioned the other branches of Judaism in the same sentence as Orthodoxy, giving them what he called false legitimacy.

As I told my wife the story over dinner, I realized the rabbi had liberated me. He made me realize that no matter what I write, no matter how pareve the point may seem to me, it was bound to offend someone. So I might as well write what I believe.

Jewish journalists are easy targets for those who point out the strict prohibitions against lashon hara, or slander.

The Torah source against slander is found in Leviticus 19:16: "Thou shalt not go about as a talebearer among thy people."

Clear enough. But the sentence continues, "neither shalt thou stand idly by the blood of thy neighbour: I am the Lord." I take that to mean there are times when it is necessary to speak out on behalf of those in trouble.

Taken together, the two parts of the passage reflect the delicate balance of behaviour required of each of us, knowing when to be quiet and when to raise our voices. That is a particular challenge for journalists, a responsibility we must never take lightly.

Gary Rosenblatt is the publisher and editor of The Jewish Week of New York. This is an edited version of his column that ran in its March 12 issue.

ROSEMARY RIB ROAST

An impressive centrepiece dish. This looks beautiful when surrounded with sautéed baby vegetables. Start marinating the meat one day ahead. Serve homemade or purchased horseradish alongside.

1/2 cup chopped fresh rosemary
6 tblsps. vegetable oil
8 large garlic cloves, chopped
2 tsps. kosher salt
1 7- to 7 1/2 lb. boneless beef rib roast, tied fresh rosemary sprigs

Grind chopped rosemary, oil, garlic and salt in processor to chunky paste. Place beef in roasting pan. Rub rosemary mixture all over. Cover; chill 1 day. Position rack in centre of oven and preheat to 350°F. Uncover beef and roast until thermometer inserted straight down from top centre registers 125°F for rare, about 1 hour 45 minutes. Let stand 30 minutes. Transfer roast to platter. Scrape pan dripping into cup; spoon off fat. Garnish with rosemary sprigs. Serves 12. Recipe courtesy of Epicurious.

By MIRIAM PORTER

Albert lives around the corner from me. His big black dog is very well-behaved. It never jumps or barks. It just looks at me with big brown eyes that suggest he's had a hard life. Albert's eyes suggest the same thing, except his are a pretty shade of marine blue. He and I have been speaking for the past few months, but I have known about him a lot longer than that. It just took me a while to introduce myself.

I currently live in a fairly small apartment and I would love a bigger place. But I have running water, heat, furniture, and usually, a selection of food in the fridge. I even have the luxury of a TV, radio and telephone. Albert has none of these because he lives on the street.

I walk by him every day on my way to the subway. I have always helped others, so I don't know why I was hesitant to help him. Part of me felt he should get a job or go to a shelter since he appeared "normal" and not physically challenged.

The government provides shelters, right? Every day I made up another excuse about why I should ignore Albert. After all, I do enough charity work, right? It's not my responsibility, and I definitely don't have any extra money. Someone else will help him.

On the night of Toronto's biggest snowstorm this winter, I stopped judging Albert and finally realized I am the "someone else." It does not matter what choices he made or what options are available to him. The fact is he is a human being.

I brought him a big bag of groceries and some cans of dog food for "Blackie." As I handed it to him, my hands were shaking. I thought he would recognize me as the selfish girl who ignored him all the time. But if he did recognize me, he did not let on. He was just really grateful he would be able to eat that day.

I do not always have money to give Albert, but I always acknowledge his existence.

The Torah says we are obligated to help strangers and those in need, and that tzedakah is equal in importance to all the other commandments combined.

It also says, "Love your fellow as yourself."

I believe it is our responsibility as Jews to help the Alberts of the world without judgment.

Vandals strike in 'weekend of hate'

Police chief and premier express outrage

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For the second time in only a week, anti-Semitic vandals struck at the Toronto Jewish community, overturning cemetery headstones, shattering windows and spray-painting swastikas at a North York synagogue, breaking windows at a day school and defacing United Jewish Appeal (UJA) fundraising signs.

Please see related story on page 5

The attacks, which took place last weekend, were immediately denounced by police, community leaders and the premier of Ontario.

Members of all political parties were reported to be co-operating with the premier's office to pass a joint resolution condemning the recent spate of anti-Semitic incidents that have struck Toronto and Vaughan.

The premier's office confirmed a high-level government official will attend a community rally scheduled for 7:30 p.m. Wednesday, March 24, at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Complaint Dismissed

TORONTO — With one reservation, the Ontario Press Council has dismissed a complaint against the Toronto Star by a reader who accused the newspaper of promoting a political agenda on its religion page. Jacob Mendlovic had complained that three feature articles filed from Jerusalem and the West Bank constituted deceitful journalism because they ran on the paper's weekly religion page. He said the articles vilified Israel and had nothing to do with religion. In dismissing the complaint last week, the council said it understood the Star declined to publish a letter to the editor Mendlovic wrote because it was "potentially libelous." But the council conceded the articles "represented only one viewpoint on the Israeli-Palestinian situation."

WORLD

Pope Invited to Shul

ROME — Rome Jewish leaders have invited Pope John Paul II to a 100th anniversary celebration for Rome's main synagogue on May 23. Rome's chief rabbi Riccardo Di Segni says he expects a reply from the Vatican by the end of March.

Passion of the Jews?

NEW YORK — Mel Gibson, who directed The Passion of the Christ, which some say blames Jews for Jesus' death, says he may make a film about Chanukah based on the book of Maccabees. "[Chanukah is] about Antiochus, the king who set up his religion in the Temple and forced them all to deny the true God, and worship at his feet and worship false gods," he told WABC Radio. But the Maccabees "stood up, and they made war, they stuck by their guns and they came out winning," he said. "It's like a western."

Definition Challenged

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee is urging Merriam-Webster to revise its dictionary definition of anti-Semitism. The group wants the publishers to repudiate a "false and damaging" explanation of anti-Semitism, including one definition as "opposition to Zionism: sympathy with opponents of the State of Israel," the Washington Post reported. A spokesperson said the company will likely revise or drop the definition in its next edition in seven to 10 years, as it no longer reflects current events.

Googling for Jews

SAN FRANCISCO — The No. 1 result for "Jew" on the search engine Google is the anti-Semitic website Jewwatch.com, while the second is for a "messianic Jewish" site for CJF Ministries, j. magazine has reported. A link to JewFAQ. org, a Jewish site, is third. The result could lead to a "Google bomb," an organized effort by a group to grab a top spot on the automated search engine, a Google spokesperson said, adding Google has no plans to alter the results of its ranking system to knock Jew Watch from the top spot.

Alone on A-Bomb

JOHANNESBURG — F.W. de Klerk, the last white president of South Africa, says his country developed atomic arms alone, dispelling reports of Israeli co-operation. "We developed our own uranium-enriching process, which is unique in the world," de Klerk told reporters last week. Based on reports of exchanges of military expertise between Israel and the former apartheid regime, analysts had assumed Israeli know-how fuelled South Africa's atomic program.

ADL Forced to Pay

DENVER — The U.S. Supreme Court will not hear an appeal of a ruling that the Anti-Defamation League must pay $10.5 million (US) to a couple denounced as anti-Semites. The judgment stems from a 1994 case in which a Jewish couple contacted the ADL's Mountain States Region after taping their neighbours' phone conversations in which anti-Semitic slurs were uttered. Saul Rosenthal, head of the ADL's Mountain States Region, denounced the neighbours at a news conference. Charges of ethnic intimidation against the neighbours were dropped, and they sued the ADL for defaming them as anti-Semites. A prosecutor later told the Intermountain Jewish News the remarks were meant as sick humour.

Jew Runs for Rightists

LONDON — Members of Britain's Jewish community condemned a Jewish woman's decision to represent a far-right party in a local London election. Pat Richardson, who will contest the seat in June for the British National Party (BNP), denied the party is anti-Semitic and promotes Holocaust denial. "I think that is way, way back in the past," Richardson told the London-based Jewish News. Mike Whine, defence director for the Board of Deputies, British Jewry's umbrella group, said, "It's a matter of great regret that a member of the Jewish community has aligned herself with the BNP, which retains its anti-Semitic and Holocaust ideology."

Arnold's Going to Israel

LOS ANGELES — California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger is going to Israel. The Hollywood star and ex-bodybuilder said he'll visit Jerusalem in May for the groundbreaking of Israel's Museum of Tolerance. He will also use his two-day visit to promote trade between Israel and California.

CJC IN OTTAWA: Deputy Prime Minister Anne McLellan, second from right, met earlier this month in Ottawa with, from left, Canadian Jewish Congress executive director Manuel Prutschi, president Keith Landy, director of government relations Eric Vernon and honorary legal counsel Benjamin Zarnett. They discussed Canada's role in the war on terror and the security of the Jewish community; anti-Semitism in Canada and abroad; Canada's efforts to bring war criminals to justice; and efforts to restore civility to political discourse. CJC held similar discussions with Justice Minister Irwin Cotler.

Pro and anti-Israeli groups clash at York U

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

It was a roller-coaster week at York University.

Last Tuesday, pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian students clashed in Vari Hall while uniformed security personnel and police looked on.

Just before noon, Hillel@York and the Young Zionist Partnership (YZP) began a vigil for all victims of terror outside the hall. The students wore t-shirts that said "If I was a Suicide Bomber," on one side and "You'd be Dead by Now" on the other and presented a display of Jews, Christians and Muslims affected by terrorism.

Soon after 1 p.m., a group of anti-Israel activists marched into Vari Hall, some dressed in Israel Defence Force uniforms that said "Born to Kill" on the back, and others in Arab dresses. The group entered the hall yelling "Occupation is a crime" into megaphones and began preparing mock checkpoints.

In street-theatre style, the soldiers then proceeded to beat and kick the women as they screamed and begged for help from passersby. When the women fell motionless to the ground, the soldiers raised their hands, as if they were holding guns, and then feigned shooting the women in their heads.

The event, which was publicized as "A Day of Action Against Home Demolition," was organized by several groups, including the Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), Al-Awda, Arab Students Collective, CUPE local 3903 International Solidarity Working Group and the Jewish Women's Committee to End the Occupation.

Some of the anti-Israel activists left Vari Hall and continued their presentations in the nearby York Lanes mall, where Carla Girvitz, a Jewish education student, saw them on her way into campus for classes.

A visibly shaken Girvitz said this has been a difficult year for her at York.

"I'm not saying that what Israel does is always right," she said, "but a university should educate people, not present such emotional appeals," Girvitz said.

According to Tilly Shames, Israel affairs director for Hillel of Greater Toronto, the SPHR Day of Action was well publicized on e-mail lists and flyers.

"We met with York University security, as well as with the Office of Student Affairs on Wednesday, March 10, showed them the e-mails being circulated and asked them to let us know what the administration's response would be to the planned checkpoints," Shames said.

The SPHR's email asked for help for the ISM (International Solidarity Movement) actions that "we are holding on Tuesday March 16th on OUR CAMPUS... WHO'S CAMPUS? OUR CAMPUS."

The e-mail asked, "Who wants to [volunteer to] dress up as that mean, dirty inhumane Israeli soldier?"

Many students felt the planned checkpoints crossed the line protecting campus free speech and asked the administration to stop the event from going ahead.

York spokesperson Nancy White said SPHR didn't have a permit or inform the administration of the protest.

When it seemed as if nothing would be done to prevent the checkpoints, the vigil was organized to allow Jewish students an outlet to respond, said Jonathan Moshevich, a York University student, who participates in several campus organizations, including Hillel.

Hillel students requested and received a permit to hold a vigil in the field outside Vari Hall for the same day as the checkpoint.

Tourism in Israel (4)

From the editor's desk

Especially during the early days of the terror war launched against Israel 3½ years ago, the tourist vacuum created by the disappearance of Jewish visitors to Israel was filled, to a significant degree, by Christian tourists.

The noticeable and painful absence of Jewish visitors to Israel during the past 40 months has thus brought into sharp focus a debate generated by the contrastingly very noticeable and quite boisterous presence of evangelical Christians in Israel. The debate concerns the motives for the evangelical Christians' support of the Jewish state. Of course, there are layers of difference, nuances and subtleties among the reasons for evangelical support for Israel. By and large, however, it is true to say that the key reason underpinning that support is theological.

According to evangelical doctrine, Israel's continued existence hastens the second coming of the Christian messiah, which in turn hastens the worldwide embrace of the Christian messiah.

It is not surprising, therefore, that Jews should be uncomfortable with an inter -communal religious scenario in which, theologically at least, one community's ambition is the supersession of the other.

But the diversity of devotions within Christianity also yields a diversity of motives for supporting the Jewish state.

While it is true evangelical Christians may support Israel for an ulterior, ultimate, theological reason, many other Christians support the Jewish state for its own sake, out of the inherent justice in the belief that there should be room on this earth for a single Jewish state.

This was brought home to us very poignantly last month during the Third Prime Minister's Conference For Tourism to Israel.

A large number of our fellow Canadian participants at the conference were clerics, guides, educators or travel industry agents involved in facilitating tours to Israel for Christian groups. Their unequivocal support for Israel was undeniable. Their visits to Israel enhanced the experiences of their own faith, but also expressed support for the Jewish state without any theological strings attached.

Rachel Faith O'Donnell from the small town of Carp near Ottawa first visited Israel in 2000. She told The CJN that "most of us are visual people, so we need to see the places and the images of the stories we worship. Every part of Israel has something new to offer. I wish everybody could see what I have seen in Israel."

For Greg Jones, from Saint John, N.B., this was his first trip to Israel. Jones is regional minister for the Convention of Atlantic Baptist Churches, some 540 churches in Atlantic Canada.

At the end of his first day in the Holy Land, he told The CJN his feelings were of a sense of "connectedness with the immense history that connects the sacred stories of [his] childhood."

Canon Bob Hales, rector for St. James Church in Kingston, Ont., told The CJN: "I love Israel. I am sorry I have not been able to come here these past three years. But coming on this trip is such a treat. You never read the Bible the same way after you've been here."

One of the people who spoke to the large assembly on the first night of the conference was Eric Braeden, star of the popular television soap opera, The Young and the Restless.

"I grew up in the rubble of Germany," Braeden said, "rubble caused by a brutal dictatorship that committed the most heinous crimes of humankind. Personal contact with Jewish friends taught me not to generalize about people."

Braeden talked a great deal about his hopes and dreams for a peaceful future world in which individuals and nations are defined by the qualities they share with their neighbours. But he soon brought his mini-discourse back to the details of his relationship to Israel.

"I went to the hospital today to try to give some comfort to the victims of the suicide bombing [Feb. 22 in Jerusalem]," he said. And then, his voice rising in determination, he told his very attentive audience: "I will do everything in my power to disseminate the message that Israel is a good place to come to visit."

The conference concluded with a festive dinner event at the posh David Intercontinental Hotel in Tel Aviv. At evening's end, we settled into the bus that took us back to our own hotel from the Intercontinental. We were a bone-weary, but happy group.

Someone at the back of the bus started singing the familiar Newfoundland sailor's romp I's the b'y. Everyone joined in, laughing and joking more than singing. The weariness seemed to lift. And suddenly we were in the midst of a sing-along. Someone began the 1950s folk song This land is your land.

The halting, hesitant few voices had become a mellow chorus of harmony and camaraderie. After a few moments, when the concrete exterior of the Carleton Hotel came into view, one of the singers on the bus began to sing O Canada. Then, to my amazement, after one rendering of the chorus, the words transformed into "O Israel."

The entire busload of travellers was singing "O Israel." It was neither a maudlin nor a mawkish gesture, but rather, a sincere, spontaneous act of gratitude and appreciation, a transfer of love, deeply felt, from one place, to another.

It was a remarkable, goosebumpy moment.

Vaad clears misconception about OU products

The CJN received the following statement from the Jewish Community Council of Montreal.

We at the Jewish Community Council of Montreal are concerned regarding the confusion created by the article in The CJN, March 11, pertaining to a change in policy in reference to matzah meal for Passover. We therefore wish to clarify our position.

The Vaad (MK) affirms the high standards of the OU. The Jewish community can rely on all OU-supervised products for Passover and year round, secure in the knowledge that these products meet the highest standards of kashrut.

There are some individuals in our community who observe a standard for Passover to require matzah and matzah meal that is "18-minute." This term is misleading. All matzah is 18-minute in the sense that less than 18 minutes elapse from the mixing of the flour and water until the matzah is baked.

When the Vaad Ha'ir of Montreal referred to 18-minute matzah, this term referred to the practice of some matzah factories where the machinery is stopped every 18 minutes, so that it can be thoroughly cleaned before the next batch of matzah is baked. Regular matzah, such as that supervised by the OU, is acceptable. Thus, the guidelines of the Vaad (MK) accepting OU matzah and matzah products for consumers over the Passover period, has not changed.

However, there are some individuals who prefer to only use "18-minute" matzah on Passover similar to the policy of the Star-K in Baltimore and the OK in New York. Caterers provide for the wider community, including for individuals who prefer to only use "18-minute" matzah meal to accommodate those who wish to observe this standard. The Vaad (MK) confirms that the OU certification is acceptable on products for year-round use as well as Passover.

The Vaad Ha'ir will continue to communicate and consult with the Rabbinical Council of Canada concerning policy changes, in order to enhance the unity and Torah observance of our community.

Vaughan community furious over vandalism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ichil Leib isn't sure if it was the mezuzah on his door that attracted the attention of anti-Semitic vandals. His mother suspects it might be the Romanian-language articles he writes for his B'nai Brith Canada lodge's newsletter.

Regardless, the Leib townhouse in Vaughan, just north of Toronto, was one of two houses and 11 cars smeared with anti-Semitic graffiti in the early morning hours one day last week.

The Leibs awoke to find a painted black swastika on their front door below the message, "Jewz suk."

For 81-year-old Maria Leib, a Holocaust survivor, the vandalism was particularly disturbing. Pointing to the swastika, she said in broken English, "It's impossible for me."

Leib discovered the Nazi emblem on her front door and immediately alerted her son. "My mother discovered it and she said, 'I'm not sure if I'm dreaming,'" Ichil recounted.

Seeing the Nazi symbol on her door reminded his mother of her experiences growing up in the Romanian town of Dorohoi, about 500 kilometres north of Bucharest. In November 1941, her family was deported to a ghetto in Mogilev, in what is today Ukraine.

Leib alerted the police, who began an investigation, but he decided to leave the graffiti in place for a few days as an object lesson in hate for all in the neighbourhood to see. Referring to empty beer bottles in a box down the street, he speculated that the perpetrators were likely young students on March break, although he acknowledged he had no evidence to back up that assertion.

York Regional Police, meanwhile, said two homes and 11 cars were struck between 11:00 p.m. and 7:00 a.m. on Monday last week. The attacks took place between Bathurst and Dufferin, near Beverly Glen Drive. Police spokesperson Kathleen Griffin said it was unclear whether the vandalism was the work of individuals or an organized group.

"We have had incidents of slurs or swastikas being painted on synagogues and things like that, but to have 13 on the same night, it's unusual for York Region, so we're not sure exactly what we're dealing with," she said.

The incidents were quickly condemned by Vaughan's mayor, Michael Di Biase. "It is with sadness and shock that I learned of the acts of vandalism that occurred in the city of Vaughan… Clearly, this anti-Semitic incident is shameful and will not be tolerated or ignored.

"Vaughan is a multicultural city, and we are very proud of this diversity. Every resident of Vaughan joins with our Jewish community in rejecting all forms of racial discrimination."

In a news release from Tel Aviv, Thornhill MPP Mario Racco condemned the incident as a hate crime.

"I am very disappointed that criminals are trying to intimidate our strong and peaceful community by inciting hateful vandalism," he said. "The residents of Thornhill and I will not stand for this foolish and criminal behaviour. We will work with the local police and residents to make sure these perpetrators are punished."

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, applauded the police response to the situation.

"York Regional Police have been absolutely outstanding in this matter, in terms of the empathy and the energy they're putting into finding the perpetrators," he said.

Rudner said those responsible for the vandalism might be youths starting March break "with too much time on their hands." He said the swastika was drawn with the wrong angles, suggesting the perpetrator might not be completely familiar with the symbol, though he added "that in itself is not unusual."

One week before the attacks, B'nai Brith Canada released its annual Audit of Antisemitic Incidents, which reported 584 events in 2003, a 27 per cent increase over the year before. Vandalism accounted for 31 per cent of occurrences. The vast majority of reported incidents – 315 – took place in the Greater Toronto Area.

Edmonton man allegedly an SS guard

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An Edmonton man who allegedly took part in the liquidation of the Warsaw Ghetto is facing loss of citizenship and deportation for his wartime activities.

Justice Department lawyers last week filed court documents alleging Josef Furman, formerly Furmanchuk, was recruited as an SS guard and was trained at the Trawniki camp in Poland prior to serving in a number of murder operations. Furman denied the allegations, telling Canadian Press in heavily accented English, "I was a prisoner in Germany. I was in a concentration camp like prisoner."

Documents filed in Federal Court, which outline the government's case against Furman, tell a different story.

According to the government's statement of claim, Furman, 83, was born in the village of Korochenky, Chudniv, Zhitomir region of present day Ukraine. Furman "trained as an armed guard at the Trawniki SS Training Camp and thereafter served with other Trawniki guards and participated in the liquidation of the Warsaw Ghetto in Poland in April and May 1943 and the Bialystok Ghetto in Poland in August of 1943."

He was subsequently transferred to the German concentration camp of Flossenburg, where prisoners were made to work at hard labour in granite quarries. Furman's duties allegedly included guarding the camp, escorting prisoners to and from work and guarding them there, and escorting transports of prisoners. "Part of [Furman's] duties in guarding the camp included a standing order to shoot any prisoners attempting to escape," the court documents state.

Furman, who lives in a modest bungalow and was reportedly a quiet neighbour, told CP he was never in Warsaw or Trawniki. He claims he spent the war in a work crew after serving as a Russian soldier.

Court documents allege that Furman arrived at Trawniki around June 1942 and was trained in drill, guarding and other activities. As part of the 2nd Trawniki Company, he was sent to Warsaw two days before the uprising began on April 19, 1943.

"The 2nd Trawniki Company participated in the actions in the Warsaw Ghetto clearing, including actions in guarding and escorting Jews," the court documents state. After the uprising, the German commander claimed to have killed or captured more than 60,000 Jews.

In May 1943, Furman was allegedly transferred to Lublin, where he performed guard duties. In August 1943, he was transferred to guard duty at a labour camp at the Bialystok Ghetto.

Two Trawniki companies, including Furman's, "participated in the ghetto clearing and the deportation of the Jewish population to the death camps in mid-August 1943. The Trawniki men were involved in all aspects of the cleansing operation... Their activities included cordoning off the ghetto, conducting house to house searches for Jews in hiding, escorting Jews from the ghetto to the assembly point, guarding them at the assembly point, escorting them to the railway station, loading them onto trains and accompanying the trains to their destinations. It also included shooting individuals trying to escape."

Furman was allegedly transferred to the Flossenburg concentration camp on Oct. 1, 1943 where he served as a guard. The camp had a very high mortality rate.

The Justice Department alleges Furman lied about his wartime service and changed his name when he applied to immigrate to Canada in 1949 and later when he obtained Canadian citizenship in 1957.

As a concentration camp guard, he would never have been admitted to Canada had he been truthful, the documents state.

About three weeks ago, government officials released details of a citizenship case launched against St. Catharines resident Jura Skomatchuk, 83. Both he and Furman allegedly were Trawniki guards and both allegedly assisted Nazi forces in the 1943 "Harvest Festival," the final stages of "Operation Reinhard," the Nazi plan to kill all of Poland's Jews. Afterward, court documents allege, both were transferred to German concentration camps, in Skomatchuk's case, to Sachsenhausen and later Mauthausen.

The Furman case brings the number of Nazi-era removal proceedings to 22.

URGENT APPEAL FOR PASSOVER FOOD FOR NEEDY ISRAELI FAMILIES!

Passover seder is here and in the town of Tzfat, a community in northern Israel, there is an urgent need to relieve hunger. Due to the severe economic downturn, job loss and reduced incomes have left many families nowhere to turn.

THEY NEED OUR IMMEDIATE HELP!

The organizers of the Passover Food Drive in Tzfat, have been involved for many years in providing food to the needy families that have registered for help. Unfortunately, this year over 300 families (comprising 3,000 individuals) have asked for help!

Each package of food that is given to a needy family costs $300 Canadian.

$300 Canadian is not so much in the scheme of things when you have a job.
But for a family left with no income this amount means a Passover seder of dignity and hope.

Any help to these families will be a blessing - let them know you care.

Canadian Dollars Per Case of Food
$185 Meat	$75 Matza	$72 Chicken	$60 Wine
$95 Oil	$55 Eggs	$28 Fresh Fruits/Vegetables

We have no fear

When it is dark, when no one is around to see, slugs and other slimy things slither out from behind the bushes or from underneath the rocks where they are safely hidden to patrol the night. They abhor daytime. For in the full light of day, they can be seen. Light, therefore, sends them scurrying into the ill-lit crevices and cracks of their hiding places until, once again, the darkness of night brings them anonymity and safety.

So too it is with the craven vandals and cowardly thugs who scrawl their anti-Semitic hate messages onto synagogue walls, deface private homes, smash windows and topple headstones. They prowl at night and hide from the day lest their ignorance and cowardice be exposed for all to see.

Of late, alas, vandals have been quite busy in two Jewish neighbourhoods in the Greater Toronto Area.

For the past two weekends, anti-Semitic tripe has been smeared onto our consciousness: two weeks ago, in Thornhill and this past weekend on the north Bathurst Street corridor. The criminals may have targeted only Jews, but in truth, it is the community at large they have attacked. Public officials and peace officers have made this very plain and have affirmed their determination to capture and punish the perpetrators.

Though it is clear the vandals know very little of anything and have less than little character, we want them to know at least this: the Jews of Toronto have no fear of them. We will not be intimidated by hateful, hurtful, craven ignoramuses. We have, rather, only contempt for them and pity for their families. Eventually, the criminals will be found out. The full light of the law will bore through their craven carapaces, if not into their consciences. Until then, however, they will alternate in their cowardly lives between hiding under rocks during the day and defacing unlit walls during the night.

A great moment

It was one of the great, shining moments in modern history, when the courage of men at the peace table gave honour to the courage of men on the battlefield and changed the course of human events. Twenty five years ago on March 26, on a glowing, sunlit day in Washington, D.C., Egypt and Israel signed a treaty of peace. The signing ceremony was the culmination of 15 months of hard bargaining between the two leaders of the country.

After sundown on Saturday night, Nov. 19, 1977, to the gasping disbelief of so many people around the world, Anwar Sadat arrived at Ben-Gurion Airport to begin a short, but epochal visit to Israel.

As he stepped onto the runway, Sadat greeted Menachem Begin with the words: "No more war. Let us make peace." The two men did, ultimately, make peace. And though it has become a "cold peace," it has remained peace nonetheless.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Day school first on agenda

I was pleased that The CJN devoted several pages in its recent education supplement ("Live and Learn," March 4) to the tuition fee crisis in Ontario's Jewish day schools. Your focus on this problem will help push it to the forefront of the communal radar screen, where it belongs.

The accompanying editorial correctly described the unacceptable discrimination that is promoted by our provincial Liberal government with respect to educational funding. And Rabbi Irwin Witty's article aptly suggested strategies that our community leaders would be wise to consider if they want to stem the continued erosion of the community's committed middle class.

I was perplexed, however, by Rabbi Joshua Elkin's view that affordability is not the main issue facing day school education. With 40 per cent of day school parents relying on tuition subsidies, with the middle class of our community becoming more and more marginalized by the increasingly all-consuming struggle to afford day school education, and with the defections from day schools increasing every year, his statement is simply ludicrous.

If our community wants to ensure its health and strength into the next generation, the affordability of day school education must be foremost on the communal agenda.

Bewildered in church, at home in shul

Here is something for anti-Semites to chew on: if Jesus were to return today, he would be completely bewildered in any of the churches that his followers frequent. In fact, the only place Jesus would feel at home would be a synagogue, especially an Israeli one.

Chumras should be for oneself

The main reason given for the Montreal Vaad's new ban on certain matzot for food producers, as given by Rabbi Emanuel of Montreal's Va'ad Hair ("Va'ad bans OU-certified matzah for Montreal food producers," CJN, March 11), is that "the Va'ad has simply decided that when it comes to establishments it supervises, it must uphold the highest standards of kashrut so that even the most stringently observant Jews can feel comfortable with foods bearing its MK."

This trend to cater to the most stringently observant has, unfortunately, become rampant in Orthodox circles. Organizations and experts vie to discover new chumras (rabbinic stringencies) to foist on the average observant Jew. Our parents and grandparents, and their rabbis, considered themselves practising Orthodox Jews without all these chumras.

If we follow Rabbi Emanuel's logic – that the highest standards are needed so that the most observant can feel comfortable – where does it end? What about those who don't eat machine-made matzah but insist on hand-baked shmurah matzah? Shouldn't Rabbi Emanuel logically ban all machine-made matzah so they will feel comfortable?

Chumras should be for oneself. Forcing them upon the general public, and thereby making it more difficult to keep the commandments, is not helping to maintain our traditions. It is contributing to non-compliance and ridicule.

We can't ignore anti-Semitic attacks

As Christians we are appalled at the recent spate of attacks on Jewish homes and property. This is a shameful blot on our city and nation.

We know that silence is deadly, for it emboldens those who hate. We trust that this small letter will let you know we care and desire that those responsible be brought to justice.

We know personally people who have endured the Holocaust. It betrayes them if we ignore what is going on now.

Attacks contrary to Christian values

Sometimes silence can be construed as consent. It is, therefore, incumbent upon us to forcefully express our condemnation and strongest protest against the recent anti-Semitic activities that occurred in the neighbourhood of Thornhill, Ont.

Such cowardly activities are totally contrary to our Canadian and Christian values. Pope John Paul II speaks for all who are called to love their neighbours when on numerous occasions he has said, "Anti-Semitism is a serious sin."

We stand in solidarity with the Jews, our elder brothers and sisters, in calling for due justice to those who brought about these troublesome criminal actions.

Music is no mere frill

I was very disappointed to read the following statement by educational consultant Judy Libman in your "Live and Learn" section ("Helping boys: understanding their learning styles helps academic performance," CJN, March 4) about boys being poor readers: "Boys tend to be involved in… music… rather than activities that encourage them to engage with the world around them."

This remark implies that music is a mere frill that gets in the way of learning an honest business – an attitude the Pilgrims inflicted on the United States. The truth is the opposite: music is an essential human activity that children have a right to be taught.

Can you imagine a wedding, or in fact any kind of special occasion, without music?

Jews, especially, have an affinity for music. For 4,000 years, they have been leading the world in music and song – the Bible calls King David "the sweet singer in Israel," and he was hardly someone who did not engage with the world around him.

On the White House lawn 25 years ago, March 26, 1979

I have come from the land of Israel, the land of Zion and Jerusalem and here I am in humility and pride as a son of the Jewish people, as one of the generation of the Holocaust and the redemption. The ancient Jewish people gave the world a vision of eternal peace, of universal disarmament, of abolishing the teaching and the learning of war.

Two prophets, Yeshayahu Ben Amoz and Micah Hamorashti, having foreseen the spiritual unity of man under God, with these words coming forth from Jerusalem, gave the nations of the world the following vision expressed in identical terms: "And they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks. Nation shall not lift up sword against nation. Neither shall they learn war anymore." Despite the tragedies and disappointments of the past, we must never forsake that vision, that human dream, that unshakable faith.

Peace is the beauty of life. It is sunshine. It is the smile of a child, the love of a mother, the joy of a father, the togetherness of a family. It is the advancement of man, the victory of a just cause, the triumph of truth. Peace is all of these and more and more...

It is a great day in the annals of two ancient nations, Egypt and Israel, whose sons met in battle five times in one generation, fighting and falling. Let us turn our hearts to our heroes and pay tribute to their eternal memory. It is thanks to them, to our fallen heroes, that we could have reached this day. However, let us not forget that in ancient times, our two nations also met in alliance. Now we make peace the cornerstone of co-operation and friendship.

Mr. President of the United States, you have worked so hard, so insistently, so consistently to achieve this goal, and your labours and your devotion bore God's blessed fruit…

It is of course a great day in your life, Mr. President of the Arab Republic of Egypt. In the face of adversity and hostility, you have demonstrated the human value that can change history – civil courage…

But now it is time for all of us to show civil courage in order to proclaim to our people and to others – no more war, no more bloodshed, no more bereavement, peace unto you, shalom, salaam forever.

And it is, ladies and gentlemen, the third greatest day in my life. The first was May 14, 1948, when our flag was hoisted. Our independence in our ancestors' land was proclaimed after 1878 years of dispersion, persecution, humiliation and ultimately physical destruction. We fought for our liberation alone, and with God's help, we won the day. That was spring. Such a spring we can never have again.

The second day was when Jerusalem became one city and our brave, perhaps most heartened soldiers, the parachutists, embraced with tears and kissed the ancient stones of the remnants of the Wall destined to protect the chosen place of God's glory. Our hearts wept with them in remembrance.

"Our feet shall stand with thy gates, O Jerusalem./ Jerusalem is built as a city that is compact together." (Psalm 22)

This is the third day in my life. I have signed the treaty of peace with our great neighbour, with Egypt. The heart is full and overflowing. God gave me the strength to persevere, to survive the horrors of Nazism and of a Stalinite concentration camp and some other dangers, to endure, not to waver in nor flinch from my duty, to accept abuse from foreigners and, what is more painful, from my own people and even from my close friends. This effort, too, bore some fruit.

Therefore, it is the proper place and appropriate time to bring back to memory the song and prayer of thanksgiving I learned as a child in the home of my father and mother that doesn't exist anymore because they were among the six million people, men, women and children, who sanctified the Lord's name with their sacred blood…

That is the Shir Ha'Maalot, the Song of Ascents, written two millennia and five hundred years ago when our forefathers returned from their first exile to Jerusalem and Zion.

"When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dream.
Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing: then said they among the heathen, The Lord hath done great things for them.
The Lord hath done great things for us; whereof we are glad.
Turn again our captivity, O Lord, as the streams turn in the south.
They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.
He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." (Psalm 126)

PRIME MINISTER MENACHEM BEGIN

Begin and Sadat in Alexandria on July 1, 1979

This is certainly one of the happiest moments in my life. It is a historic turning point of great significance for all peace-loving nations… The Egyptian people, with their heritage and unique awareness of history, have realized from the very beginning the meaning and value of this endeavour. In all the steps I took, I was not performing a personal mission. I was merely expressing the will of a nation. I am proud of my people and of belonging to them.

Today a new dawn is emerging out of the darkness of the past. A new chapter is being opened in the history of coexistence among nations, one that's worthy of our spiritual values and civilization…

Men and women of good will have laboured day and night to bring about this happy moment. Egyptians and Israelis alike pursued their sacred goal undeterred by difficulties and complications. Hundreds of dedicated individuals on both sides have given generously of their thought and effort to translate the cherished dream into a living reality. But the man who performed the miracle was President [Jimmy] Carter.

Happily he was armed with the blessing of God and the support of his people. For that, we are grateful to each and every American who contributed in his own way to the success of our endeavour. We are also heartened by the understanding of hundreds of thousands of Israelis who remained unwavering in their commitment to peace. The continuation of this spirit is vital to the coronation of our efforts.

We realize that difficult times lie ahead. The signing of these documents marks only the beginning of peace. But it is an indispensable start. Other steps remain to be taken without delay or procrastination. Much will depend upon the success of these steps. We are all committed to pursue our efforts until the fruits of the comprehensive settlement we agreed upon are shared by all parties to the conflict…

The steps we took in the recent past will serve vital Arab interests. This liberation of Arab land and the reinstitution of Arab authority in the West Bank and Gaza would certainly enhance our common strategic interests. While we take the initiative to protect these interests, we remain faithful to our Arab commitment. To us, this is a matter of destiny. Pursuing peace is the only avenue which is compatible with our culture and creed.

Let there be no more war or bloodshed between Arabs and the Israelis. Let there be no more suffering or denial of rights. Let there be no more despair or loss of faith. Let no mother lament the loss of her child. Let no young man waste his life on a conflict from which no one benefits. Let us work together until the day comes when they beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks, and God does call to the abode of peace, He does guide whom He pleases to His way. Thank you.

PRESIDENT ANWAR SADAT

During the past 30 years, Israel and Egypt have waged war. But for the past 16 months, these same two great nations have waged peace.

Today we celebrate a victory, not of a bloody military campaign, but of an inspiring peace campaign. Two leaders who loom large in the history of nations, President Anwar Sadat and Prime Minister Menachem Begin, have conducted this campaign with all the courage, tenacity, brilliance and inspiration of any generals who have ever led men and machines onto the field of battle…

I honour these two leaders and their government officials who have hammered out this peace treaty which we have just signed. But most of all, I honour the people of these two lands whose yearning for peace kept alive the negotiations which today culminate in this glorious event.

We have won, at last, the first step of peace. A first step on a long and difficult road. We must not minimize the obstacles which still lie ahead. Differences still separate the signatories to this treaty from one another. And also from some of their neighbours who fear what they have just done.

To overcome these differences, to dispel these fears, we must rededicate ourselves to the goal of a broader peace with justice for all who have lived in a state of conflict in the Middle East.

We have no illusions. We have hopes, dreams and prayers, yes. But no illusions. There now remains the rest of the Arab world whose support and whose co-operation in the peace process is needed and honestly sought.

I am convinced that other Arab people need and want peace. But some of their leaders are not yet willing to honour these needs and desires for peace. We must now demonstrate the advantages of peace and expand its benefit to encompass all those who have suffered so much in the Middle East.

Obviously, time and understanding will be necessary for people, hitherto enemies, to become neighbours in the best sense of the word. Just because a paper is signed, all the problems will not automatically go away. Future days will require the best from us to give reality to these lofty aspirations.

Let those who would shatter peace, who would callously spill more blood, be aware that we three and all others who may join us will vigorously wage peace. So let history record that deep and ancient antagonisms can be settled without bloodshed and without staggering waste of precious lives, without rapacious destruction of the land…

PRESIDENT JIMMY CARTER

S. African Jewry: then and now

The years 1952 to 1978 – from the time of my birth to the time I came to Canada – were years of the utmost turmoil in my native South Africa. That was when the apartheid regime was at the peak of its ugly power and when hardly a month would go by without news of further restrictions on basic freedoms or intensified threats to the very fabrics of social justice. And yet, within that difficult and distasteful environment, there existed what to all accounts was a flourishing Jewish community.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

The question that many South African expatriates of my generation have continually debated is how that could have happened. How could a community such as ours, with its track record of not only consistently voting against the government of the day, but also spawning the most visible subgroup of activists and anarchists in the anti-apartheid movement, have survived the way it did, with so relatively little censure of any sort?

As with any historical or sociological inconsistency, the answer lies more in what went unsaid and undone, rather than what appeared at on the surface. And what had really not been adequately documented until recently is that the community, and more particularly its leadership, had to tread a very fine line between their opposition to apartheid ideology and at least lukewarm acceptance of government dictates – even when such acquiescence ran so contrary to their traditionally liberal values and aspirations.

In a cogently presented and comprehensively referenced book titled Community and Conscience (University Press of New England, 2003), renowned Hebrew University scholar Gideon Shimoni provides a compelling account of the predicament that South African Jewry faced during the apartheid era. In reflecting on his research, Shimoni states, in the book's very last paragraph, that "although there is nothing in this record deserving of moral pride, neither does it warrant utter self-reproach." He continues by remarking that "from a coldly objective historical perspective, this was characteristic minority-group behaviour – a phenomenon of self-preservation, performed at the cost of moral righteousness".

Although the destiny of South African Jews in the post-apartheid period has yet to fully unfold, it already seems apparent that their role in the so-called "new South Africa" is marginal at best. Moreover, faced with growing hostility from a radicalized Muslim presence and having to tolerate a government that, like most of its African counterparts, is avowedly anti-Israel in its policies and practices, this dwindling community will likely again have to make the necessary compromises if it is to survive.

In the same way that Shimoni's words rang true for those who had to endure the tyranny of apartheid, they may have equal resonance for those who are left to deal with apartheid's unpredictable aftermath.

Eagerly serving the nation

It was a typically Israeli gathering. Appealingly noisy, informal and rife with human contact and good food. Persian-style rice, zucchini with mint, several kinds of salads, two types of pasta, one quiche, hummus. The generous buffet was inviting, as was the mix of people, the animated conversation and the almost festive atmosphere.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Earlier this month, my wife and I joined some 40 other guests for a party at the home of our good friends and neighbours Gila and Itzik Aharoni. This was no ordinary celebration. It was in honour of their 18-year-old son Elroei's entry into the army. Such parties are a time-honoured tradition in Israel.

"In a way, this tradition doesn't make sense," Gila told me halfway through the evening. "To have a party celebrating that your child is about to risk his life in uniform seems ridiculous. But it's so much more than that. We are speaking after all about Tzhal [the Israel Defence Forces]. This is our army, our sons and daughters, our brothers, our husbands, our friends. Without Tzhal, we have no more Israel. I doubt there's another country whose citizens feel as connected to their army as in Israel."

Every mother and father in Israel becomes emotional on seeing his or her child enter the army. But Gila and Itzik had reason to be more moved than most. For a long time, they thought they might never see this day.

When Elroei was five, he was diagnosed with a severe case of leukemia. For a while, his future was in doubt. He underwent a year of chemotherapy, but it did little good. Doctors said his only hope was a bone marrow transplant. Thanks to suitable bone marrow donated by his sister Liat and the excellent doctors at Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital, Elroei got a new lease on life.

Last week, Elroei began his military service at an air force base. It was not his first choice. He wanted to be a combat soldier, despite the more grueling training and greater danger, but the IDF wouldn't allow it due to his past health problems. It offered him a medical deferment, freeing him of all obligation to serve.

Elroei could have carried on with his life. He could have done what 18-year-olds do in other countries. He could have enrolled in university or found a job. Instead, he volunteered for non-combat military service, with the encouragement of his parents.

"It was not an easy decision," says Elroei. "After all, this is a major commitment involving important years of my life. But I felt it was the right thing to do. In the current situation, our country needs everyone, no matter what job they do in the army. The main thing is to help."

Toward the end of the party, Gila asked for everyone's attention. Among those who wanted to speak was Elroei's 21-year-old cousin Lael. Addressing Elroei, Lael read from a text he prepared for the occasion. "You're about to face the reality of life," said Lael, who will complete his military service in July. "You're about to experience things you've never lived before. Remember that in every experience, you get wisdom in return. Try to make the best of your army service and never give up. Go forward with confidence and the belief that you're worth a lot more than you realize. All of these things and more I have learned in the army."

Elroei seemed to take it all in stride. His father was more choked up. Itzik was emotional and visibly proud of his son preparing for this rite of passage. "This is basically a happy moment," says Itzik. "It's a huge milestone, like a bar mitzvah or graduation. It's positive to see your children grow up. And nothing helps them mature more than serving in the army. They go in still almost children but come out two or three years later much stronger and wiser people better equipped to deal with life."

On the way home, I thought about my own son Etye, who is now 11. I shivered at the prospect of his induction into the IDF seven years from now. Rather than consider Etye's induction party, I preferred to think of his "misibat shichrur" (literally, "release party"), another army-related tradition in Israel. It celebrates the safe return home of a son or daughter upon completion of their two or three years of mandatory army service. If only that could be guaranteed for every family in Israel.

Can Canada learn from Australia?

To the extent that Canadian foreign policy during the Chrétien era was guided by any objective, it was to appear independent of the United States. At the Department of Foreign Affairs in Ottawa's Lester B. Pearson Building, in Neil McDonald's reports on CBC Television, and in the halls of Parliament, the motto was, "Don't get close to Washington."

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

If the United States took a position in UN discussions on arms control, Iraq, Israel, etc., Canada went the other way, or, at best, abstained. To be sure, moral sounding justifications were offered, but the rhetoric lacked substance. Canada may not have joined the Third World or the Arab League, but at times, it was hard to tell.

Ottawa was not the only western democratic country to construct a foreign policy under the banner of anti-Americanism. Under French persuasion, Europe has also done so, particularly since the end of the Cold War. Europe rarely presents realistic alternatives – being opposed to the United States is considered a sufficient goal.

Until recently, Australia followed the same path, and for many of the same reasons as Canada (although Australia does not share any borders with the world's only superpower). Indeed, for many years, Australia and Canada were like two very big peas in the United Nations' multicultural pod. (Canberra was selected as Australia's capital in order to prevent a conflict between Sydney and Melbourne – does this sound familiar?) Both countries adopted a soft idealistic approach to international relations, with a major emphasis on righting the claims of human rights abuses and with a ritual opposition to the use of force to fight for the basic right to security. Among other reasons, this was atonement for treatment of aboriginal populations.

But as Canada clung to obstructionism, Australia changed its position substantially. Last year, while Chrétien boasted that no Canadian forces helped to topple Saddam Hussein's reign of terror, Australian forces patrolled Iraq's desert to prevent the launch of Scud missiles against Israel. At the United Nations, Prime Minister John Howard's government joined the United States, Israel and Micronesia in voting against routine pro-Palestinian resolutions. Unlike Canada and Europe, which abstained on the resolution to send Israel's separation barrier to the International Court in the Hague, Australia voted no and was saved the embarrassment of changing its position a few months later. And Australia no longer wastes taxpayers' money on anti-Israel NGOs flying the false flags of humanitarianism, as is still the case in Canada.

What led the Australian government to part ways with the other naive "middle powers" and adopt a constructive and realistic position foreign policy? Certainly the October 2002 terror attacks in Bali, Indonesia – in which 88 Australians were among those killed – played a role.

But the realization that Islamist terror is not limited to attacks on America and Israel reinforced trends that began earlier. In 1996, after John Howard and Alexander Downer became prime minister and foreign minister, respectively, they started rolling back the politically correct policies that were hostile to the United States and Israel. The values of democracy, security and national defence started to be taken seriously, while the perversions of morality at the United Nations and in other international organizations were rejected.

Australian officials have acted quite consistently to implement these policies, speaking bluntly about deep failures and the need to correct them. As the incoming head of the United Nations Human Rights Commission in Geneva (replacing Libya), Australia is in a position to strip the anti-human rights NGOs and Israel bashers of their preferred access and influence. And contrary to the predictions of the Australian opposition parties, the country's economy has thrived in this new environment.

Back in Ottawa, Prime Minister Paul Martin has a historic opportunity to follow the Australian example by halting Canada's contribution to the subversion of the UN in its demonization of Israel.

Martin's government can turn Canada into a leader of the politically incorrect opponents of terror, regardless of the excuses made for it, and a consistent supporter of democracy, as practised in the United States and elsewhere.

After many years of drift, this would be a welcome change.

The Kirshner File

Peace treaty with Egypt falls short of expectations

Twenty five years ago this week, on a chilly spring day in Washington, D.C., that belied the warmth of the occasion, the Middle East was transformed by the stroke of three pens. On March 26, 1979, the leaders of Israel and Egypt, Menachem Begin and Anwar Sadat, as well as the president of the United States, Jimmy Carter, affixed their signatures to a peace treaty that terminated Egypt's state of war with Israel and enjoined the two nations to foster and maintain "normal and friendly relations."

Sheldan Kirshner in Toronto.

It was a historic moment in the blood-soaked annals of the Arab-Israeli conflict, the first time an Arab country had signed a peace agreement with Israel. It was indeed a watershed. Egypt had fought five wars with Israel and was the preeminent military and political power in the Arab world. Suddenly, Egypt was no longer Israel's arch foe.

The treaty, which paved the way for similar accords with Jordan and the Palestinians, was roundly denounced by Arab states and the chairman of the PLO, Yasser Arafat. Nonetheless, Israel and Egypt implemented the treaty, the framework of which was hammered out at a 13-day summit at the U.S. presidential retreat at Camp David, Md., in September 1978. Israel withdrew from the Sinai Peninsula over a three-year period and Egypt took steps to normalize ties with its former enemy.

Paradoxically, the treaty has been a success, but hardly a model. Israel neutralized Egypt as a military threat, while Egypt restored its its honour and pride by regaining the Sinai, lost ignominiously in the 1967 Six Day War. In this sense, both countries broadly achieved their respective strategic objectives.

But much to Israel's disappointment, it has been a cold peace, and insofar as Egypt is concerned, a grudging peace. Egypt kept faith with Begin's famous admonition of "No more war, no more bloodshed, no more bereavement" by ending its costly military standoff with Israel. Yet in all other respects, Israel and Egypt remain regional rivals, and Egypt has taken palpably few steps to upgrade trade, enhance cultural relations or encourage tourism – the chief ingredients of normalization. Furthermore, Egypt's state-supported media have consistently demonized Israel and perpetuated anti-Semitism. Meanwhile, Hosni Mubarak, the Egyptian president, shows no willingness to allow Egypt's ambassador to return to his post in Tel Aviv. The envoy, Mohammed Bassiouny, was withdrawn in November 2000 in protest over Israel's handling of the second Palestinian uprising.

Two Egyptian parliamentarians, including Bassiouny, plan to attend a special Knesset session to mark the 25th anniversary of the treaty. But in a sign of the times, the speaker of the Egyptian parliament, Ahmad Fathi Sorour, rejected an invitation to address the Knesset.

Egypt's aloof, sometimes hostile, attitude toward Israel stems from a fundamental grievance, a national imperative and general dissatisfaction with Israel's policies.

Egypt believes that Israel violated the spirit, if not the letter, of the treaty by blocking Palestinian statehood. The Camp David accords, the cornerstone of the treaty, called for a self-governing Palestinian authority with full autonomy. The words "Palestinian statehood," which Begin considered anathema, were not explicitly mentioned in the treaty. But Sadat, who promised not to sign a separate agreement with Israel at the expense of the Palestinians, hewed to a different interpretation. On the day the treaty was signed in Washington, Sadat – who was assassinated in 1981 by Islamic fundamentalists opposed to the treaty – called for action, without delay or procrastination, to set the Palestinians on the road to statehood.

In protracted negotiations presided over by the United States, Israel and Egypt bickered over the meaning of Palestinian autonomy. But the talks failed, and in any event, the Palestinians boycotted them. Worse still, from Egypt's perspective, Begin continued to build settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Egypt's refusal to forge warm and comprehensive bilateral relations with Israel stemmed not only from anger over the abysmal failure of the Palestinian autonomy talks. More to the point, Egypt regards Israel as a major rival for regional hegemony. Egyptian journalists and intellectuals have repeatedly declared that Israel should be reduced to its "natural size" and should not be able to challenge Egypt's dominance in the region. The Egyptian elite, which is almost uniformly anti-Israel, has yet to come to terms with the reality that in every important sector – economic, military and scientific – Egypt lags far behind Israel.

From the outset, and even now, Israel and Egypt have been at odds over a panoply of Mideast issues. Egypt condemned Israel's 1981 bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor. Egypt lambasted Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, recalling its ambassador from Tel Aviv and not bringing him back until four years later.

Israel's decision in 1989 to give up Taba, a small enclave south of Eilat, ended Israel's last territorial dispute with Egypt and ushered in an era of warmer relations. But Egypt and Israel remained at loggerheads over Israel's refusal to recognize the PLO.

The 1993 Oslo peace process, which took Cairo by surprise, brought a brief period of Israeli amity with Egypt. But a nasty dispute with Egypt in 1994 over Israel's disinclination to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty prompted Israel's prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, to complain of an "ill wind" blowing in from Cairo. Since then, Egypt has continually urged Israel to dismantle its arsenal of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons.

EGYPT AND ISRAEL SIGN FORMAL TREATY, ENDING A STATE OF WAR AFTER 30 YEARS; SADAT AND BEGIN PRAISE CARTER'S ROLE

CEREMONY IS FESTIVE

The situation went from bad to worse following Benjamin Netanyahu's election as prime minister in 1996. Netanyahu, whose career was defined by his opposition to the Oslo accords and Palestinian statehood, personally assured Mubarak that he would press ahead with the peace process. But within months of their highly-publicized meeting in Cairo, Mubarak accused Netanyahu of prevaricating and of double-crossing him. Subsequently, Mubarak charged Israel with undermining the peace process by expanding settlements, building the Har Homa housing project in eastern Jerusalem and reneging on the 1998 Wye Memorandum.

Moving beyond rhetoric, Egypt led an Arab League campaign to stymie Israel's efforts to deepen relations with Morocco, Tunisia, Oman and Qatar, and it boycotted a 1997 economic conference in Qatar that Israel attended.

It was no better when Ehud Barak, a land-for-peace advocate, was Israel's prime minister. During and after the 2000 Camp David summit, Mubarak turned down a request by the U.S. president Bill Clinton to exert pressure on Arafat to present a counter-offer.

Since Ariel Sharon's election as prime minister, Israel's strained relations with Egypt have worsened. Pointedly questioning Sharon's commitment to a peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict, Mubarak has claimed that as long as Sharon is prime minister, "there will be no peace between Israel and the Palestinian Authority."

In addition, Mubarak has blasted "Israel's policy of oppression in the Palestinian territories," described Israel's 2002 occupation of the Palestinian autonomous areas as "barbaric," opposed Sharon's tactic of isolating Arafat and criticized his decision to build a security fence through the West Bank. As a result, Mubarak has rebuffed requests from Sharon for one-on-one meetings, though he has spoken to him on the phone and met with his envoys in Cairo.

For its part, Israel has been none too pleased by the porousness of Egypt's border. Since 2001, Palestinian infiltrators have crossed into Israel six times, killing one Israeli soldier and wounding several others. Apart from lodging a formal protest over these attacks, Israel has upbraided Egypt for apparently letting Palestinians smuggle weapons into Gaza through tunnels originating in Egyptian territory.

And symptomatically, Mubarak has discouraged the full flowering of normalization. He attended Rabin's funeral in 1995, but otherwise, he has resolutely stayed clear of Israel. Two years ago, Mubarak cut agricultural ties with Israel, and he was conspicuously mum when an Egyptian administrative court disbanded the pro-Israel Cairo Association for Peace. Similarly, Mubarak remained silent when a noted Egyptian playwright, Ali Salam, was shunned after visiting Israel and writing a book about it.

And yet there are silver linings in the clouds. Egypt supported the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan and persuaded rejectionist Palestinian elements to agree to last summer's short-lived ceasefire. And now, Egypt stands ready to assist Israel in a unilateral withdrawal from Gaza. But Israel and Egypt still have a long way to go before they can completely normalize their tense relationship.

71 year old Toronto woman loses 20 pounds!

"Yippee!! I actually lost 20 pounds — and all because I saw an ad in the paper. After years of yo-yo dieting I have conquered my bad habits and now fit nicely into a size 8. I feel this is a huge accomplishment for someone who is 71 years old.

I must say that I had always been distrustful of hypnosis. However, I felt this was my last resort. I've tried everything else: shots, diet pills, liquids, and so on. I suffered with all of them, and in six months the weight returned and then some.

Hypnosis encourages you to eat properly and you never feel hungry. All cravings are gone. I exercise almost every day, not because I have to but because I am motivated and enjoy it.

Before I complete this unsolicited testimonial, I must mention another benefit from learning hypnosis through my program. My problem was not being able to sleep nights without taking sleeping pills. During the process of hypnosis I have learned to relax, so much so that now I am able to fall asleep in the most comfortable relaxed state, without medication. I could go on and on praising the qualities and benefits of hypnosis.

Thank you, Positive Changes !!!"

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.

-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is April 26th, 2004.

Jewish Life

We must make Pesach

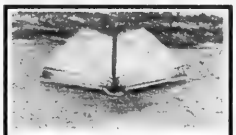
By RABBI MORDECAI E. ZEITZ



It's all a matter of how you say a word or do a deed. The most innocent act can become a "cause célèbre" while a seemingly grievous situation can become a building block for the future. It's all in how you see or say it.

The perfect example is in the opening word of the book of Leviticus. It appears in the Torah with a small alef, and we know that any imperfection in a single letter in a Torah scroll renders the scroll unacceptable to use. Yet, there it is. The message and challenge is clear: it's what you see or say that changes the very nature of the experience.

An almost invisible alef would create the phrase "vayiker," a chance or accidental relationship. A larger alef creates the word "vayikra," a constant and ongoing calling or relationship. It is the alef in each of us, our personal involvement or sense of worthiness, that determines whether any relationship – be it with God, people, spouse, family or community – will be a haphazard accident of fate, or ongoing and continuous, growing stronger and more meaningful each day. Our view of the alef ultimately determines the nature and quality of our very being.

The same can be said of Pesach, the most widely celebrated Jewish holiday. Whatever the variations in our practice – Ashkenazi, Sephardi, denominationally or culturally – the common denominator is Pesach and the seder. Yet, again, the significance of Pesach in our Jewish lives is symbolized by the choice of a word. We don't just celebrate Pesach, we make Pesach – "mir machen pesach."

In a world inundated by the spectre of terrorism, a stagnant economy and a worldwide renewal of anti-Semitism, mir machen Pesach – we make an oasis called Pesach. Through our actions, we declare our independence and our liberation from thoughts of gloom and doom. That's been the key to our success – making Pesach a sanctuary of real Jewish life.

Not too long ago, during a time of war, persecution and extermination, another generation faced the prospect of no Pesach. Little David and his family sat around the table with no wine, no matzah, maror of the wrong kind and no charoset – nothing but Nazi intimidation and liquidation. Nearby houses were in flames and the sounds of war drew closer as a few brave Jewish resistance fighters tried to stave off the inevitable.

David turned to his father and said: "I have recited the four questions by heart and you have answered with the Haggadah almost by heart. But, may I ask you a fifth question? Father, will I be here tomorrow?"

Tears streamed down the father's face. He turned and hugged his young son and said: "My dear child, I cannot truly answer your question. I do not know if I will be here tomorrow. I do not know if you will be here tomorrow. But one thing I know. There will always be Jewish children like you in the world who will continue to make Pesach."

We are those children, and we must give Pesach a real future in the hearts and minds of the next generation. But the redemption of that promise to little David is realized only when we make Pesach, thus transforming our awareness of Pesach into actually making, and thereby personalizing, it.

It means cleaning the house and hunting for chametz. It means being aware of a change in diet. It is the singing, saying and discussing, not just the kneidlach and four cups of wine. Making Pesach is being part of a continuing drama of freedom and achievement and finding joy in life despite the uncertainty that surrounds us.

And it's not restricted to Pesach. Being Pesachdik – being filled with hope and determination – is a year-round experience. Let us resolve to make Pesach this year so as to enjoy yamim tovim, good and meaningful days, all year long.

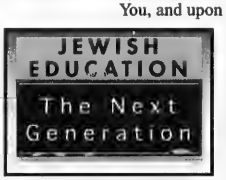
Important to understand our enemy

By ELLIOTT MALAMET



How does one explain passages of great anger in the Haggadah, which seem to imply that we feel unforgiving towards the Egyptians and indeed yearn for great vengeance and retribution? Is this what we should be telling our children about our enemies – that we desire their annihilation?

The Haggadah rejoices in divine power but also depicts Jewish powerlessness, and sections of seething rage thus emerge. The climax of such passages comes at a time that should be the antithesis of violent fantasy, after we have consumed our festive meal and have sat back and thanked God. We now pour the fifth cup, as it were, set aside for the prophet Elijah. As a child, that was one of my favourite moments of the entire seder, and I would rush to the door to open it for Elijah, and greet him in the night air as if he were entering my house.

But had I paid more attention to the accompanying words, I might have been startled: "Pour out Your wrath upon the nations that do not know You, and upon the kingdoms that do not call upon Your name; for they have consumed Jacob and laid waste his habitation. Pour out Your rage upon them and let Your fury overtake them. Pursue them in anger and destroy them from under the heavens of God."

The language here doesn't deal only with the Egyptians, but with all those – past, present and future – who attempt to defeat a system of morality in the world and ultimately see the triumph of the amoral. This passage is not a call for holy war. We ask God to destroy the enemies of morality, not human beings with weapons and fundamentalist ideology.

In Jewish thought, the embodiment of total evil, of anti-morality, is the nation of Amalek. The Torah bids us to exterminate the nation and the memory of Amalek, to wipe out anything even remotely connected with it. It is a very harsh ethic, but it has a clear underpinning. The enemies of ethical morality cannot be tolerated.

On the other hand, the Torah advocates a policy of potential reconciliation with the Egyptians: "You shall not reject an Egyptian, for you were a sojourner in his land." (Deut. 23:8) The Egyptians and the Amalekites represent (from a biblical perspective) a certain kind of prototype. And since they can sometimes seem to resemble one another, which is which?

That is the most painful question we now face as Jews. To put it as clearly as possible, when we look at the enemies of Israel today, what do we see? An opponent who is motivated by territorial desire, who has no great love of Jewry but can understand the principle of rational self-interest? For if that is whom we are dealing with, then we have "Egyptians" in our midst and we can find a way, eventually, to negotiate with such people. But if the Arabs are "Amalekite," bent on destroying the Jewish nation for its own sake, then we cannot make the fatal mistake of viewing them as Egyptians. There is very little margin of error in this choice, because to choose wrong can mean great catastrophe for the land and people of Israel.

Harvard doctor gives people hope

The Anatomy of Hope: How People Prevail in the Face of Illness*, by Jerome Groopman, Random House, $36.95.

Life without hope is hopeless. If we could not hope for a second chance when life inflicts a severe defeat on us, if we could not hope for strength when we have been betrayed, if we could not hope for healing when we have been bruised, if we could not hope for eternity when the winter of our lives drives home the inescapable fact of our mortality – if in all these trials, hope did not sustain us, the burden of life would become insufferable.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Dr. Jerome Groopman, a professor at Harvard Medical School, has practised haematology and oncology for more than 30 years. He writes that "true hope" has the power to alter neurochemistry. "Belief and expectation—the key elements of hope – can block pain by releasing the brain's endorphins and enkephalins, mimicking the effects of morphine. In some cases, hope can also have important effects on fundamental physiological processes, like respiration, circulation and motor function. During the course of an illness, then, hope can be imagined as a domino effect, a chain reaction in which each link makes improvements more likely. It changes us profoundly in spirit and in body."

Now, when he meets a new patient, he listens to his or her history, performs a physical examination, reviews laboratory tests and studies x-rays. "I am doing more than gathering and analyzing clinical data. I am searching for hope. Hope, I have come to believe, is as vital to our lives as the very oxygen that we breathe."

Unlike "false hope," which denies reality, "true hope" confronts grim facts and strives to achieve wellness as part of a personal philosophy that includes courage and positive faith.

He suggest that hope builds on itself, with each increment making the next increase more feasible. "The familiar poetic phrase 'hope flowers' captures this catalytic process. And the growth of hope is not strictly linear, always expanding."

Hope, then, is constructed not just from rational deliberation, from the conscious weighing of information. It arises as an amalgam of thought and feeling, the feelings created in part by neural input from the organs and tissues.

The author, a staff writer on medicine for the New Yorker magazine, writes movingly about a number of patients who, over time, taught him about the power of hope. In a revealing personal account, Groopman described how he endured 19 years of severe back pain, a period filled with pain and frustration, until he forged new hopeful beliefs.

He is contrite: "I realized that the surgeon had said to me what I had so ineptly said at times in my career to others, that there was no hope. Medicine is too uncertain a science, biology too variable, to have that kind of hubris."

The author's final words: "Each disease is uncertain in its outcome, and within that uncertainty, we find real hope, because a tumour has not always read the textbook, and a treatment can have an unexpectedly dramatic impact. Science may progress in time to produce new therapies that can make the incurable curable. "

A simply written book, The Anatomy of Hope presents an often overlooked verity – that the process of healing has a human, as well as a medical, dimension.

Pesach foods for special diets - Pt.1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Here are some figures to chew on until the seders arrive: One matzah has 140 calories, equivalent to two pieces of bread. Four standard wine glasses of grape juice have 680 calories. And even that Pesach staple, the walnut, has 694 calories per 100 grams [http://info.jpost.com/2000/Supplements/Pessah/w2.html] And one more statistic: the average Israeli gains about two kilograms during Pesach. Do you think we're so different on this side of the Atlantic? Whether you've decided to cut down on the fat, meat or calories, or are vegetarian or diabetic, there are plenty of Passover dishes you can enjoy while watching what you eat.

To keep those kilograms off during Pesach, nutritionist Fran Berkoff recommends using "a good non-stick pan, some chicken broth or vegetable broth for sautéing or as a base for salad dressings. If a recipe calls for a half-cup of oil, try cutting to a third and, if this works, try cutting down even further. Substitute unsaturated oils for chicken fat in traditional recipes and perk up flavors with lemon juice and/or generous amounts of fresh herbs. Instead of piling lots of butter on your matzo, try some jam… Finish your meal with sorbet rather than something richer." [www.canoe.ca/HealthNutritionFile/020327.html] Foodfit.com suggests a low-fat Passover dinner including roasted asparagus salad, and herb-roasted cornish hens with rhubarb sauce topped off by lemon sponge cake with strawberries. [www.foodfit.com/ cooking/passover_menu.asp]

You can avoid oil-and-egg-laden dishes if you cook creatively. Even Philip Goldwasser's mother doesn't buy 20 dozen eggs, as she did when he was a kid. How did she do it? "First, use less eggs! Any dish that calls for eggs can usually be lessened by one egg. Not all dishes, but most. Another way to deal with this is to substitute egg white for eggs. Let's say that you have a recipe that calls for four eggs. You can use 2 whole eggs and 2 egg whites." [http://makeashorterlink.com/?G168521B7]

At Vegetarian Fatfree Passover Recipes, you'll discover how to make healthy brownies, cabbage soufflé pudding and English trifle. The "Matzah-rella lasagna" calls for matzot, tomato-mushroom sauce, oregano, basil and fat-free mozzarella and cottage cheese. [http://euler.ecs.umass.edu/pass-veg/] At Beit Chatulim, you'll find recipes for baked eggs in zucchini with hollandaise sauce, banana nut matzah kugel and something called "not-chicken soup." [www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/pschrcpt.htm] You'll find more vegetarian Pesach recipes at About.com. [http://vegetarian.about.com/library/weekly/aa041000a.htm]

Rather than suggest assorted vegetarian dishes, some websites detail entire seders. The VegSource site goes one better and gives complete Ashkenazi and Sephardi seders. Sephardim can enjoy date charoset, lemony leek and mushroom soup, eggplant matzah mina and Sabbath rice pilaf with saffron. Ashkenazim can go with mock chopped liver, charoset, Russian potato mushroom croquettes and mushroom matzah farfel pie. [www.vegsource.com/passover.htm] (Note that one Ashkenazi recipe calls for string beans. Traditionally, Ashkenazim refrain from beans, legumes and rice on Passover.)

People with diabetes must constantly monitor their diet to maintain normal blood sugar levels. The Jewish Diabetes Association tries to make their lives a little bit easier during the holiday [www.jewishdiabetes.org] by putting out a great guide titled "Eating Right for Passover." Information in the bilingual English/Hebrew booklet includes: using a food scale on Pesach; how to time your taking of insulin with the seder meal; sugar substitutes that are kosher for Passover; illustrations of recommended quantities of matzah to eat; glucose and carbohydrate levels for common Passover wines; and how to water down wine and still fulfill the mitzvah of drinking four glasses. [www.jewishdiabetes.org/Pesach2003.pdf]

What can someone with diabetes enjoy on seder nights? Diabetic-Lifestyle.com recommends charoset, spring vegetable soup with scallion and dill-flecked matzah balls and grilled pineapple with raspberry purée. [http://euler.ecs.umass.edu/pass-veg/] And at Diabetic-Recipes.com, you'll find a Passover menu with roasted leg of lamb, fresh asparagus with lemon and fresh strawberries and rhubarb. [www.diabeticrecipes.com/menus/apr98_6.htm]

Next week, how to enjoy the holiday without aggravating your food allergies.

Israeli cabinet minister opposes unilateral Gaza withdrawal

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli Housing and Construction Minister Effi Eitam says he will leave Ariel Sharon's coalition government if the prime minister goes ahead with plans for a unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

"It doesn't make sense. Israel doesn't get anything in return," Eitam, the leader of the far-right National Religious Party, told enthusiastic supporters recently at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

In urgent tones, he added, "Nothing but a deep crisis will come out of it. It will shake Israeli society and its political stability very seriously."

A unilateral pullout from Gaza would violate one of the NRP's "red lines," Eitam said.

"We won't be part of a government that destroys and transfers Jewish settlements," he said, referring to Gaza's outposts.

"I can tell you for sure, if God forbid, we don't stop Sharon's initiative, we shall be in the opposition, and very aggressively."

Eitam, a fervent champion of the settlement movement in the territories, tempered his comments by warning that the Labour party could well form Israel's next government if Sharon is brought down.

Effi Eitam

A former army general, Eitam said he is at a loss to explain Sharon's recent decision to withdraw from Gaza in the near future.

"I don't know what happened to him," wondered Eitam, who said he once admired Sharon.

Nevertheless, he described Sharon in glowing terms as "a loyal patriot," "a rock," and a man he still loves.

Eitam, who said he has met with the prime minister several times lately, speculated that Sharon may be "tired" and has lost faith in the strength of his fellow Israelis to resist the current Palestinian uprising.

He urged Sharon to retire if he has grown weary of fighting back. "The people of Israel are not tired!"

Sharon's resolution has weakened, Eitam said, because he is not steeped in Torah. "This has happened also to his predecessors," he observed to a round of applause.

Eitam said he will also be compelled to pull out of the coalition if one of its other members, the anti-clerical Shinui party, alters Israel's religious status quo.

"We don't believe the Likud will allow Shinui to change the basic status quo. But if we fail in this area, I'm not sure we can stay in the government."

Eitam said he tried to build bridges between Shinui and the religious community, but the experiment has been " a great disappointment."

According to Eitam, Shinui is an "extremely secular and anti-Jewish party. We can't build bridges with them." Referring to Shinui's leader, Eitam said, "I thought Tommy Lapid would be a partner, but he's not."

Earlier, while discussing aliyah, Eitam said Israel can solve its demographic problem, caused in part by the higher birth rate of its one million Arab citizens, if Jews in the Diaspora are permitted to vote in general elections.

Addressing his audience directly, he said, "It's intolerable that people like you, who love Israel, have no right to shape its future, while Ahmed Tibi [an Israeli Arab parliamentarian who has called for a secular state] can vote in the Knesset and make Israel's future decisions."

Diaspora Jews who reside in Israel part of the year, own an apartment there and sign a loyalty oath should be entitled to vote in Israeli elections as a way of countering the influence of Arab voters, he said.

Speaking in a more philosophical vein, Eitam said that Zionism, in its present form, should be revived so that it is grounded in national and religious values.

"Israel must be a very special, unique state, based on holy, pure principles," he said. And Israelis must free themselves as "slaves of the golden calf."

If Jews in Israel can build a "holy nation" and a "holy state," they will be better prepared to cope with adversity, Eitam said.

And in a reference to aliyah, he asked rhetorically:"Why should anyone go to a place that's quite dangerous and where the standard of living will drop?"

After saying that many Israelis are ignorant of Judaism, Eitam added that only immigrants with a nationalist and religious outlook can withstand the rigours and pressures of contemporary Israel.

It's not a coincidence that about 90 per cent of new olim are observant, he said.

"Let's join in a common effort [to create] a higher form of aliyah."

Making Jewish Toronto accessible to all

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

According to Statistics Canada, in 2001, 3.6 million Canadians living in households had physical, psychological or health conditions that limited their daily lives, representing a disability rate of 12%.

This suggests that of the approximately 180,000 Jews living in the Greater Toronto Area, over 21,000 may have a disability.

With those statistics in mind, and responding to the findings of a 2002 conference entitled "Opening the Doors," UJA Federation's Community Planning & Allocations Committee (CP&A) formed a task force to promote incorporating inclusion principles into UJA Federation planning.

Chaired by Stan Kugelmass, the inclusion task force was created to promote full access for all members of Jewish Toronto and to give them a greater opportunity to participate in and contribute to their community.

"We want to facilitate change within our Jewish community and promote the principles of inclusion," says Kugelmass. "We want planners to think of inclusion as an important priority. Inclusion is one of the basic values of Judaism."

Rhona Shulman, Chair of the UJA Board of Jewish Education's Tikum Chaim initiative, and an organizer of the July 2002 conference, brought the recommendations from that conference to UJA Federation.

"I am quite pleased with how things are going so far," says Shulman. "We asked for the formation of a task force, and we asked them to review our Jewish community's facilities and programs with regard to accessibility. We want to identify what we are doing right, and where there are still gaps that need filling."

An inclusion task force has been created to promote full access for all members of Jewish Toronto. (Courtesy of Barry Shainbaum Photography)

To that end, Kugelmass and the task force have already held preliminary discussions with planners of two new Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiatives—the Vaughan Campus at Bathurst and Weldrick, and the Central Campus at the Bathurst JCC.

"Although planning is at an early stage for those campuses, we want to make sure we get the message out, clearly, that inclusion is fundamental to the planning process," says Kugelmass.

Unique school teaches its own

Of the 70 day and supplementary schools associated with UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, the chances of finding one more unique than Mississauga's Bet Sefer Solel are slim.

It's at this particular school – which will be celebrating its 30th anniversary in May - where teacher-parent meetings take on a whole new meaning, as its teachers are also the parents of its students.

"Each Sunday, a handful of adult and teen volunteers walk into Bet Sefer Solel," says Arliene Botnick, Solel's education director. "They are our unsung heroes – our volunteers who come well prepared, full of enthusiasm, and ready to perform a miracle each week. The miracle is that 225 Jewish students attend regularly to learn, enjoy, and celebrate their heritage and faith."

In all, there are 40 volunteer teachers at Solel who work 30 Sundays a year.

Solel Congregation's Rabbi Lawrence Englander, a member of the Order of Canada, and a teacher at Bet Sefer Solel, echoes Botnick's enthusiasm.

"Ever since the beginning of Solel, we have kept to the principle of teaching our own," he says. "Every Sunday morning, I continue to walk into a miracle."

One of Solel's "unsung heroes" is Judy Miller, 56, who has taught at Solel for 25 years. She is also the President of Solel's congregation.

"I got involved in teaching at Solel after watching Rabbi Englander teach one day in 1976," says Miller, who at one time taught her own daughter at the school. "The rabbi is such an incredibly gifted and charismatic teacher, it inspired me to do the same. I took their teacher-training classes in 1978, and began teaching in 1979."

According to Miller, what makes Solel so unique and successful is that concept of teaching its own.

"It's all about Dor l'dor, generation to generation," she says. "We pass on Jewish heritage one generation at a time. I have the wonderful fortune to see children who were once my students eventually become my assistants, then, ultimately, I will teach their children, too. It's vital in terms of Jewish continuity, to educate each and every Jewish generation. That's what we do."

Chris Bowden, 49, is a Grade 2 teacher at Solel, along with husband Brad Bas, who teaches Grade 7 Hebrew and Grade 8 Torah studies. They are also the proud parents of 8-year-old son Natan, a Grade 3 student at Solel.

"We do it partly because we want to show our own kids what we expect from them as Jews, about giving back to their community – as we do as volunteers," says Bowden.

"Thirty years ago, this area in Mississauga had only a handful of Jews," says Botnick. "Today, 350 families belong and, in large part to our incredible volunteers and the tremendous support we get from UJA and its Board of Jewish Education, this area is now a thriving Jewish community."

New fitness facilities at Nadal Centre

The new Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, a joint project of UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, is embarking on the construction of its exciting state-of-the-art health and wellness facilities. The new facilities are expected to open in November 2004.

The Nadal JCC, the new 143,000 square foot facility delivering athletics, health and wellness, culture, art, and education to its Jewish and non-Jewish members alike, recently replaced the aging Bloor JCC – a fixture for 50 years at the corner of Bloor and Spadina.

Among some of the exciting and highly anticipated new features of the health and wellness facilities are:

- A family change room where children and their parents can change in privacy as a family
- Group change rooms for boys and girls classes
- New men's and women's change facilities
- A private women's workout area
- 15,000 square feet of new cardio and weight training areas
- 4 new multi-use studios for Pilates, aerobics, etc.

A recent gift from Fred Shore, a long-time user of the Bloor and Nadal JCC, has also allowed the complete refurbishing of the Centre's aquatic pool.

Phil Levine, chair of the construction committee for the new fitness facility, is confident that it will be a big hit with users.

"We're thrilled with the unanimous support given to us by the Board of the Nadal JCC for these first-class fitness facilities," says Levine.

The Nadal Jewish Community Centre offers something for everyone.

Michael Levy, past president of the Sports Clubs of Canada, and Bally Canada, who has volunteered his services to the Nadal JCC to plan and build the new centre, recently expressed his excitement and support for the project.

"The new facilities will keep the heart and soul of the old Bloor 'Y' alive and well," says Levy. "With lounge spaces, wet and dry steams, and, at the same time, bringing in the latest in equipment, programming and customer services, the Nadal JCC is doing everything possible to meet the needs of the local community."

Debby Hirshman, past executive director of the Manhattan JCC, and a consultant on the project agrees.

"This transformation of the old 'Y' into the new Nadal JCC reflects a growing trend in urban Jewish centres. It also reflects on the forward-thinking nature of Toronto's Jewish community to have invested in, and to have built, such a wonderful structure right in the heart of the city."

David Green, a longtime member of the Centre and a member of the construction committee, looks back – and ahead – to the new facilities. "Twelve months ago, when mould forced the closing and gutting of the centre's change rooms, it was devastating. Looking back today, that calamity has turned into something of a gift. It allowed us to reevaluate and develop brand new facilities and services that will benefit our members. The wait will have been well worth it. We now know where we are going and how we are getting there thanks to the leadership of UJA Federation which has worked with us to ensure our continuing success."

Prominent Canadian business leaders journey to Israel

Senior business executives on intense 48-hour mission to the Jewish state

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

A very special 48-hour mission returned from Israel recently, giving its participants, non-Jewish, high profile Canadian business executives, an insider's look at the current situation faced by Israel and her people.

The mission, initiated by Elan Pratzer and UJA Federation, and sponsored by Canada's newest Israel advocacy organization, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), included a specially designed itinerary, making it an especially intense two days.

Highlights of the trip included a private briefing from Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, a helicopter ride to view the new security fence, and a meeting with a unit from the Israeli Defence Forces in the Golan Heights.

"It was the most incredible two days you could imagine," says Pratzer, Managing Director, Rose Private Equity Group. "To us as Jews, the situation is clear, but to see others from outside the Jewish community be exposed to the reality of the situation and be moved by those truths so much gave me a sense of hope. It made me a firm believer in the need for more outreach and Israel advocacy efforts."

One of those participants from outside the Jewish community was Robert Pearce, President and CEO, Personal & Commercial Client Group, Bank of Montreal. It was Pearce's first visit to Israel.

Elan Pratzer (right) shares a moment with Israeli PM Ariel Sharon.

"The first thing that I recognized was just how incredibly beautiful Israel itself is," says Pearce. "After meeting with Israelis, I was so impressed by the passion they have for their country, their people, their heritage, and just life in general. The Palestinian situation is such a mess, and will continue to be – until something is done about finding good, strong Palestinian leadership. That leadership is crucial to improve things in the Middle East, and yet, as of today, there is none."

"It is important that we take these influential members of our non-Jewish community to Israel in order to educate them about what Israelis must live with day-to-day," says Yossi Tanuri, UJA Federation's Emissary of the State of Israel, who joined the others on the trip.

Participants on a unique 48-hour mission to Israel met with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in Jerusalem.

The morning after arriving in Jerusalem, the 17 mission participants were taken to a lunch meeting with Prime Minister Sharon.

"It is with great pride that I am hosting you here today," Prime Minister Sharon told his guests during the meeting in the Cabinet Room at the Prime Minister's Office. "It is our hope that when you return home to Canada, you bring the message of the free world coming from Israel, the only democracy in the Middle East."

"At our final dinner in Israel, many tears were shed by members of this very special mission," says Pratzer. "The tears came as they discussed not only the plight of Israel and of Jews, but they were shed also for themselves as they came to realize that Israel and the Western world both face threats from the same terrorist organizations. It was a real eye-opener for all of us."

For Carol Wilding, President & CEO, Foster Parents Plan in Canada, her Israel experience was beyond anything she had expected.

"It was my first visit to Israel, and like the others, I had high expectations, but this trip – even though it was only 48 hours – exceeded all my expectations," says Wilding. "It's one thing to watch the news to find out what's going on, but to be there, to connect with the people of Israel, really hits home. Now that I have a better understanding of the Middle East, I'll be going back to Israel soon with my children."

"I'll tell you, if you want to feel irrelevant and pampered, grow up in Canada as I did, and then go visit Israel," says Pearce. "Make no mistake, 'intifadah' is war. It just so happens it's dressed up in suicide belts rather than uniforms."

New York, New York

Eighteen members of UJA Federation's Major Gifts Division recently took part in a special two-day leadership experience in New York City. The event, chaired by Karen Basian, Michael Buckstein, Stephen Goldhar and Mark Waldman, gave participants the opportunity to meet with and hear from some of North America's leading experts in business, politics and philanthropy. The ultimate bat mitzvah gift

By WENDY LAMPERT
UJA Federation

When most Jewish teenagers are preparing for their bar or bat mitzvahs, they think about many things – the meaning of this important Jewish rite of passage, their fears of singing the wrong tune or tripping on their way to the bima, and of course, the presents.

Kady Goldlist

But Kady Goldlist, 14, is not your typical teenager. When she was preparing for her bat mitzvah 18 months ago, she decided to do an extraordinary thing.

"We were planning my bat mitzvah when all these bombings were going on in Israel. I wanted to do something for the families who were affected," Kady said. "I didn't really need anything, and I felt like it would be better for me to give than to receive."

So in lieu of gifts for her, she asked her guests to contribute to the fund she established through the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's Bar/Bat Mitzvah Program. She then allocated those gifts to the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) OneFamily Fund. The fund provides direct financial, legal and emotional assistance to victims of terror and their families to help them meet immediate and long-term needs.

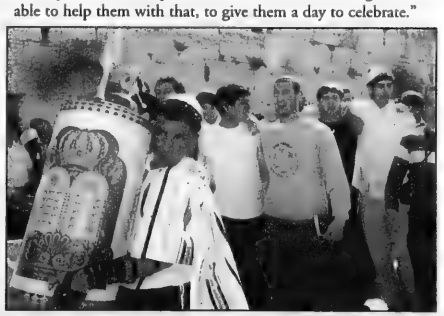
JAFI is UJA Federation's overseas partner.

Kady's gift was used to help run a group bar/bat mitzvah for 71 young people from all over Israel at the Kotel in Jerusalem last month. The participants and their families were greeted by the Mayor of Jerusalem, entertained by a military singing troupe, treated to a tour of the Kotel tunnels and hosted by Israeli President Moshe Katsav at his residence. They were all excited to know that a young woman from Canada cared enough to donate her bat mitzvah gifts to help them.

"It is heartwarming to hear about people from overseas who think about us," said the mother of one of the bat mitzvah participants, who was injured in a 2002 bus bombing. "It lets us know that we are not alone."

"I'm extraordinarily proud of her," said Kady's mother, Rosylin Goldlist. "She made an impact on the lives of these children. She felt good about it, and it was a good example to her friends," she added.

For Kady, this experience has taught her about the value of Tzedakah. "I gave, but I also got something back," she said. "These people have been through so much. And they need special experiences to help them rebuild their lives. I'm glad I was able to help them with that, to give them a day to celebrate."



Part of the group bar/bat mitzvah program held recently for 71 young people at the Kotel in Jerusalem.

El Al increases flights to Israel

Unprofitable Toronto-Tel Aviv route could still be cut

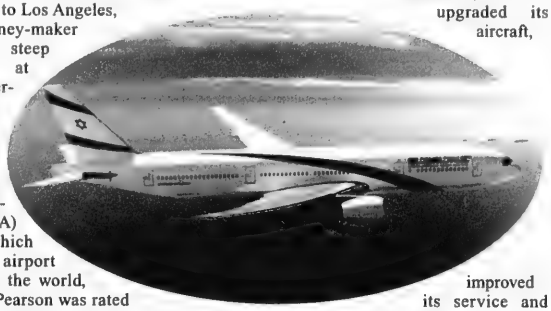
By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

El Al, Israel's national airline, recently announced profits of $6.35 million (US) in 2003, but the Toronto-Tel Aviv route remains a break-even proposition at best.

Nevertheless, the airline last week added a fifth weekly flight and will boost that number to eight weekly flights beginning June 27 to serve burgeoning passenger traffic to and from Israel, said Stanley Morais, the airline's Canadian general manager.

El Al is leasing a Boeing 767 to handle the extra load, but despite the expected high summer volume, the Toronto route may be re-evaluated by head office if it proves to be weak, and Canadian passengers could be re-routed to New York as an alternative, Morais said.

He said international traffic to Israel improved substantially in 2003 after two bad years, and the Toronto-Tel Aviv route also saw impressive numbers. Last year's positive trend is expected to continue during the summer, but the Toronto route, which continues on to Los Angeles, is not a money-maker because of steep charges at Pearson International Airport.



Referring to an International Air Transport Association (IATA) report, which examined airport costs around the world, Morais said Pearson was rated the fourth most expensive airport in the world. Landing fees and other charges have made the route practically unprofitable. It costs airlines $13,071 (US) just to land a 747 at Pearson, up from $3,250 in 1997, a 300 per cent increase, he said.

Other costs experienced globally by El Al also increased in 2003, including fuel and security. However, those expenses were more than offset by major increases in revenues. Revenues in 2003 increased by 6.2 per cent over 2002 to $1.2 billion (US), with cargo revenues jumping 12 per cent.

John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York remains El Al's busiest international destination, with three 747s taking off daily, five time a week.

Passenger traffic from Paris and London was also strong in 2003, as Jewish travellers flocked to Israel for visits. Eilat was a particularly attractive destination, Morais said.

Morais, who took over as Canadian general manager a year ago, said the airline is taking a chance by going to eight weekly flights this summer, but he believes travellers' reticence to visit Israel is slackening. He has noticed that individual and family travel is increasing while organized solidarity missions and group travel – the airline's mainstay over the past few years – is dropping off.

"People are tired of the solidarity missions. They did it for three years and they are tired of it." Instead, they are booking their own trips so their visits to Israel are more relaxed and they can spend more time at the beach, in restaurants and touring, he said.

"The numbers in regard to growth year over year look good from El Al's perspective. We see that as people get used to the [security] situation they are going to Israel for fun. [They are saying] let's go to Israel and see it as it should be experienced."

Morais said despite the increased numbers, there is plenty of room for the Canadian market to grow. "We see the same 15 per cent of the [Jewish community] make up 80 per cent of the travellers."

The airline continues to attract passengers through brand loyalty. Gestures such as lighting Chanukah candles at the departure gate and gifts of sufganiot add to the travelling experience for many travellers, he said.

In addition, El Al has upgraded its aircraft, improved its service and made its flights more convenient. During the summer, passengers will be able to choose between morning and evening flights on Sundays, Tuesdays and Thursdays, Morais said.

He recalled that when he took over as general manager, "it was a very low valley for us. But soon after that, we began to see growth."

During the year, headquarters in Israel laid off 300 contract workers in Israel, and the Toronto office reduced staff to 15 from 18, he said.

Meanwhile, the airline had to contend with other difficulties. The SARS outbreak hit its profitable Tel Aviv-Hong Kong route hard, and the airline attracted unwanted notoriety in October 2003 when one of its flights was diverted to Hamilton over security fears at Pearson. Morais said Canadian authorities overreacted to a perceived threat, but the airline did not suffer long term consequences when Toronto flights resumed.

El Al's agreement with Air Canada to allow each airline to book passengers on the other's flights was recently suspended. The need for such an arrangement decreased as both airlines increased flights to Israel, allowing both to better serve their passengers, Morais said.

Morais said fares during the summer will likely reach $1,600 to $1,700, but a $50 to $100 surcharge may be imposed to meet extra costs at Pearson.

Despite that, Morais expects business to be strong. If it isn't, he conceded, it's possible the airline will re-evaluate the need for its base in Toronto.

Morais, however, believes the Canadian market can support a full schedule through Toronto, proving to decision makers in Tel Aviv that El Al's Canadian operation is worth retaining.

No part of Israel immune from terror: Horovitz

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

David Horovitz, the editor of the Jerusalem Report magazine, says the terrorism Israel has experienced over the past 3½ years is a strategic onslaught, with no part of the country immune to its effects.

"There is nowhere in Israel where we could do what we're doing now – sit together for an evening and be confident that we wouldn't be targeted," he said in a recent lecture sponsored by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Speaking at Beth Sholom, Horovitz, the author of the new book Still Life with Bombers: Israel in the Age of Terrorism, said it was an unwritten assumption that Hebrew University, attended by thousands of Arabs, was off-limits to terrorism. But that assumption was shattered when a bomb exploded in the university's cafeteria in the summer of 2002, killing several people, including someone whose office the bomber had just painted. "That bombing actually wiped away the last notion of a safe haven."

Hebrew U bombing changed everything

Despite the ever-present fear of terrorism, Israelis are cautiously leading something very close to normal lives, and "not huddling at home terrified of suicide bombers," Horovitz said. "I think we have become resilient. I think we've decided that we're not going to be terrorized."

He added that recent Israeli emigration has been a trickle rather than a stream because, two generations after the Holocaust, Israelis want to hold on to a state in which they can control their own destiny.

Horovitz said Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's rejection of a Jewish Israel, at the September 2000 Camp David summit, unleashed the terrorism of the second intifadah. Arafat turned down then Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's offer of a Palestinian state in most of the West Bank and Gaza, Horovitz said, because he wanted the right-of-return for four million Palestinians. Giving the Palestinians the right-of-return, Horovitz added, would have been national suicide for Israel, which has a population of 5.5 million Jews and 2.2 million Arabs.

A supporter of the two-state approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Horovitz said he held a centre-left political position until recent weeks. Now, he's no longer sure where he stands on the political spectrum of Israel, where the "right-wing prime minister of Israel, head of a movement that as its platform has a position that said there can be no Palestinian state," advocates unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank.

Israelis are taking Ariel Sharon's remarks seriously despite some cynicism about the prime minister, who is under investigation for alleged financial misconduct related to election financing.

"There are people who are saying that Sharon is trying to initiate dramatic policy shifts to make it harder for the state prosecutors to indict him," Horovitz said. "It's unduly cynical to make such an assessment, particularly in Israel where the prosecution is widely perceived to be genuinely independent."

Horovitz said it's difficult to be optimistic about the Israelis reaching a settlement with the Palestinians in the near future because of the number of daily terror alerts in Israel. On Purim, there were more than 50.

"Arafat has encouraged terrorism and I think it's unarguable that he's financed terrorism," Horovitz said, "and Palestinian television is still broadcasting material that encourages terrorism.

"I cannot imagine that there will be a profound shift to the point of terror becoming a rare event unless there is a [Palestinian] leadership that is sending a very different signal."

Responding to a question from an audience member, Horovitz said the West Bank security barrier now being built is not going to make Israel impregnable to terrorism, but when the barrier is complete it will be a help.

Retired envoy raises funds for Ethiopian students

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

A former Israeli ambassador to Ethiopia was in Toronto recently to raise money for scholarships for Ethiopian immigrants to attend university in Israel.

Asher Naim

Asher Naim, one of five retired Israeli ambassadors who founded Keren Hanan Aynor Scholarship Fund for Ethiopian Jews (KHA) 10 years ago, said he hopes the fund will raise $70,000 (US) to pay university tuition, books and living expenses for 300 Ethiopian immigrants in Israel.

Last year, the foundation gave scholarships to 237 students, but ran out of money and had to turn down about 40 students. "We're hoping not to refuse anyone this year," he said.

Any Ethiopian Jew who has been accepted into an Israeli university is eligible for a scholarship. The amount given is based on individual need. Students are encouraged to stay in school beyond a bachelor's degree. This year, there are 30 Ethiopian students in master's programs and one law student. Next year, the first Ethiopian doctor in Israel will graduate from medical school.

"We are doing this because we are convinced that it is the only way we can bring Ethiopian immigrants into the Israeli social fabric and to avoid the creation of underclass black ghettos in Israel," Naim said. "If we don't handle it quickly now, we will lose the battle. There will be ghettos, frustration, unemployment, illiteracy."

According to the Israel Association for Ethiopian Jews in Jerusalem, about 70 per cent of Ethiopian families have no income, and the average Ethiopian salary is below the poverty line.

As well, most Ethiopians work in non-professional fields, but Naim and his colleagues hope that will change.

"The goal is to create an Ethiopian leadership. We want him to see an Ethiopian [professional] sometimes. It creates self-pride and confidence that he can do it. It's not only a white man's world."

Naim made his pitch at a gathering in Richmond Hill of about 25 people at the home of Rose and George Rosenzweig. He regaled an audience with tales of his years as the Israeli ambassador to Ethiopia in 1990 and 1991. He was one of the people behind the 1991 Operation Solomon airlift, which brought more than 14,000 Ethiopian Jews to Israel within 30 hours on the eve of a civil war.

In Addis Ababa in 1991, Naim had to negotiate with the Ethiopian dictator Mengistu Haile Mariam, who demanded that Israel provide him with tanks and weapons to fight the nearing rebel armies, in exchange for allowing the Jews to leave.

Naim's strategy was "Never say yes, never say no, give him nothing he wants and keep him happy." A colleague later described the mission as an exercise in "how to feed the lion with grass and keep him happy at the same time."

This was Naim's first fundraising trip to Canada. Earlier in the week, he raised $3,000 in Ottawa. He plans to return to Toronto in the fall.

Naim has also served as an Israeli envoy to the United Nations, the United States, Korea, Finland and Japan.

Manhigut Yehudit leaders call for 'real' Jewish state

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In non-violent Israel-wide protests in the mid-1990s, Moshe Feiglin, the leader of the far-right Zo Artzeinu (This is our Land) movement, railed against the Oslo accords and opposed any withdrawals from the territories.

He was jailed for six months after being convicted of sedition and unlawful assembly.

In 2001, Feiglin and like-minded Israelis formed the Manhigut Yehudit (Jewish Leadership) faction and brought it into the Likud party with the broad objectives of stiffening opposition to the Oslo peace process, strengthening religious Zionism, taking control of Likud and converting Israel into what they felt would be a "real" Jewish state.

Current minister of education Limor Livnat, a hardline Likudnik, warned recently that a gang of right-wing extremists had infiltrated the party and are a danger to the state and Likud itself.

Last week, Feiglin and his colleague Shmuel Sackett, the international director of Manhigut Yehudit, appeared at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation to promote their views and raise funds for their cause.

The crowd was thin, but the rhetoric was thick.

Feiglin, a wan, professorial-looking man in a sombre suit and tie, said Manhigut Yehudit, with 135 members in Likud's 2,800-strong central committee, is striving to bring back "the Jewish spirit to the Jewish state."

Feiglin, who has described the Palestinians as "a cancer that must be removed," declared, "We're trying to take the Jewish people and put them on the right track."

Israel can't survive unless it is a Jewish state, as opposed to a state of the Jews, Feiglin said. "We want to create a Jewish leadership for the first time. That's our strategic goal."

A father of five who lives in the West Bank town of Karnei Shomron, he warned that Israel can't be like all other nations. "This is our craziness," he said, adding that Israel must be different, a light onto the nations.

Denouncing the land-for-peace concept, the basis of all Mideast peace initiatives since the 1967 Six Day War, Feiglin said, "You shouldn't give away places that connect us to our past." He was referring, in part, to Hebron and the Temple Mount in eastern Jerusalem.

Feiglin, who advocates the expulsion of all non-Jews who don't recognize Jewish sovereignty over the historic Land of Israel, called for the murder of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

Accusing Arafat of financing and organizing terrorism, Feiglin said, "He can be killed in no time. Why don't we do it?"

Sackett, an American-born resident of Karnei Shomron who made aliyah in 1990, said Likud has a contradictory Palestinian policy.

The party's platform officially opposes a Palestinian state, yet its leader, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, has embraced the "road map" peace plan, which envisages a two-state solution.

Alluding to the current Palestinian uprising, Sackett said Manhigut Yehudit has the answer to terrorism, but he did not elaborate.

Admitting that Manhigut Yehudit is fighting Likud from within, Sackett said the faction hopes to win over 400 delegates in Likud's central committee.

"We are rising in Likud to lead Israel," he thundered. "We offer a real program."

Appealing for financial assistance, he asked everyone in the synagogue to donate $100 each.

But even before he and Feiglin had finished their respective talks, audience members were already leaving the shul.

MPP VISITS ZAREINU: Mario Racco, MPP for Thornhill, recently visited Zareinu Education Centre to observe the intensive educational and therapeutic services the school provides. School principal Carol Goldman and executive director Randy Spiegel provided Racco with an in depth look at the school's innovative program for children with autism spectrum disorder, modelled on Dr. Ronald Leaf's California-based ABA (applied behavioural analysis) program for school-age children. Here, Racco and Goldman watch language pathologist Barbara Fenton work with a mother and child in Zareinu's infant intervention program. This was Racco's first visit to a York Region school since being elected to office.

Israeli trade consul seeks volunteer assistance

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For much of the last few years, Israel's economy has been in the doldrums, a far cry from its heyday in the 1990s when it went on a tear, registering 10 per cent average yearly growth.

By the '90s, the Israeli government had loosened its constraints on the economy and entered into free trade agreements with the United States, the European Union and Canada. Many Israeli firms determined their future was to go global.

Today, many Israeli corporations are world players, but although it's not exactly a well-kept secret in Canada, domestic business people don't usually associate Israel with transnational corporations.

Ephraim Shoham hopes he can continue to raise the domestic profile of Israeli firms while brokering deals and increasing business ties between the two countries. Since September 2003, Shoham has served as consul and trade commissioner of Israel's Economic Mission to Canada, taking over from Benjamin Noy.

He has travelled from coast to coast trying to acquaint Canadians with the advanced nature of the Israeli economy, whether it's the conglomerate Teva, which is active in pharmaceuticals, or Ormat Turbines, a leader in electrical products. Others include Iscar, a manufacturer of sophisticated metal cutting tools, and Amdocs, a leader in customer relationship management software.

Israel is a world player in many high tech areas, he said, but "the main problem for Israel is marketing. We have excellent products and free trade, but we need better presence in the Canadian market to sell it to Canadian customers."

With his two-person staff in his Toronto office and an even smaller satellite office in Montreal, Shoham is exploring other ways of selling Israel to Canadian business. Recently, the economic mission distributed a letter saying it "is looking for volunteers to assist Israeli manufacturers to look for applicable customers, distributors or representatives in Canada.

"Such volunteers are expected to mentor an Israeli company, look for a Canadian customer/partner/agent/representative and create the initial contact between the parties."

The effort is being conducted in co-operation with the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce, which is promoting a "shake hands with Israeli industry project." The chamber believes "one key to remedy the economic recession and the unemployment rate is to increase Israeli exports," particularly for small to medium-sized businesses.

Shoham said one of his main goals is to "build a network of marketers and salespeople. We get a lot of requests from Israeli companies, almost every day, to get Canadian agents, companies or consultants."

Since his arrival in Canada, Shoham has introduced himself to Industry Canada and the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade. He has also sought governmental assistance to meet with representatives of Canadian corporations that could make use of Israeli products, and he's made contact with chambers of commerce across the country.

In meetings with firms such as Magna, CIBC, Royal Bank, Bombardier, Four Seasons Hotels and others, he promotes Israeli products that he feels would be appropriate to the respective business.

Ephraim Shoham

With his 24-year background in government and industry – most recently as director general of Israel's Industrial Co-operation Authority – Shoham is familiar with Israeli products and their availability. Not only does he suggest goods that could assist Canadian firms, but he also advises on possible Israeli partners for joint venture products.

The Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation is an agency that finances development projects involving companies from the two countries. Earlier this month, it announced grants totalling $2.5 million. Elbit Systems of Israel and MacDonald Dettwiler of Canada, Mekorot National Water Company and Zenon Environmental, Kilo-Lambda of Israel and Metconnex of Canada, Moonlight of Israel and DigiScreen of Canada received the grants, which make up 50 per cent of the expenses for the joint projects.

Shoham believes visits to Israel are another way to promote trade and said a series of conferences on biotech, the environment, security products and telecom are scheduled for the next few months.

He said there is plenty of room to increase bilateral trade while promoting Canadian investment in Israel.

In 2003, Israel exported goods to Canada worth $318.4 million (US) while importing products worth $233.4 million (US). He hopes to double Israeli exports by 2007.

"My goal is to really increase the level of trade between Israel and Canada. As part of my job, I encourage Canadian companies to bid on Israeli tenders. We have very little presence of Canadian companies in Israel," he said.

The right Israeli partner is key

Gil Blutrich, president of Skyline-International Development, is a successful entrepreneur who has tested the waters in both Canada and his native Israel.

Back home, his firms boast a number of real estate investments, while in Toronto, he recently announced the opening of the Pantages Suites Hotel, a boutique lodging in the heart of downtown that offers kosher facilities for guests.

Though now quite active in the Canadian real estate market, Blutrich retains an intense loyalty to the Jewish state. The Tel Aviv Stock Exchange has registered growth of more than 50 per cent in the past year and there are signs Israel's economy is starting to recover. Interest rates are dropping and the overall mood is brightening, he says.

But, he warns, investors contemplating a move into the Israeli market "must find the right Israeli partner because of the huge difference in the mentality."

Speaking specifically of the real estate market, Blutrich suggests that Canadian investors "need trustworthy, well-known Israeli partners" to help steer them clear of trouble they would otherwise not anticipate.

The laws and practices relating to real estate are quite different in Israel – with much shorter closings and little opportunity for due diligence or to line up financing after an offer is made. Some investors who failed to partner with reputable Israelis have paid a steep financial price, he says.

Canada continues to offer hot prospects for Israeli real estate investors. "There are big time investments by Israelis in Canada," he says. Israelis with surplus funds continue to look abroad for diversification to locales that offer good returns at reasonable risk. More than $4 billion has been invested by Israelis in Canadian investment properties.

Meanwhile, Blutrich has subscribed to an initiative being promoted by the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce to consider Israeli suppliers when local companies consider inventory purchases. Even if they allocate 10 or 20 per cent of the purchase to an Israeli supplier, that makes a difference to Israeli companies suffering from years of recession, he says. –P.L.

Defensive 'mitzvah' war relevant today: prof

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Traditional Jewish law and rabbinic interpretations provide justifications for going to war and Israel's right to possess weapons of mass destruction, says Brandeis University professor Reuven Kimelman.

The rabbinic literature teacher, who was speaking on Jewish Ethics of War and Mass Destruction as part of the 2004 Shoshana Shier Distinguished Visiting Professor lecture series at the University of Toronto, said there have traditionally been two types of wars in Judaism.

"There is the war of mitzvah... which is a [mandatory] war fulfilling a divine commandment... and there is the [discretionary] war of reshut... which is a war approved by the court," he said.

Kimelman said the historical "mitzvah" wars with the seven nations of Canaan and the Amalekites are no longer "operational in modern ethics," but the third type of "mitzvah" war, which is a defensive war, is relevant today.

Dispossessing the seven nations of Canaan – the land God promised to the Jewish people - was legitimized because there was concern Jews would "follow the ways of the [seven nations]," who were idol worshippers.

The war with the nation of Amalek, who fought against the ancient Hebrews after they fled from Egypt, was justified because "they represented a policy of total evil.

"If anybody [today] meets that policy, it would of course be the Nazis," Kimelman said.

Today's "mitzvah" wars, such as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, are defensive or reactionary.

"This is when the enemy has already attacked and you respond," he said.

The wars most difficult to justify are those that are fought for political and economic reasons.

"According to Jewish law, these wars... are permissible, even though they're not defensive," he said.

Kimelman, who is working on a book that explores these themes, said the Sanhedrin, the Jewish supreme court, decides whether or not war should be pursued.

Some 10 rules authorize this type of discretionary war, including the stipulation that "the declaration must have been preceded by overtures of peace and other resorts must have been tried," said Kimelman, quoting Jewish texts. There are also rules regarding wartime conduct, including a stipulation for the need for "avenues of escape for noncombatants" and a prohibition against "unnecessary killing of the enemy."

Kimelman said these principles have been upheld in modern Israeli conflicts.

With respect to Israel's possession of weapons of mass destruction, Kimelman said few rabbis have broached the topic.

But those who have talked about it say Israel needs such weapons "in order to deter murderous aggression."

Kimelman quoted the prophet Isaiah, who urged transforming weapons of destruction into "weapons of construction."

He advocated pressuring Israel to end its nuclear weapons program, as long as all other countries, most notably Israel's enemies, abide by the same disarmament conditions.

Multi-faith panel 'disagrees without being disagreeable'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A multi-faith panel discussion featuring a rabbi, an imam and a priest went so well last year that organizers at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue decided to invite the same speakers to return – this time to focus on some of their differences instead of their commonalities.

"This is a great opportunity to create understanding... and build harmony," said Imam Abdul Hai Patel, national co-ordinator of the Islamic Council of Imams, who joined Rabbi Martin Berman and Rev. Damian MacPherson for the recent event.

"People get the message, 'If the leaders can sit together, then why are we squabbling among ourselves?" added the imam. "This is the beauty of pluralism in Canada."

"When you disagree without being disagreeable, then you've accomplished a lot," Rabbi Berman said.

The discussion focused on three topics: abortion, what God wants of us, and who gets into heaven.

Both Judaism and Islam, unlike the Catholic church, permit abortion under certain circumstances.

If a woman's life is threatened as a result of her pregnancy, abortion is not only warranted but demanded, said Rabbi Berman, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and spiritual leader of Shaar Shalom Congregation. A partial birth abortion does not meet the criteria for a permitted abortion, he noted.

Likewise in Islam, abortion is considered necessary if the mother's life is endangered, said Imam Patel. In addition, abortion is permissible in cases of adultery or rape, if it can be performed in the first four months of the pregnancy. In exceptional situations, he added, Muslim scholars are "flexible" and permit abortion even after four months.

In the Roman Catholic church, abortion is "never under any circumstances" permitted, said Rev. MacPherson, the director of ecumenical and interfaith affairs for the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto.

He explained that in Catholicism, life is considered to begin at conception. "Even when it's a choice between the mother and the child, obviously extreme attention goes to both, [but] the moral teaching of the Catholic church is preserving the new life."

If a pregnant woman aborts as the result of medical intervention required for a health problem such as cancer, "the church teaches that that is OK," he said.

Rabbi Berman said he has "great misgivings" about government legislation in an area so fraught with debate. He is a strong believer in the separation of church and state, although he added that he doesn't believe all abortions should be permitted either.

Imam Patel said he sees no conflict between law and religion in the area of abortion except in overpopulated countries such as China, which restrict the number of children people can have. "When local laws take precedence, you are not answerable to God," he said.

However, Muslims are ultimately answerable to God for their actions, said Imam Patel, addressing the subject of what God wants of us. "Doing good deeds in life guarantees God's favour," he said.

In Judaism, God "can't just step in and forgive" a transgression against another person, Rabbi Berman said. "I have to ask forgiveness of the person I've injured, then I can approach God and ask for forgiveness."

In Christianity, said Rev. MacPherson, good deeds are an expression of God's unconditional love.

Rabbi Berman noted the importance Judaism places on actions in the here and now. Despite his belief in the importance of Jewish ritual, "our ethical behaviour has to come before our ritual behaviour," he said.

Imam Patel noted that Islam shares similar concerns. He cited the case of a Muslim prisoner who didn't want to handle pork. "Where was Islam when he committed the crime?" he asked.

"Can you do good works and not believe in God?" asked moderator Avrum Gottlieb.

A good deed is an important accomplishment, whatever its motivation, Rabbi Berman said. But in the long run, he believes, commitment to God is important to society. Without it, he said, people often have a tendency to become greedy and self-centred.

In Islam, according to one school of thought, God rewards good deeds on earth so that people "will realize there is a creator," Imam Patel said. "If they continue to reject God, they will be judged accordingly for rejection of the faith. Faith is essential for salvation in Islam."

There is such a thing as "natural good," said Rev. MacPherson. You don't need to have faith to open doors for seniors, he said, adding that the church's "hope and expectation" is that non-believers will be "saved" if they're doing what they can in terms of what they know.

In response to a question about the idea that Judaism is "a light unto the nations," Rabbi Berman said, "If we practise Judaism as we're supposed to, people will see there is meaning in the world and will emulate that – not necessarily become Jewish, but lead ethical and moral lives."

The most important thing is not to be afraid

By NOAH SLEPKOV
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

On March 9 on the border between Israel and Jordan in the Arava desert, the cornerstone was laid for a joint research centre to be shared by two nations that once seemed incompatible. When finished, this new campus will be a place where Israeli and Jordanian students will be encouraged to set aside their differences and work together for the betterment of humanity while gaining a strong sense of tolerance and understanding for each other. It is being seen as a way to make peace from the ground up.

On the same day, on the other side of the world, intolerance and hatred were once again prevailing on a multicultural campus that purports to value tolerance and diversity.

On March 9, York University's Middle Eastern Student Association (MESA) set up a display in York's popular Central Square hangout area that presented information about all the countries in the Middle East except one – the Jewish State of Israel. The group's banner features all the flags of the Middle East except the flag of Israel. On bulletin boards were names and details of each country in the Middle East, but the internationally recognized State of Israel was not present. In its place was "Palestine," and the map of "Palestine" showed not just the West Bank and Gaza, but all of Eretz Israel.

Although lately there has been a positive change (at least superficially) in Israel's relations with some of its Arab neighbours, the effects have not been felt on campuses here in North America. In fact, the debate Jewish students are having with their Arab classmates is no longer about settlements, refugees, or even borders, but about Israel's right to exist. Israel is no longer accused of occupying the West Bank and Gaza since 1967, but all of "Palestine" since 1948!

Members of MESA make no attempt to cover up their blatant intolerance. They are proud of their policy of not recognizing Israel. They believe every country in the Middle East has a right to exist, except the Jewish State of Israel. Dare we call this anti-Semitism? MESA uses Israel's treatment of the Palestinians as its excuse, which is ironic considering Arab countries' treatment of their own citizens, let alone the Palestinians.

Jews at York and around the world are fighting a battle many believed had already been won – for recognition. Evidently, this is not the case.

But, davka, Jews on campus have become a stronger and more unified community, one driven by the slogan "ve'ha ikar lo l'fached klal" – and the most important thing is not to be afraid.

Terrorist turned Zionist speaks at Concordia

By DANY HOROVITZ
Special to The CJN

A self-proclaimed "PLO terrorist turned Zionist" told his story to a packed crowd at Concordia University earlier this month in a talk he called a confession.

"To confess is the beginning of healing," said Walid Shoebat in the Concordia Hillel-sponsored lecture he gave March 10 called "A Journey: From Hate to Love."

Shoebat confessed to carrying a bomb in a loaf of bread and blowing off the roof of a synagogue with it. He also confessed to the attempted murder of an Israeli official, saying he would have finished the job, but the official ran away.

Born and raised in Bethlehem to a Protestant turned Muslim-American mother and an Arab-Muslim father, Shoebat was raised in the Islamic faith. He began his talk with an anecdote about his childhood and the anti-Semitism that surrounded him.

"I asked my father, 'Who are the Jews?'" he said. "It was portrayed to me that the Jews were prophet-killers, that they stole our land and were colonizers."

He cited the Six Day War as the key event that created the notion of "Palestinians."

"I remember I was parading King Hussein as a child, identifying myself as a Jordanian. Then all of a sudden I became a Palestinian overnight… regardless of the fact that in history, Palestine never existed. It was always Israel."

Shoebat, who converted to Evangelical Christianity in 1993 after being arrested for his crimes, also defended Israel's use of force against the Palestinians.

"If you kill somebody in a car accident, you don't deserve the electric chair because it is an accident. Israel's actions are reactionary and civilian casualties are always unintentional. We [the Palestinians] act, and they react, and that is what's called an endless cycle of violence.

"It is useless dialoguing with the Hitlers of the world," he said, referring to Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. He compared Islamic fundamentalists to Nazis, saying that the real occupation "is the occupation of children's minds" through propaganda.

"When you occupy a child's mind with hatred to the point that they would go on a bus and blow themselves up, to me that is the real occupation.

"Many people say that I am a traitor to my own kind," he said. "That I betrayed my religion, my country, and I deserve to die. But who is a traitor, me or those who stand at the mosques telling children to wrap up themselves in bombs and die killing Jews? Who loves their children more? Don't I love my children more when I protect them?"

We need peace, and we need it now

By BERNARD SANDLER

Guest Voice

I know that although I will do my utmost to summon all of the tact and respect at my disposal, I am about to offend a portion of my own family and my Jewish community.

I write as someone who is mindful of my background, of our bloody and painful history, and of the long struggle and suffering of our people. I do not write in anger or out of disrespect. The generations that preceded us paid a high price to bring us to where we are now. But I must speak out of my concern for the Jewish people and the love I feel for our culture and religion.

And so I speak these words to young Jews, to those of us in our teens, 20s and 30s. We have sat too long in the shadows merely accepting the leadership of those who came before. I speak to those of you with deep senses of justice and empathy, to those of you with the sensitivity to abhor the violence that has mired our nation and the wisdom not to simply slap aside Israel as foolish, misguided or evil. I speak to those of you who love Israel, love what it can be in peace-time, love its democracy, its industry and the spirit of inclusion that shaped its beginnings.

I speak to you for one reason: We must have peace. We must have it now.

We are at a crucial point in our history and we are not safe. Of course, there are those who would joke about Jewish paranoia, but we know the meaning of the word "pogrom," and I am terrified that we might once again face the scourge of that most cursed of words.

Look at us in the media. Look at us in film. The answer is not to try and shut the world up when they misrepresent us. The answer is to understand why they do it. And once we have that understanding, we must act. We must deflect the increasing tension. University campuses serve as the canaries of social movements and the air is already getting hazardous.

Please do not dismiss the hostility. Let us just see the world for what it is, forgive it and move to save ourselves. The world is terrified . It has come to at least the subconscious understanding that, by its very nature, war spreads. We have seen world war. We have seen how easy it is for many nations to be dragged into what began as a regional conflict.

Like it or not, the battles in Israel have become a focal point for clashes between very large planetary forces, and we Jews are caught in the middle. It behooves us to realize that we are in a precarious position. We must not stand at the core of conflict, or that will be used as the reason to shun us or stamp us out.

We cannot throw up our hands and just say that they hate us. As a nation, Israel has been on the defensive for far too long. The tragedies associated with this – the wanton death and destruction and the conversion of our young into soldiers – are horrendous. But we must recognize that we have become tainted by violence. It is darkening our soul and has turned us away from our national purpose.

Our purpose is peace. We have prayed for peace for millennia. Our own words demand that we be a light unto the nations, and that is a most difficult burden. It means that we must have higher standards than others. It means that we must face harder tests, and we must emerge with our conscience pure. We must keep to our principles.

We must realize that many of our current actions, however understandable when placed in the context of history, will not lead us to peace and are not worthy of our national aspirations. We can no longer gripe that other nations have dirtier hands. That is irrelevant. We must be better.

The move to peace must come from the ground. We must take small steps and gauge carefully where those steps will lead us. We must be guided by love.

We must learn once again the majesty of the human soul and learn to cherish it no matter what the nationality of the individual with that soul. We must remember that anyone can make any choice if they are given the right guidance and incentive. We must recall that all humans are capable of love and do love someone. We must learn how to cultivate that love, how to nurture it, how to let it flourish. And we must take action now.

We must be loved. We must bring blessings to those around us. We must benefit the world. We must create the conditions of peace, because something the world has never had the chance to learn is this: peace, by its very nature, can also spread. Love can spread and we could bask in its warmth.

Be unilateral with your love. Do not wait for it to be reciprocated. Make gifts. Extend olive branches. The alternative is inevitable disaster. We cannot win a war of attrition. Donate teaching hospitals and staff to the Palestinian people. Choose respectable non-governmental agencies to distribute funds. Train their medical students. Share with them the farming practices that made our own fields grow. Farm beside them. Share in bringing life from the earth, in providing sustenance to the individuals in the region. Help the Palestinians become so self sufficient that they do not need to rely on those who promote hatred in return for social services. Show them what beneficial neighbours we can be.

Let our children garden together. Let them plant forests of young saplings. Let everyone share in the love of the land.

Of course, there are enemies of peace. Of course, some will never be satisfied until Israel and all her children are dead. But we cannot let that poisonous hatred guide us.

Let us beat our swords into plowshares.

Let us make peace.

Panpals swap dessert recipes

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Jamie Stolper and I have never met in person, but we are proud to call each other "panpals." We e-mail each other or speak on the phone, sharing our favourite recipes at holiday time. Stolper has featured several of my recipes on her website, ShalomBoston.com, an excellent website that features recipes for all the major Jewish holidays, as well as a forum where you can post your cooking questions and comments.

You'll find tried and true recipes that have been kitchen-tested, usually by Stolper herself. Stolper also loves to share her culinary comments with her readers. Here are two Passover recipes that appear on ShalomBoston.com, along with comments from Stolper and me, for your Passover eating pleasure.

Jamie Stolper's Notes: This is my mother's version of her famous sponge cake. She is a sponge cake maven and makes about eight of these for the family before the holiday begins. We have it for dessert for the seder along with fresh strawberries, then snack on the leftovers all week.

Norene's Notes: When my children were very young (in the days before we worried about cholesterol), I would dip stale sponge cake into beaten egg, then brown it in melted butter, transforming it into "French Toast." I'm sure the French would have been appalled with my creativity, but my kids loved it!

VIVIEN KALMAN'S PASSOVER SPONGE CAKE

6 extra-large eggs, separated
1 extra-large egg, whole
1½ cups sugar
¾ cup cake meal, sifted
¼ cup potato starch, sifted
¼ cup orange juice

Preheat the oven to 325. Have ready a 10-inch tube pan and a long-necked bottle on which to invert it after baking.

Beat egg yolks and whole egg together for 1 minute. Gradually add 1 cup sugar while beating until thick and lemon-coloured, about 10 minutes. In another large bowl, beat egg whites until foamy. Slowly add remaining ½ cup sugar. Continue to beat until stiff but not dry. This can take up to 10 to 15 minutes, depending on the mixer, the temperature or the eggs.

Combine sifted cake meal and starch in a separate bowl. Add the orange juice and dry ingredients alternately to the yolk mixture. Do not beat. Fold gently until thoroughly mixed.

Bake in an ungreased tube pan for 45 to 50 minutes. Test after 45 minutes. Invert the pan over the bottle until thoroughly cool, about 2 hours.

Norene's Notes: I love to grate a 3 oz. semi-sweet or bittersweet chocolate bar, then fold the grated chocolate gently into the batter after folding in egg whites. Yummy!

Judy Rosenberg is famous in the Boston area for her outstanding baked goods. She is the author of Rosie's Bakery All-Butter, Fresh Cream, Sugar-Packed, No-Holds Barred Baking Book, winner of an IACP award, one of my favourite cookbooks. She is also the author of Rosie's Bakery Chocolate Packed, Jam-Filled, Butter-Rich, No-Holds Barred Cookie Book. Judy owns Rosie's Bakery, with stores in Cambridge, Boston's South Station and Chestnut Hill, Mass.

Judy Rosenberg says: "This dessert for Passover Apple Rustica, with its rich pastry crust, apple filling and brown sugar crumb topping is one of my favourites. It wasn't until very recently that I discovered that wonderful things could be created by substituting Passover cake meal for flour. This dessert is a welcome surprise at the seder's end, because it is not part of the usual Passover fare, yet is just the kind of thing that is loved by everybody. Serve it at room temperature or warm it slightly in the oven."

Jamie Stolper's Notes: When I tested this apple cake recipe, it won rave reviews from staff members and their families. We are all planning to make this for seder dessert. You may freeze the Apple Rustica after assembly; just pop it out of the freezer and into the oven, but add about 15 minutes to the baking time (at the lower temperature). Or you can make this in advance – it will stay in the refrigerator 4 to 5 days. Judy advises us that when you cover something like this with plastic wrap, after it has thoroughly cooled, you should puncture several holes in the wrap so as to prevent the cake from getting soggy.

Norene's Notes: If you don't have Passover brown sugar, substitute granulated sugar. And for information about my Passover cooking classes in Toronto, Passover Pleasures and Low-Carb Cooking for Passover. Call 416-226-2466 for more information.

JUDY ROSENBERG'S PASSOVER APPLE RUSTICA

Crust:
6 oz. butter or pareve margarine
6 tbsp. sugar
1½ cups matzah cake meal

Filling:
1½ lb. peeled and sliced Granny Smith apples (about 4 large apples)
6 tbsp. light brown sugar
1½ tbsp. lemon juice
scant ¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. cinnamon
butter or margarine for dotting

Topping:
½ cup light brown sugar
¾ cup plus 1½ tbsp. matzah cake meal
¾ tsp. cinnamon generous ⅛ tsp. salt
7½ tbsp. butter or pareve margarine

Preheat oven to 425. Have ready a 9-inch spring form pan that has been greased lightly with butter or vegetable oil.

To make the crust, place sugar and cake meal in the bowl of a food processor. Process several seconds.

Distribute butter over the surface of the mixture and process until dough comes together. Pat crust dough into the bottom and up the sides of the spring form pan almost to the top. Refrigerate.

Toss apples with the rest of the filling ingredients, except the butter, and set aside.

Prepare topping by placing all ingredients except the butter in the bowl of a food processor and processing for several seconds. Distribute the butter evenly over the surface of the mixture and process until mixture is clumpy in texture.

Place apples in the crust. Dot with the butter and cover with the crumb topping.

Place a piece of aluminum foil lightly on top of the pan and bake for 30 minutes. Remove foil, reduce oven temperature to 350 degrees and bake for an additional 45 minutes. Check part way through and replace foil if the crumb topping is browning too quickly. The topping should be golden and crunchy and the apples cooked, but not mushy.

Zen and the art of homemade gefilte fish

By DONNA GORDON BLANKINSHIP
Special to The CJN

I added a new experience to my Passover preparation last year. In addition to counting the Haggadot, practising the Four Questions with my daughter, inviting guests, shopping and cleaning the house, I made gefilte fish from scratch for the first time ever.

Neither my mother nor any of my grandmothers had felt the need to initiate me into the gefilte fish sorority, even though I know they had all had this experience. After trying it myself for the first time, I think I may have a good idea why they decided not to pass on this tradition. I went in with blind and irrational optimism after watching the instructor at a cooking class make it look so easy. Here's what I learned.

• Don't bother to clean your kitchen before you make gefilte fish. The same goes for cleaning your wedding rings. You will have to do the job all over again as soon as you are finished. Unless my foremothers were much neater than I am, cleaning the kitchen from top to bottom is a necessity after chopping five pounds of fish, onions and carrots and then mixing them up with your hands. OK, I admit the recipe said to use a chopping blade and a wooden bowl, but in the end, the only way I could mix in all the required ingredients was with my – very clean – hands, and since the grinder was not co-operating, I ended up using my food processor. If you don't feel motivated to make your kitchen sparkle the way any fine Jewish housekeeper would do before Passover, make gefilte fish. You will have no choice in the matter.

• I now know why gefilte fish costs $5 a jar. It costs a fortune to make it from scratch. The recipe I followed, which created two nice serving platters of fish, required five pounds of salmon, cod and other assorted, expensive filets. That's at least $20 worth of fish. Surely the fish factory doesn't use the fancy kinds of fish I used, but fish is expensive and they pass the cost on to you. It may be a little cheaper to make it yourself if you stick to the cheaper fillets, but that's probably not a good enough reason to do it. The beauty and taste of salmon gefilte fish may convince you to use it, if you have access to that Northwest specialty.

• Homemade does taste better. Homemade is about five times better tasting than fish in the jars. But frozen gefilte fish isn't a bad second choice, and having a friend make it in his or her kitchen is an even better alternative. I know why grandma made it from scratch – she didn't really have a choice. I also know why in later years, the jars seemed fine to her. Who wants to spend that much time preparing one small part of the seder?

• There's an easier way that's still authentic. If you ask around, you can probably find a good kosher grocery store or fish shop where they'll grind the fish for you. You may even get to pick out your filets first. Some places take orders every year before Passover. The finished product will probably taste just as good, but you won't have to do the most difficult and messy part of the process. What you'll miss out on is the opportunity to complain about how hard you worked and to tell funny stories about the mess you made.

• You'll really enjoy this movie now. If you haven't seen the short film Gefilte Fish directed by Karen Silverstein, check it out of your favourite film library. It's a hilarious documentary in which three generations of women talk about making gefilte fish. I don't want to ruin it by telling you any more. It's 15 minutes long and distributed by Ergo Media. If you have trouble finding it, contact the distributor, ergo@jewishvideo.com or 201-692-0404.

• Zen and the art of gefilte fish making. OK, I admit, I never did finish that book (Zen and the Art of Motorcycle Maintenance), but I think I got the gist. There was something about my gefilte fish experience that made me feel I had really found my place in the chain of Jewish motherhood. It's similar to the experience of making challah with my daughter – like time has stopped and we have truly stepped away from the everyday world. It's something I do not feel in my women's study group or at temple. Even though I am a modern Jewish woman, and even though I lead the seder as well as prepare the food, it is the rituals of the kitchen that connect me to the Jewish universe and my ancestral foremothers.

A Sephardi Chinese stir fry made in a jiffy

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

A Sephardi Chinese stir fry from Low-Fat Cookbook, American Express Publishing Corporation, New York

When asked, most Jews say their favourite holiday is Passover. The ritual and tradition that take place in the home set it apart from all the others, and the special foods, even the look of the table on seder nights, kindle a unique place in the heart.

During the remainder of Passover, however, the house could be bursting with food, but "there's nothing to eat" seemed to be almost a Passover battle cry when my children were younger. For me, the most difficult thing about Passover was not planning or cooking the seder food, but coming up with a week's worth of meals and snacks to feed the hungry hordes and satisfy my children.

What do you after the seder for the meals that need to be served to a family, when everyone is home and all seem to be constantly hungry?

Here are some dishes that your family will enjoy but won't have you standing in the kitchen all day.

LEEK AND MEAT FRITTERS

These patties take about 10 minutes to prepare.

4 leeks, well washed
16 oz. ground beef
½ cup potato starch or 1 cup matzah meal
salt and pepper to taste
1 clove garlic, crushed or ½ tsp. garlic powder
½ cup oil, or as needed

Cut the white part of the leek stalks into 4-5 pieces each and cook uncovered in water until tender; drain and grind in a meat grinder or chop very fine.

In a large bowl, mix ground leeks with meat and add eggs; mix well. Add potato starch or matzah meal until mixture is stable but not too hard. If you added too much, add another egg. Add salt, pepper and garlic.

Form small patties – bite-sized is best – and arrange on a tray to fry. In a large skillet, heat oil and pan fry patties until golden. Serve hot or at room temperature. Makes 30.

CHINESE PASSOVER STIR FRY

A good way to use up your leftover seder chicken or turkey.

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 small red pepper, cut into 2-in. long, thin strips.
4 scallions, cut into small rings.
1 cup thinly sliced celery (against the diagonal)
1 cup sliced carrots
⅛ tsp. cayenne pepper
2 finely minced garlic cloves
¼ tsp. dry ginger
½ lb. sliced fresh mushrooms – Shitake are best, but any type will do.
pinch salt
3 cups cooked diced chicken, turkey or beef

In a large skillet or a wok, heat the oil. Add the red pepper, scallions, celery, carrots, cayenne pepper and garlic. Saute until tender. Add the ginger, salt and mushrooms and cook for an additional 5 minutes. Lower the heat and add the meat. Heat thoroughly and serve. Serves 6.

PASSOVER BARBECUE COATING

A sweet and sharp coating. The sharpness reminds us of our bondage, while the sweetness lets us appreciate our freedom!

½ cup honey
¼ cup grated horseradish
3 cloves minced garlic
1 tsp. salt
3 tsp. finely ground black pepper

Coat vegetables, steak, chicken breast or turkey breast with this mix and then let stand for 30-40 minutes. Grill or broil until cooked the way you like it. Makes about ¾ cup.

BAKED FRUIT

Baked fruit is traditionally popular among Jews of Polish extraction. You can substitute nectarines or sweet plums for the peaches, and apples for the pears. Experiment with other varieties of dried fruit, too.

3 lb. ripe peaches, pits removed and thinly sliced
2 lb. ripe pears, cored and thinly sliced
½ lb. fresh or dried figs, chopped
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup apple juice

Preheat oven to 375. Mix the fruit and cinnamon together and pour fruit into a 2-quart baking dish. Pour juice into dish and bake covered for 45 minutes at 375. Serve warm.

HUNGARIAN FLOURLESS HAZELNUT CAKE

12 oz. hazelnuts
2 tsp. Passover baking powder
6 egg yolks
⅓ cup white sugar
6 egg whites
1 pint pareve whipping cream
⅛ cup chopped hazelnuts, for garnish

Preheat oven to 325. Line a 9-inch springform pan with baking paper. Grind hazelnuts until very fine. Add baking powder and set aside.

In a large bowl, whip the egg yolks with the sugar until pale yellow in color. Beat in the ground hazelnut mixture.

In a separate clean bowl, with a clean whisk, whip the egg whites until stiff. Quickly fold ⅓ of the egg whites into the yolk mixture, then add the remaining whites and fold in until no streaks remain. Pour into springform pan. Bake in preheated oven for 60-75 minutes, or until top of cake springs back when lightly tapped. Cool on wire rack.

When cake is cool, remove from pan and slice horizontally into 3 layers. Whip the pareve cream until stiff, and spread generously between layers, on top and on the sides of the cake. Sprinkle chopped hazelnuts on top for decoration.

CHOCOLATE FRUIT BALLS

½ cup dried apricots, chopped
⅔ cup raisins, chopped
2 tsp. grated orange rind
3 oz. dark chocolate, grated
9 oz. dark chocolate, extra
3 oz. margarine

Combine apricots, raisins, rind (which has been scrubbed) and grated dark chocolate in a small bowl. Roll teaspoons of mixture into balls and refrigerate overnight. Break extra chocolate into pieces, place in top of a double saucepan with margarine over simmering water. Stir until smooth or microwave on high for 2 minutes. Dip each fruit ball in chocolate until evenly coated. Place balls on foil-covered trays and allow to set in a cool place. Store balls in airtight container in refrigerator. Makes 25.

SINCERE GOOD WISHES FOR A HAPPY PASSOVER

A break from potatoes and eggs

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Once we get through the seder – we have only one in Israel – I have about a week to feed my family that special Pesachdik food. I find it fun to try new recipes every year, but I don't neglect the old family favourites.

I take out my trusty Passover notebook, in which I've put recipes from newspapers and scribbled down friends' offerings, and every year I try to record exactly how many Pesachdik ingredients we bought and, more importantly, how much we actually used. How much wine was needed for so-and-so amount of people for one seder and one Shabbat? How much matzah did we actually eat and how much hung around all year until we threw it out just before the following Pesach?

Admittedly, sometimes Pesach food can get a bit monotonous – after all, how many potatoes or eggs can one person eat? So when the family tires of chicken and potatoes, roast and potatoes, etc., why not try using whole matzah as a raw material?

There are matzah kugels and matzah roll-ups. Sephardi Jews often dampen matzah before eating it. Then it can be filled with a plethora of things, dairy or meat, such as cottage cheese with chives, tuna with cucumbers and lettuce or chopped liver.

Of course, the very best is matzah spread with softened sweet butter, but if you want something more substantial, try matzah lasagna. It's a welcome change from heavy meat meals that kids will especially enjoy. And Matzah Wine-Chocolate Cake is an Israeli favourite for both young and old.

PASSOVER LASAGNA

Substitute other cheeses if the following are unavailable for Passover. You may cut down on the amount of cheese, too, if you are concerned about cholesterol.

8 whole matzot
8 oz. ricotta cheese
1 egg, beaten
¼ cup grated parmesan cheese
2 cups mozzarella cheese, shredded
3 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
1 scant tsp. dried oregano
salt and pepper
sautéed mushrooms, onions, and/or peppers (optional)
1 quart tomato sauce

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease a matzah-sized pan. Beat ricotta with egg, parmesan, mozzarella and seasonings.

Break matzot into thirds similar to lasagna noodles and soak in warm water until slightly softened. Place a layer of matzah "noodles" in bottom of pan to cover. Spread some of cheese mixture over matzah. Add any of the optional sautéed vegetables. Spread lightly with tomato sauce. Continue layering in same order, ending with matzah. Spread tomato sauce over final layer of matzah and sprinkle with remaining mozzarella. Bake uncovered for about ½ an hour until bubbling and cheese is melted.

MATZAH WINE-CHOCOLATE CAKE

The amount of chocolate varies in this recipe, depending on how thinly you spread the melted chocolate. The more the better, in my opinion (up to a point, of course).

If you find you're running out of melted chocolate, just skip a layer or two of matzah. Soak them as you go along. Add shredded coconut, if you wish. To make this easy recipe even easier, use that oh-so-Israeli invention: chocolate spread.

8½ ounces semi-sweet chocolate
1 cup sweet or semi-sweet red wine
8 whole matzot
2 tbsp. coarsely chopped walnuts

Melt chocolate very gradually in a microwave, stirring and checking at 15-second intervals. (Alternately, melt over very low heat, stirring constantly.)

Pour wine into a large soup plate. Dunk a matzah into wine on both sides and place on serving plate. Generously spread with melted chocolate and top with another wine-soaked matzah. Again spread with chocolate and repeat until all the matzah is used up. Spread remaining chocolate over top and sides of matzah. Sprinkle with chopped walnuts just before serving. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

COR's enticing recipes

FRUIT SOUP WITH CHAMPAGNE from Low-Fat Cookbook, American Express Publishing Corporation, New York.

The Kashruth Council of Canada sends along the following Passover recipes:

BUTTERNUT SQUASH, CARROT AND POTATO SOUP

Prepare a day in advance for richer flavour.

1 tbsp. olive oil
1 large onion, chopped
3 large carrots, peeled and chopped
2 medium potatoes, peeled, cut into 1-inch cubes
1 cup dry white wine
2 cans condensed clear chicken soup combined with 3 cups water (use 6 cups of homemade chicken soup if available)
1 large butternut squash or acorn squash, peeled and cubed into 1-inch pieces
2 bay leaves
½ tsp. dried thyme
½ tsp. nutmeg (optional)
salt and pepper to taste

Heat oil in a large stockpot over medium heat. Add onion and carrots, and sauté for 3 minutes. Add the potatoes and sauté for 10 minutes. Add wine and cook for 3 minutes. Add soup, water, squash, bay leaves and thyme. Bring to a boil, reduce heat and simmer uncovered for 40 minutes.

In a blender or food processor, puree soup mixture in several batches until smooth. Return mixture to the stockpot. Add the nutmeg, salt and pepper and reheat until warmed through. For dairy, use pareve soup or water and garnish each soup bowl with a dollop of yogurt. Serves 6-8.

COLOURFUL VEGETABLE SALAD

Dressing:
2 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 garlic cloves, crushed
2 tsp. chopped flat leaf parsley
salt and pepper to taste

Combine ingredients, whisk well and set aside.

Salad:
2 zucchini, skin on, sliced
2 ribs celery, sliced
1 each medium red, yellow and orange pepper, seeded and cut into thin strips
½ lb. mushrooms, thinly sliced
4 cups torn Boston lettuce leaves

Garnish:
2 tbsp. toasted sliced almonds

Place zucchini, celery, peppers and mushrooms in a bowl. Add the dressing to the vegetables and toss to coat. Line a platter with the lettuce leaves. Top with the vegetable mixture and garnish with the toasted almonds. Serves 6-8.

STUFFED ROAST TURKEY BREAST

2½-lb. whole turkey breast. Ask the butcher to make a cavity for stuffing. Clean and prepare the turkey breast for stuffing. Set aside.

Stuffing:
2 tbsp. oil
½ cup chopped onion
½ cup chopped celery
½ green or red pepper, chopped
6 small mushrooms, chopped
1 small apple, unpeeled, grated
2 cups matzah meal
2 tbsp. chopped pecans (optional)
1 tsp. chopped flat leaf parsley
salt and pepper to taste
½ cup chicken stock or ½ cup undiluted condensed chicken soup

Heat oil in skillet. Brown onions, celery, pepper and mushrooms. Remove from heat. Add remaining ingredients and mix well. If mixture seems dry, stir in 1 well beaten egg. Preheat oven to 350.

Spoon stuffing loosely into cavity. Wrap turkey breast in foil and place in roasting pan. Roast for 45 minutes. Pull foil away from turkey to allow browning. Roast for another 30 minutes, basting with pan juices. Serves 6-8.

Sauce (optional):
1 tbsp. honey
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1/3 cup liqueur

Bring to a boil and baste turkey with the sauce. Roast an additional 15 minutes.

Extra stuffing: Spoon into lightly oiled custard cups or muffin tins. Bake until brown and crispy.

RATATOUILLE

1/3 cup oil or 1 tbsp. oil and 2 tbsp. drained juice from can of tomatoes
2 large garlic cloves crushed
2 large onions, sliced
2 medium zucchini, sliced
1 medium eggplant, skin on, cut into 1/2-inch cubes
1 green pepper, seeded and cut in strips
1 red pepper, seeded and cut in strips
4 1/2 tsp. potato starch
1 large can tomatoes, drained
1/4 tsp. dried thyme
1/2 tsp. dried basil salt and freshly ground pepper

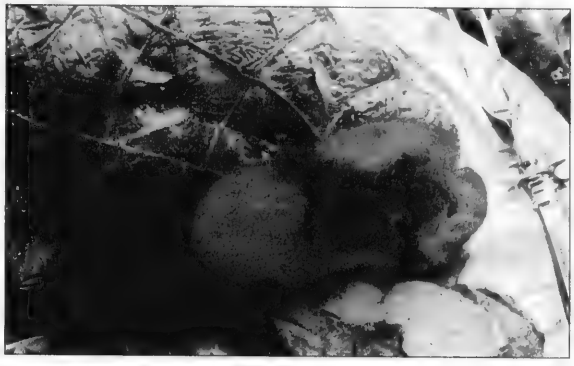
Garnish:
1 tbsp. chopped flat leaf parsley
matzah meal (optional)



Heat oil (or oil and tomato juice) in a large frying pan. Add garlic and onions. Sauté until soft and transparent. Add vegetables. Sprinkle potato starch over vegetables, add tomatoes, thyme and basil. Cover and cook slowly for 1 hour. Uncover and simmer until the mixture is thick. Season with salt and pepper. Garnish with parsley. Serve hot or cold, or pour into greased heated casserole and top with matzah meal. Bake at 325 for 30 minutes. Freezes well. Serves 6-8.

LEMON CHIFFON PIE

Crumb crust:
1 cup matzah meal
1/4 cup oil
1/8 tsp. salt
1 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon

Mix ingredients and press evenly into bottom and sides of a 9-inch pie plate. Preheat oven to 375. Bake for 10 minutes or until lightly browned.

Filling:
juice of 2 lemons
finely grated rind of 1 lemon
1/2 cup sugar
1 1/2 cups water
3 egg yolks
1/2 cup sugar
3 tbsp. potato starch
1/2 cup cold water

Meringue:
3 egg whites
1/4 tsp. lemon juice

Bring the first four ingredients to a boil in top of a double boiler. Cream the egg yolks and sugar and add to mixture. Dissolve potato starch with water slowly until smooth and add to mixture. Cook 10 minutes on medium heat or until well blended and creamy, stirring constantly. Remove from heat. Cool.

Beat egg whites with lemon juice until peaks form and fold into cooled mixture. Spoon filling into pre-baked pie crust. Serves 6-8.

Passover Food Ideas

Make your seder South African-style

By FELICE WELTMAN
Special to The CJN

I have been interested in cooking since I was five years old and living with my family in Salisbury, Rhodesia, now known as Harare, Zimbabwe.

Being in a colonial English country, my parents, who did a lot entertaining, both outdoors and formally, had quite a number of domestics working for them.

"Cook" and I were the best of friends, and while mother was a good cook, he taught me to cook and had a great deal of patience. I loved experimenting, even at a young age, and my poor father had to have samples of whatever I made.

My late Bubbie, who lived in South Africa, was a marvelous cook, but she never had recipes – it was a "bissel of that and a bissel of this." But guess what! I often change recipes and do the same thing.

All countries have their own traditions, but a lot of my cooking goes back to traditional Russian, Lithuanian and Polish cooking. Good, tasty food. Just like Bubbie's.

Jewish tradition in Zimbabwe and South Africa, I believe, is not very different from elsewhere in the world. We grew up with a big Sephardi community – we are Ashkenazi – whose traditions and cooking habits are slightly different from ours – closer to Greek cooking.

South African cooking on the whole is far from bland. We like spicy food. And our baking is not as sweet as Canadian desserts.

A common menu for Pesach would include eggs and salt water, sweet chopped herring, fish fried in a very light batter, gefilte fish, chicken soup with kneidelach, brisket, chicken and dessert.

I love cooking for my family and friends, and I love trying out new recipes. I am a great experimenter. When I like something new in a restaurant, I try and work out what it is made with, or actually ask the chef.

My best rewards are the thank yous and accolades that I get and of course the referrals.

GEFILTE FISH
Made in the microwave
No smell, quick and easy

Fish
1 lb. mixed white chopped fish
1 grated onion
2 grated carrots or handful of baby carrots salt, pepper, fish spice to taste
¼ cup water enough matzah meal to make a smooth light mixture
1 egg beaten lightly

Mix all the above ingredients. Keep wetting hands with cold water and make into nice size balls. Place in deep bowl.

Sauce
6 cups water
salt, pepper and fish spice to taste small bag baby carrots
1 sliced onion

Combine sauce ingredients and microwave for 20 minutes. Pour sauce over the fish balls – sauce must cover the fish. Boil in microwave, covered, either under fish section, or for 20 minutes. Remove from microwave, keep covered for 15 minutes. Put in fridge. Serve with horseradish.

Mushroom sauce
Brown 1 chopped onion. Wash 1 bag chopped mushrooms well, add to onion and toss and fry a little. Season with salt and pepper. To thicken, mix 1 tbsp. potato flour with a little milk, add this to one cup of milk and mix well. Pour into mushroom-onion mixture, stir well and simmer for 10 minutes. If too thick, add a little more milk – pour over fish. Cover and bake in oven at 350 or in microwave.

ROAST TURKEY

Clean turkey and prick all over. Place in roasting pan, pour over 2 cups ginger ale (in cavity as well), rub turkey with ginger powder, salt and pepper (sprinkle seasoning into cavity, too), rub turkey with a mixture of half ketchup, half horseradish, sprinkle oil over turkey, sprinkle on chopped fresh basil and parsley (also in cavity). Add water to pan in order not to have turkey dry out and to have a sauce.

Bake at 400, uncovered, basting frequently. Turn over when brown. When both sides are brown, turn oven down to 350. When ready, cover and turn down oven further, adding water as needed.

COFFEE LAYER CAKE
As seen in Kosher by design, Mensorah Publications, Ltd.

End the meal with not-so-sweet sweets

ROAST BEEF – RIB EYE OR BRISKET wash beef and place in roasting pan

Sauce
1 cup coke
2 cups boiling water
1 package or 1/4 cup onion soup
1 cup ketchup
1 1/2 cups apricot jam

Mix sauce ingredients and pour over beef. Cook uncovered, basting frequently – you might have to add a little water. Cover when meat is ready. Remove the beef, slice it and then pour sauce over. Freeze if not being used at once.

QUICK APPLE TART WITH MERINGUE TOPPING
Stew a dozen sliced and peeled apples in a little juice, either Jaffa, Ceres or orange, any flavour will do. Place drained apples in pie dish with some raisins.

Meringue topping
Preheat oven to 400. Beat 4 egg whites till stiff. Slowly add 4 tbsp. sugar, then fold in 1 tbsp. cake flour. Place meringue mixture on top of apple. Bake in oven till brown.

DIFFERENT STEWED APPLES
18 apples
1 ginger stick or 5 tsp. ginger powder
2 tbsp. marmalade or apricot jam
1/2 lemon (take out pips)
1/2 orange (take out pips)
1/2 cup orange juice
2 tbsp. brown sugar
water

Peel and slice. Boil all ingredients till apples are soft. Do not overboil.

BAKED APPLES
Core 8 apples, whole with skin on. Place brown sugar in each apple. Prick the apples. Pour orange juice or any Passover fruit juice over apples to half cover them. Throw a handful of raisins into the juice. Bake at 400 for half hour. Turn oven down to 350 till apples are cooked. Serve cold.

ROASTED VEGGIES
1 butternut squash
1 yam
6 small potatoes
6 baby beet roots

Wash and clean vegetables, leaving skins on. Microwave them for a few minutes to soften (check after about 5 minutes). Cut butternut into good size pieces, cut beets in half. Place all in large roasting pan, sprinkle on salt, pepper, onion powder and a little oil.

Add
1 container fresh baby tomatoes handful of snowpeas
1 lb. whole fresh mushrooms
1 bunch fresh asparagus (ends cut off)
1 thickly sliced red pepper
1 thickly sliced green pepper
1 sliced eggplant with skin on (which has been salted and drained for 10 minutes) salt, pepper and sprinkling of oil and onion powder

Bake uncovered at 400. Turn gently every 15-20 minutes. Takes about 30-40 minutes. Do not overcook. This will cook quickly, because the hard vegetables are partially cooked.

Pilot turned baker reveals Kookie's cookie recipe

By BARBARA FELDMAN
Special to The CJN

Keith Karnofsky describes himself as a spiritual entrepreneur. Trained as a Reconstructionist rabbi, with an MBA from Harvard University, he has had careers as an airline pilot and as a quality consultant in the manufacturing sector, most recently in the baking industry.

Karnofsky had his own cookie recipe, and five years ago he saw a need in the market: he would produce a pareve chocolate chip cookie that was also really delicious. Keith's Kookies is the result.

Through used equipment dealers and local auctions, Karnofsky put together the machines he needed for his new cookie factory on the outskirts of Buffalo, N.Y. – the industrial mixer that can mix 800-pound batches of dough, a walk-in convection oven and a highly complicated canning machine. A 100-year-old mixer salvaged from a kosher bakery in Rochester sits in a corner ready to be brought back to life.

He's the plant's on-site mechanic. His experience as an airline pilot has come in handy – it has made him fearless around big machines.

He's also the head baker and quality-assurance guy. It took two years of trial and error in his kitchen to produce dough that wasn't too soft to run through an industrial cookie cutter machine. Finally, three years ago, the recipe was perfected.

The first 180,000 Uncanny Chocolate Chip Cookies, packed 12 to a can with a resealable plastic cap, were produced for the Kemach label.

Now Karnofsky and his four part-time employees can bake and package 1,200 to 1,500 cans of Keith's Kookies a day – that's 15,000 to 20,000 cookies. Available in chocolate chip, peanut butter chip and oatmeal raisin, the cookies are all strictly kosher and pareve.

The kosher food market is seasonal: 40 per cent of the kosher food sold yearly is for Passover, says Karnofsky. So this year he set himself another challenge: to make a good-tasting pareve cookie that is strictly kosher l'Pesach.

First, the bakery itself needed to be koshered. The kashrut supervisor from the Orthodox Union helped to pile unkoshered equipment into a corner and supervised the building of a mechitzah to separate it from the Pesach operation. The supervisor oversaw the scrubbing of the mixer and the heat-purifying of the oven, and made sure that the baking racks were scoured down to the bare metal and then baked themselves. Karnofsky bought 300 new baking pans and a new label machine so that he could comply with the Orthodox Union's labelling requirements.

Then he began to assemble his ingredients. Matzah cake meal and potato starch could be obtained easily, but honey and vanilla flavours that were kosher for Passover had to be specially ordered from a supplier in New York City. Instead of the vegetable margarine used in the regular recipe, Karnofsky substituted cottonseed oil margarine, which could only be found in retail pound packages. He and his workers spent hours unwrapping the quarter-pound sticks – 400 for every 800-pound batch of cookies. The chocolate chips, made without corn syrup by a supplier in Pennsylvania, were delivered at the last minute.

Within days, 800 cases of Keith's Kosher For Passover Kookies were baked, canned, labelled and shipped to arrive in plenty of time for Passover in Britain. Karnofsky says his factory is momentarily quiet but still redolent with the smell of baking cookies.

"The whole experience was like having a baby – if you knew what was involved ahead of time, you might not even try it.

"But once you do it," he adds, "you wouldn't miss the opportunity again!"

And his baby, Keith's Kosher For Passover Chocolate Chip Kookies? I pop open a can and bite into one. It's sweet, full of chocolate chips, crispy – delicious!

Keith's Kookies are available in about 50 retail outlets throughout the Toronto area (about $4.99 for a can of 12 cookies). You can also order them online at www.pareve.org/contact.htm.

PASSOVER CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIES

Mix slowly until combined, then beat at high speed until creamy:

2 sticks margarine (½ lb.)
1 cup packed dark brown sugar
½ cup granulated sugar

Add in until combined, then mix at high speed:

1 egg
1 egg yolk
2 tsp. vanilla flavouring
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. cocoa
1 tsp. baking soda
2 tsp. honey

Mix in slowly – do not overmix:

½ cup potato starch
1¾ cake meal

Add and mix in only until combined:

1½ cups chocolate chips

Form into small balls about the size of melon balls. Flatten slightly with fork or palm. Bake on parchment baking paper at 375 for 10-12 minutes, until bottom begins to turn brown and tops do not collapse when pushed gently. Cool on pan.

Special to The CJN

During chol hamoed, I try is to keep cooking to a minimum, and serve easy to make non-matzah-based dishes.

The following recipes are all fast, easy, tasty and lower in calories than the prepackaged food we find in the Passover sections of our supermarkets. The best part, however, is that they absolutely, positively contain no matzah or matzah meal.

ZUCCHINI AND SMOKED SALMON ROLLS WITH DILL SAUCE

This looks like sushi and is a great substitute for gefilte fish

1½ lb. centre-cut salmon fillet
6 large zucchini (each about 7 in. long and 1½ in. thick), trimmed
1½ cups mayonnaise
¼ cup plus 3 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
7 tsp. white wine vinegar
6 oz. smoked salmon (not lox), coarsely chopped
3 tbsp. chopped dill pickle

Sprinkle salmon fillet with salt and pepper. Steam the salmon until just opaque in centre, about 15 minutes. Cool completely. Line baking sheet with paper towels. Slice enough ⅛-in.-thick lengthwise strips from centre portion of each zucchini to make 24. Steam the zucchini in batches until just tender but very pliable, about 3 minutes. Transfer them to paper towels and pat them dry. In a bowl combine the mayonnaise, ¾ cup dill and vinegar in small bowl. Season the dill sauce to taste with salt and pepper.

Place paper towels on a cookie sheet and set it aside. Flake the cooled salmon coarsely into large bowl, discarding skin and bones. Gently mix in the smoked salmon, chopped pickle, the remaining 3 tbsp. dill and ¼ cup dill sauce. Place 1 rounded tbsp. of the salmon mixture at end of each zucchini strip. Roll up the strips, enclosing the salmon mixture. Place the rolls, seam side down, on the prepared cookie sheet. Cover the rolls with plastic wrap and refrigerate until ready to serve. Cover the reserved sauce with plastic wrap and refrigerate and sauce separately to chill. This can be made 1 day ahead. Serve rolls with remaining dill sauce. Makes 8 servings.

APPLE ROSEMARY AND THYME CHICKEN PACKETS

This chicken is incredibly easy to prepare. Boneless chicken breast seasoned with rosemary, thyme and the subtle apple flavour of a Granny Smith or Mutsu makes a delicious dinner.

Passover cooking spray
3 whole boneless, skinless chicken breasts, about ½ lb. each, halved ⅓ cup chopped onions
1 tbsp. minced garlic
3 large Granny Smith or Mutsu apples, 8 oz. each, cut in half and cored
6 sprigs fresh rosemary or 1 tsp. dried
6 sprigs fresh thyme or 1 tsp. dried
1 tbsp. olive oil
6 tbsp. lemon juice (fresh is best)

Preheat oven to 350. Cut 6 circles of parchment paper 18 inches in diameter. Place on a work surface and lightly coat the top of each circle with cooking spray. Rinse and pat dry chicken breast halves. Lay 1 piece of chicken on half of each parchment circle. Sprinkle the minced garlic over the chicken breasts. Thinly slice the unpeeled apples and arrange the slices over the chicken. Top each chicken breast with a sprig of rosemary and thyme (or sprinkle the dried over the top) and drizzle ½ tsp. olive oil and 1 tbsp. lemon juice over each breast. Fold over parchment and crimp the edges to seal. Place packets on a large baking sheet and bake for 45 minutes, until packets are puffed and lightly browned. Place parchment packets on serving plates, break open, and serve immediately. Serves 6.

The parchment packets can be made up 8 hours in advance and stored in the refrigerator.

INDIVIDUAL VEGETABLE KUGELS

3 tbsp. margarine
1 medium onion, chopped
½ cup celery, chopped
1½ cups carrots, grated
¼ cup red bell pepper, seeded and chopped
¼ cup green bell pepper, seeded and chopped
10 oz. frozen spinach, cooked and well drained
3 eggs, well beaten
¼ tsp. ground nutmeg (optional)
⅔ cup ground almonds or walnuts

Preheat oven to 375. Grease or spray 12 muffin tins or ramekins with nonstick cooking spray. Melt margarine in a heavy saucepan over medium high heat. Saute onion, celery, carrots and peppers for 2-3 minutes or until the onions are translucent. Set the mixture aside. Place drained spinach in a bowl. Add the eggs and nutmeg and mix. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Add the sauteed vegetables and ground nuts. Mix thoroughly and then spoon the mixture into the prepared muffin tins. Bake 35-40 minutes. Cool 10-15 minutes before removing from tins. Serves 12.

CITRUS ZEST SALMON

The zest from orange and lemon rinds add a depth to the subtle taste of the salmon.

½ cup finely chopped fresh parsley
¾ cup finely minced fresh dill
4 tsp. minced garlic
1½ tbsp. olive oil
3 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 cups fresh orange juice (not from concentrate)
6 salmon fillets
3 tbsp. slivered toasted almonds
6 lemon slices
zest of 1 lemon
zest of 1 orange

Preheat oven to 375. In a large bowl combine the parsley, dill, garlic, olive oil, lemon juice and orange juice. Mix well. Coat the bottom of large glass baking dish with half the liquid mixture and then sprinkle the orange and lemon zest over the juice mixture. Place the salmon fillets in baking dish on top of the zest and then spoon the rest of the juice mixture over the top of the fish. Sprinkle the almonds over top of the fillets. Cover the baking dish with foil and bake for 20 minutes. Remove the foil, place the lemon slices on top of the almonds and bake an additional 5 minutes. Serve immediately. Serves 6.

There's no moral equivalency here

In a mostly positive book review of Still Life With Bombers: Israel in the Age of Terrorism by Jerusalem Report editor David Horovitz ("Shattered Dreams of Peace," Globe and Mail, March 13), Shira Herzog takes issue with one of the book's central arguments: that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is responsible for the collapse of Israeli-Palestinian peace because he rejected former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's generous offers at Camp David in the summer of 2000.

Herzog is under no illusions about Arafat: "Of course Arafat was at fault, and not just at Camp David. He's no Mandela or Gandhi. In seven years of talks with Israel [1993-2000], he neither foreswore the option of violence or conditioned his people for peace. The same manipulation and duplicity that helped him survive decades as leader of the PLO led to his colossal failure as a statesman."

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Nonetheless, contrary to what Horowitz correctly calls "the new Israeli consensus," Herzog advocates a more "nuanced" read of what led to the failure at Camp David (and the period afterward leading to the Taba talks in January 2001). While Herzog's admonition to search for nuance in the immense complexity of Israeli-Palestinian relations is generally good advice, on this particular subject, the preponderance of reliable evidence concurs with Horovitz's analysis.

Much has been written in Israel about Barak's "tactical" errors in negotiating with the Palestinians and Arafat. Barak himself admitted, in an important interview with Israeli historian Benny Morris (New York Review of Books, June 13, 2002), that he failed to appreciate how settlement expansion (though technically legal under the Oslo process) would psychologically affect the Palestinians. Still, Barak was emphatic that all of his misgivings paled in comparison to Arafat's "strategic" rejection of what was offered at Camp David and his actions in the following months.

There is no moral equivalency here between Israeli and Palestinian "failures." Barak approached Camp David intent on reaching an agreement. Arafat balked. As Barak said in the interview with Morris: "Arafat said 'No!' [Former U.S. president Bill] Clinton, enraged, banged on the table and said, 'You are leading your people and the region to a catastrophe.'"

Dennis Ross, the chief U.S. peace negotiator under Clinton, has repeatedly confirmed Barak's account. But perhaps more important is the position taken by former PA cabinet minister Nabil Amr, who, just prior to assuming his cabinet position (he has since resigned, but remains a member of the Palestinian Legislative Council), published an "Open Letter to Yasser Arafat" in the PA newspaper Al Hayat al-Jadida (Sept. 2, 2002). He wrote: "Didn't we dance to the failure of Camp David? Didn't we deface pictures of President Bill Clinton who courageously [in December 2000] put on the table the proposal [accepted by Ehud Barak] for a Palestinian state with minor modifications? Aren't we doing just that, dancing in the face of a grand failure? Yes. But were we honest in what we did? No. We were not because today, after two years of bloodshed, we call for exactly what we refused [statehood], only after we became sure it was impossible to achieve!"

The point is not to assign blame for the sake of blame. Rather, it is to be clear that it is Arafat's rejectionist attitude – including his refusal to accept Jewish sovereign legitimacy in the region, his insistence on a Palestinian "right of return," his countenancing and indeed support of violence and terrorism – that has led both his own people and the Israelis into the abyss.

It may comfort some of Israel's supporters to think that if only Israel had done this or that better, before and at Camp David, all the horrible deaths on both sides might have been avoided and the Palestinians would be living peacefully in their own state beside Israel. Alas, that account is just not sustainable.

אִם זֶה קוֹדֵם כּוֹאֵב וְזֶה מַה שֶּׁאֵנִי אוֹהֵבְתְּ,
אֲלֵךְ אֶל הַמִּדְבָּר, וְשָׁם אֶלַּמֵּד לְקַאוּב,
וְאִם שִׁירִים אֶהֱבְתְּ, כָּךְ שֶׁכְּתוּבִים בָּאֲבָן,
בֵּין מַכַּפֵּיִם אֲנוּר, וּבְטַלְאֵי אֶחָטוֹב.

וְאָז, כְּשֶׁתִּכָּסֶה עִם סְמִילִים בְּחוֹשֶׁךְ
וְשִׁכּוֹר הַדְּבָרִים בְּחוֹשֶׁךְ יִהְיֶה,
תַּגִּידִי לִי מִלִּים יְפוֹת מִבְּכִי וְאוֹשֶׁר,
הוּא בָּרְאָה אֶהֱב אוֹתִי מֵאִישׁ אַחֵר.

נתן היה איש יפה מבפנים כמו מבחוץ, אוהב אדם, רגיש, מורה מצויין. בגיל שמונים היה עדיין המרצה המבוקש ביותר בבתי ספר, והוא סיפר לי על עניינים הנוצצות של ילדים בדימונה וקריית שמונה כששמעו לראשונה הקראה של שיר.
נתן יונתן אהראי לכמה מהשורות הכי נפלאות שנוצרו בשפה העברית אי פעם:

חוֹפִים הֵם לְמַעֲמַקִּים וְנַעֲנוּעִים לְנַחַל,
רְאִיתִי פַּעַם חוֹף שֶׁנִּחַל עָנוּג
עִם לֵב שָׁבוּר שֶׁל חוֹל וְאֶבֶן,
גַּם מְאֻדָּם יָכוֹל גַּם הוּא לְהִישָּׁאֵר
נָטוּשׁ וּבְלִי כֹּחוֹת, מַמָּשׁ כְּמוֹ חוֹף.

גַּם הַצְּדָפִים, כְּמוֹ חוֹפִים כְּמוֹ חֲרוּטִים,
גַּם הַצְּדָפִים הֵם לְמַעֲמַקִּים וְנַעֲנוּעִים,
לְבֵית שֶׁהִתְמַיֵּד אֶסְבְּרָה, אֲשֶׁר הָיָה,
וְכָךְ הָיִיתִי שָׁר לְבָדִי שָׁם אֶת שִׁירִי
כְּדֵי בֵּין צְדָפַי לְמוֹ שֶׁל הָאֲדָם
שָׁרִים לֹז נְעִימִי.

ואחרונה כאן, עם נענועינו לבית שתמיד אחבוֹ, השורות האלה הן כמו תפילה והמנון עצוב.

דּוֹגִית נוֹסַעַת, מִפְרָשַׂיִךְ שְׁנַיִם,
וּמַלָּחַיִךְ נִרְדָּמוּ כּוּלָם
רוּחַ נוֹשֶׁבֶת עַל פְּנֵי הַמַּיִם,
יָלְדִי פּוֹסֵעַ עַל חַוְתּוֹ דוֹמֶם.

יָלְדִי פָּעוּט הוּא וְעֵנֶב עֵינַיִם
שׁוֹצְפִים הַמַּיִם בְּהֶמְיַת אֵיתָנוֹ,
אִם לֹא יַשְׁוֹרוּ כָּל מַלָּחַיִךְ
אֵיכָה תָּגִיעַ הַדּוֹגִית לְחוֹף?

והיה מי שראה בשיר הזה נבואה למצבה של ישראל, שמנהיגיה נרדמו כולם, ואין מי שינווט אותה לחוף מבטחים.
וכך בחר נתן יונתן לסכם את חייו, שנים רבות לפני שנפטר:

"שִׁירִים עַד כָּאן. נִתְּנָה לָנוּ אַרְכָּה
עַד שֶׁתִּזְקֹן שֶׁלָּנוּ יַצְעִיר,
וְיֵשׁ נְשָׁמִים וְאוֹר מָה עוֹד אֶפְשָׁר לְרַצּוֹת
יָפִים מִמֶּנִּי וּמִמֵּךְ הָאֲדָמָה לְקַחַת.
שִׁירִים עַד כָּאן. עַל קֶשֶׁר מְשֻׁתָּקָה
הַנִּיעָה שֶׁעָתָנוּ לְחֶתֶר.
פְּנִים שֶׁלָּנוּ לֹא הָיוּ אֲדוּמִים יוֹתֵר.

נתן יהיה תמיד בזכרוננו. שיריו, כמו חוף, תמיד יזכירו לנו את הנחל.

Though several buildings and community institutions were targeted in the most recent incident, all are located within a few blocks of each other in the Bathurst Street-Steeles Avenue area. Police reported that swastikas had been painted on the outside wall of the Pride of Israel Synagogue and seven stained glass windows were broken. Officers then discovered that two windows had been broken at the Joseph and Faye Tanenbaum Educational Centre on Patricia Avenue, while swastikas had been painted on UJA signs there and at a neighbouring synagogue and swastikas painted on a clothing donation box at the centre.

At the Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park Cemetery, a block or two north of the synagogue and school, vandals had overturned 27 headstones, six benches, a menorah, several plaques and a pillar marking the entrance to the Yavneh Zion Congregation section of the cemetery.

Mindy and Larry Spring hurried to the cemetery when they heard news of the desecrations. They came, they said, to check on their grandparents' graves. "Thank God they are untouched," they said.

"I don't know what's going on," Mindy said. "My kids are petrified."

Larry Spring, who worships at the Pride of Israel, said members arriving for Sabbath services were upset when they saw the damage done the night before.

"The reaction was probably universal anger," he said.

Gordon Bottner, who visited Bathurst Lawn to check on his father's headstone, said, "I saw profound sadness [in those] looking at the stones turned over like this. I thought, who could do something like this?

"I can't believe someone would actually do something like that. It's a desecration of something sacred... It goes beyond anti-Semitism. It's just an act of baseless hatred and it's cowardly."

John Arruda, groundskeeper at Bathurst Lawn, said they cemetery is planning to notify next of kin of those whose headstones had been overturned.

Toronto Police Service Chief Julian Fantino visited the cemetery to view the damage. Referring also to the attacks on the community buildings, Fantino said, "I am outraged that, in as diverse and tolerant a city as Toronto, such completely unacceptable hate crimes have taken place. We have issued an urgent, city-wide alert to all our police officers and asked them to pay extra attention to Jewish establishments and organizations."

Ontario premier Dalton McGuinty issued a news release saying, "Cowardly acts such as these are despicable.

"It is everyone's duty to speak out and take action when racism and hate crimes raise their ugly heads."

Jewish organizations universally condemned the incidents. Bernie Farber, executive director of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, said, "It probably is the most extensive trend of anti-Semitic attacks I've seen in many, many years."

Calling it a "weekend of hate," he said "it's outrageous that we would have these anti-Semites, these cowardly thugs, skulking around in Jewish cemeteries."

He said their efforts to shock and intimidate the Jewish community would fail.

"You have to understand the rage these people must have against Jews to spend a cold, wet night overturning cemetery headstones. It's easy [for them] because dead Jews can't fight back."

Leo Adler, spokesperson for the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said the anti-Semitic incidents "caused us to become perplexed, fearful, angry and sad.

"The desecration of schools, synagogues, signs, gravestones and homes has never been so gross, so well-organized, so deliberate and so premeditated. Not a single symbol of Jewish Toronto has been exempt from the damage. Not a single Jewish Torontonian feels untouched by the hate and the maliciousness exhibited towards our institutions and us."

Police had not made any arrests in the incidents when The CJN went to press, and speculation as to the perpetrators' motivation ranged from anger at the Mideast conflict to youths acting up during March break. Mindy Spring said her daughter, a student at Ryerson University, said her contemporaries attribute the incidents to the emotions stirred by Mel Gibson's film, The Passion of the Christ.

Meanwhile, B'nai Brith Canada reported just a few weeks ago in its annual audit of anti-Semitic incidents that Canada experience a 27 percent increase in events in 2003 over the year before. Of the 584 reported incidents, 317 took place in the Greater Toronto area.

Police are urging anyone with information on the incidents to contact 32 Division at 416-808-3200 or CrimeStoppers at 1-800-222-TIPS or 416-222-TIPS.

FOSTER PARENTS FOR PRE-SCHOOL CHILDREN
Jewish Family and Child Service is seeking foster parents who can welcome pre-school children (infants to 6 years) into their home. In particular, we need foster parents where one parent is in the home on a full time basis. Interested persons should have an interest in helping children who have had troubled backgrounds.
A per diem rate is paid and all child care expenses are reimbursed. In addition, social work supports, ongoing clinical supervision and training are provided to assist foster parents.

On Tuesday morning, some of the Hillel students came in from outside and walked around the campus holding placards.

However, Hillel staff succeeded in moving most of them back outside when the anti-Israel activists came into Vari Hall to set up their demonstration, said Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

"We wanted to give York administration an opportunity to remove the group," he said.

Soon after the activists marched into Vari Hall dressed in IDF uniforms, almost all the pro-Israel demonstrators came into the hall and tried to block the installation of the checkpoint and theatrical presentations.

"Our vigil and counter-demonstration gave Jewish kids who support Israel an ability to respond to the checkpoint display," Moshevich said.

"The students wanted to create a response that put checkpoints into the context of terrorism, so they decided to hold a vigil and wear T-shirts that explained why the checkpoints were needed."

Moshevich said hundreds of students joined the group.

"We gave them signs to hold and flags to wave. If we had done nothing at all, there probably would have been fist fights in Vari Hall that day," Moshevich said.

"Hillel staff was asked by security for assistance in separating the two groups and we were willing to co-operate with York administration and did work to separate the groups even though it did place a number of us in danger," Kaye said.

York's chief communications officer Richard Fisher said that "it was a volatile situation" and some students were just as offended by the presentation of the victims of terror as others were by the checkpoints.

"It would have been a lot simpler had Hillel stayed outside Vari Hall. By coming inside, it created a situation that was much more difficult to manage," Fisher said.

"Both groups abandoned their commitment to the university," he said.

As of last Friday, the activities of SPHR, Hillel and Generations, a pro-Israel campus group, were suspended until March 26 while the university investigates, White said.

Later that week, Hillel@York held a Jewish Unity Rally. About 250 students from many of the campuses across southern Ontario, as well as from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, gathered in the Founders College Assembly Hall to rally against anti-Semitism and racism.

Despite the fact CHAT did not endorse the event, about 120 grade 11 and 12 students joined the rally on pre-arranged buses.

Liberal MP and former cabinet Minister Art Eggleton gave the keynote address, saying "the greatest enemy of our cause is silence."

Eggleton noted that the rise in anti-Semitism in Canada mirrors the escalating tensions in the Middle East and that "a new form of anti-Semitism has emerged alongside the old.

"It's called hatred of Israel. Hatred of Israel is the new and clever guise of anti-Jewish prejudice," Eggleton said.

"History shows us that while the Jews are the first to suffer, racism rarely stops with them and that is why the current rise in anti-Semitism is personally important not only to Jews, but also to all Canadians."

The director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, Prof. Martin Lockshin, told the students that anti-Semitism is not caused by Jews and must be fought by everyone, not just Jews.

"Anti-Semitism is a vile illness, a scourge that affects gentile society. While we Jews are the targets of anti-Semitism, it is the non-Jews who are affected by the illness. It is the non-Jews of conscience who must lead the fight against the illness that affects non-Jewish society."

Other speakers included Josh Cooper, the federal Conservative Party's candidate in the riding of Thornhill, and several students, including the president of Hillel@York Jordie Saperia, Noah Slepkov and Seth Winberg.

Fight anti-Semitism by reaching out to non-Arab Muslims: scholar

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Hatred of Jews is so entrenched among Arab Muslims that the best hope for change is to reach out to their non-Arab co-religionists, a Muslim scholar told the recent international conference on the worldwide resurgence in anti-Semitism.

"You have to let non-Arab Muslims do the work," Khaleel Mohammed said.

Mohammed, a non-Arab native of Guyana and an assistant professor of religion at San Diego State University, said that from age five, upon entering a mosque for the first time, the first thing a Muslim child learns is "the hatred of Jews."

"It has become the indoctrination from within," he told a panel session on "Israel, America and Islamist anti-Semitism." The other panelists were Raphael Israeli, a professor of Islamic, Middle Eastern and Chinese history at Hebrew University, and writer Bat Ye'or, the author of articles and books on non-Muslims living under Islam.

The next day, Mohammed's comments were denounced as racist by Canadian Arab figures.

But at the conference, Mohammed didn't shy away from expressing what he felt to be very basic information: that the overwhelming majority of the world's Muslims are being held hostage to a medieval, anti-Semitic theology that leaves little hope that those exposed to it will be untainted.

Today, an utterance by an ayatollah within Shiite Islam is taken as "absolute truth," he said. Unlike the talmudic tradition, there is no debating or questioning the imam, since he is "infallible."

Mohammed cited the example of Iraqi ayatollah Muhammad Shirazi, who has made explicit reference to Jews' "sneaky fingers" and has quoted from the notorious anti-Semitic forgery the Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

"And he oversees the largest groups of Shiites in Iraq – and Canada."

Ye'or said the current "Judeo-phobia" in Europe is not so much the result of anti-Jewish or anti-Israel sentiment in the street – "Most Europeans are not anti-Semitic," she said – but the result of policies by European states going back to the oil crises of the 1970s.

The intent, she said, has been to delegitimize both Israel and the United States by striking alliances between Europe and the Arab world while excluding Israel and America.

The goals were to protect oil interests by forming partnerships that would tolerate a larger Muslim population within Europe, and to institute cultural and academic exchanges, Ye'or said.

But these policies – all non-official and established through a series of "dialogues" – resulted in a "mutating Europe" that has allowed anti-Semitism, anti-Israel sentiment and "Islamo-fanaticism" to gain a foothold, she said.

The Jewish world "should not just complain as victims," she said, but must denounce these developments and hold European countries accountable.

"People who speak out against European policies are demonized and marginalized. So we should not approach it with an aggressive attitude, but a responsible one."

Israeli said there are two things about the new anti-Semitism or "anti-Israelism" that are new: "operationalization" and "globalization."

The first term means that anti-Israel and anti-Jewish sentiments have been put into "operation" through violence. And the violence has become "globalized," with no part of the civilized world immune.

Israeli said the "new" anti-Semitism borrows heavily from the old: Hamas' platform "quotes liberally" from the Protocols and includes such things as blood libels, world Jewish conspiracies and allegations about Jews poisoning wells.

"It's all part and parcel," he said.

If one thing has changed, it's that "there appears now to be more incentive to dehumanize. If Israel does not deserve a nation, then the Jews are not a people.

"Coexistence sounds wonderful, but the time is not yet ripe."

In a question-and-answer period, Israeli said anti-Jewish and anti-Israel sentiments are stoked now more than ever by the Arabs' "humiliation" because Israel and the West are showing the Arab world that it could be greater.

The problem is that the Arab world is not interested in "elevating itself up, but putting the other down, blow by blow, until the enemy collapses."

If there is hope, Israeli said, it is in that Islam is a "pragmatist" religion.

Jews and Israel must "be strong and appear to be strong," because the Arab world respects strength, he said.

Jewish leader says France moving against anti-Semitic violence

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The recent wave of anti-Semitic violence rumbling through France – the worst since World War II – is now regarded as a serious issue by the government, a leading Jewish official said here last week.

"In the last few months, there has been a total change of attitude by France," said Roger Cukierman, chair of the Paris-based Council of French Jewish Institutions, the umbrella body representing France's Jewish community organizations. "Enormous progress has been made."

Until quite recently, France perceived the anti-Semitic attacks as a manifestation of general violence, he said at a press conference organized by UJA Federation.

But since President Jacques Chirac's denunciation of anti-Semitism last November and his comment that "an attack on a Jew is an attack against France," the government has started to take firm steps to protect France's estimated 600,000 Jews.

"Jews are sentinels of Western values," Cukierman said. "When they suffer, there is something wrong in French society."

Fresh from attending a conference on anti-Semitism in Montreal, Cukierman said France is finally taking the initiative to prosecute attackers and vandals who have assaulted synagogues, schools, institutions, students and rabbis in hundreds of attacks since the start of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

Citing two examples, he spoke of the close co-operation between the Council of French Jewish Institutions and government ministries and the decision by the ministry of education to introduce new courses that foster understanding and tolerance of different religions.

Cukierman ascribed the recent drop in anti-Semitic acts to measures adopted by the police and the government.

Nevertheless, he said, the anti-Semitic atmosphere prevalent in public schools has grown increasingly worse.

"For parents, it's a shock, 60 years after the Shoah, seeing their children beaten for being Jewish."

In another note of criticism, he said the European Union, of which France is a member, has not taken clear steps to curb the violence.

Roger Cukierman

Cukierman, who is also deputy chair of the European Jewish Congress, said more than 90 per cent of attacks have been carried out by disaffected Muslim youths of North African descent.

But the vast majority of French Muslims, numbering anywhere from three to six million, are moderate in outlook, he said.

Muslim radicals equate French Jews with Israelis and regard them "as a kind of enemy."

Muslim perpetrators very often look upon Jews as scapegoats for their problems, Cukierman said, adding Muslims have not been properly integrated into French society and are victims of racism and an unemployment rate three times higher than the national average.

North African Jewish immigrants in France succeeded in integrating themselves, he said, but North African Muslims have not been as successful, and some even display little or no interest in embracing French culture.

"France has to integrate these people," Cukierman said, warning that the country will face an "awful situation" if urgent measures are not implemented.

"But I believe France is conscious of the situation," he said, adding the integration of Muslims can be achieved through education, anti-racist legislation and sanctions.

Cukierman expressed support for the controversial bill, passed recently, that bans conspicuous religious symbols – veils, large crosses, kippot and turbans – in public schools.

"This law was an important political message to Muslim extremists who are preaching hatred."

The bill's implicit message is that Muslims must abide by the customs and norms of France. "We have to respect the general atmosphere of tolerance, which has always been the case in France."

Later, citing the Dreyfus Affair and the anti-Semitic character of Vichy France, Cukierman said French Jews have "had good times and bad times."

France is not the only European country experiencing anti-Jewish violence, and the situation in Belgium is still worse, he said.

In an interview, Cukierman said right-wing anti-Semites have not physically attacked Jews of late.

"There is no trace of the extreme right in the anti-Semitic violence. They hate Arabs more than Jews."

In response to the upsurge in violence, 4,800 French Jews made aliyah in 2002 and 2003, he said.

The Council of French Jewish Institutions has engaged moderate Muslims in dialogue, but no such dialogue is taking place with radical Muslims, he said.

"They won't talk to us," said Cukierman. "We once met them. We had a nice talk, but once it was disclosed, the dialogue stopped."

Jewish people has natural right to defend itself

By MAZAL MUALEM
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Monday justified the assassination earlier in the day of Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, leader of the Islamic militant Hamas organization, saying the Jewish people had a "natural right" to pursue those who would destroy it.

Yassin's ideology, Sharon told a meeting of his Likud party parliamentary caucus, "was killing and murdering Jews wherever they were, and the destruction of the State of Israel."

Sharon said Yassin was an "arch-terrorist" who plotted attacks that killed hundreds of Israelis.

"The war against terror has not ended and will continue day after day, everywhere," Sharon told legislators from his Likud party. "This is a difficult struggle that all the countries of the enlightened world must participate in. It is the natural right of the Jewish people, like that of all nations in the world that love life, to hunt down those who rise to destroy it."

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz told the caucus meeting that since the outbreak of the current Israeli-Palestinian violence in September 2000, Hamas has carried out 425 attacks that caused the deaths of 377 Israelis and wounded 2,076 others.

Mofaz called Yassin a Palestinian Osama bin Laden who sent hundreds of terrorists and suicide bombers to murder civilians. It is Israel's right and duty to protect its citizens, Mofaz said.

The rest of the political establishment was divided Monday on the assassination of Yassin. The centrist Shinui and left-wing parties and groups had opposed it, and rightist Knesset members and organizations supported it.

Interior Minister Avraham Poraz of Shinui warned Monday that many Israelis could pay with their lives for the IDF's assassination of Yassin.

"Certainly those who are perpetrating terrorism, preparing a bomb which we know they are about to place somewhere have to be targeted. But Yassin was not a 'ticking bomb,'" Poraz told Israel Radio. Poraz said he and Justice Minister Yosef Lapid, also of the Shinui party, voted in the security cabinet last week against assassinating Yassin.

"I fear we have opened up a cycle here and that many will pay for it with their lives," Poraz said. "I am afraid that Hamas's motivation will increase. [Yassin] will become some sort of martyr… a national hero for them, and I'm very sorry to say, this won't prevent Hamas from continuing its activities."

Saying "every leader can be replaced," Poraz questioned the wisdom of targeting a Muslim cleric, even one "involved in terrorism." He said that "the result can be very dangerous."

Peace Now said killing Yassin would "turn all of us into Hamas's hostages. The only way to wipe out Hamas and other terror groups is through a diplomatic agreement."

Yossi Beilin, leader of the left-wing Yahad party and former justice minister, criticized the assassination, asking, "How many Israelis will have to pay with their lives for this act?"

Beilin was concerned that killing Yassin could spark a new cycle of violence. He added that he believes the policy of targeted assassinations is neither legitimate nor effective.

Meanwhile, the Yesha Council of settlements welcomed the death of "arch-terrorist" Yassin.

The council praised the government's decision to strike the Hamas leader and the Israel Defence Forces for carrying out the attack. "Targeted assassinations of the entire terror leadership, including Yasser Arafat – and not Sharon's unilateral withdrawal – will bring an end to terror," the council said.

Ariel Sharon

Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in radio interviews that the assassination of Hamas would restrain Hamas and other terror groups in the long run, because the militant groups would realize that their leaders are not immune to such strikes.

"Even if there are harsh responses by Hamas to the assassination in the short term, in the long term, they will be restrained because the leaders will know that they will be assassinated," Netanyahu said.

"It is highly possible that we will have to carry out many operations in the Palestinian Authority areas," he said, adding that Israel would have to continue to root out terrorists and to guard the boarder crossings.

Netanyahu said the assassination would disrupt terrorism and deter further attacks.

Deputy Defence Minister Ze'ev Boim of Likud told Israel Radio on Monday morning that Yassin had been "marked for death.

"Yassin and the others were behind the terror framework in the Gaza Strip," Boim said.

Yassin killing is part of disengagement plan

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

The message Israel sent out by assassinating Sheikh Ahmed Yassin is that, when the disengagement from Gaza is finally implemented, Hamas will not be able to claim the withdrawal was prompted by the group's terrorist operations and that if these attacks continue, they will lead to a complete Israeli withdrawal.

The Yassin killing is part of the Israeli offensive ahead of the disengagement. The danger is that Gaza will be consumed by anarchy and that Hamas will take control of the street, preventing the more pragmatic Palestinian Authority forces from imposing law and order.

The Israeli offensive could thwart plans by Hamas and other groups collaborating with it, such as Fatah. Israel has reached the conclusion that Hamas was planning to launch an all-out terror campaign, which was heralded by the double suicide bombing in Ashdod port that killed 10 people. Before the Ashdod attack, Hamas launched a sophisticated offensive on the Erez checkpoint, which failed.

Several months ago, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's cabinet decided to strike out at the Hamas leadership, and even tried to kill Yassin himself. One failed attempt to eliminate Yassin was followed by a period of relative quiet. The resolution to kill Hamas leaders was reaffirmed last week by the cabinet, following the Ashdod bombings.

It is clear that both of these offensives – Israel's and Hamas' – will increase the bloodshed. Not only will terrorist leaders and armed militants be killed, but innocent civilians on both sides will die.

Thousands march in Yassin's funeral procession

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin was killed at daybreak Monday when Israel Air Force (IAF) helicopters fired missiles at a car carrying the wheelchair-bound head of the radical Islamic group as he left a mosque near his house in Gaza City.

Witnesses said Israeli helicopters fired three missiles at Yassin and his bodyguards around 5 a.m. local time as they left the mosque. Yassin was killed instantly and up to seven bodyguards, reportedly including Yassin's son, were also said to have been killed.

Within hours after Hamas officials confirmed Yassin's death, thousands of mourners jammed Gaza City's streets for the funeral procession of the eight casualties. Twenty-one Palestinian police officers formed an honour guard as the coffin holding Yassin's mangled body was carried out of Gaza City's Shifa Hospital.

Palestinian hospital sources said an additional 15 people were wounded in the strike.

The Israel Defence Forces confirmed that Yassin had been killed in the strike, saying he was directly responsible for dozens of terrorist attacks.

"In an operation by security forces [Monday] morning in the northern Gaza Strip, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, leader of the Hamas terrorist group and personally responsible for dozens of terrorist attacks and the deaths of Israelis, foreigners and security personnel, was killed in an air strike on his car," the army said in a statement.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon oversaw the operation, receiving constant updates from military officials at his Negev ranch.

The security cabinet decided to assassinate Yassin following the March 14 double suicide bombing at the Ashdod port in which 10 people were killed. Interior Minister Avraham Poraz told Israel Radio on Monday that he and Justice Minister Yosef Lapid, both of the Shinui Party, had voted against the assassination.

Yassin was lightly wounded in a failed Israeli attempt to assassinate him last September.

On Sunday, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz told the cabinet that the defence establishment was drawing up a plan to severely weaken Hamas before Israel's implementation of its disengagement plan.

The Israeli army went on heightened alert Monday at roadblocks and in the territories after the killing. All border crossings into Israel were closed to Palestinians and a closure was clamped on the territories. The police also went on alert inside Israel, fearing reprisals.

Yussef Haddad, 35, a taxi driver, said he saw the missiles hit and kill Yassin and the bodyguards. "Their bodies were shattered," he said.

Ambulances and fire trucks raced to the scene and rescue workers gathered up parts of the shattered bodies.

Tens of thousands of Palestinians, many calling for revenge, poured into the streets of Gaza as news spread of Yassin's death. In Gaza City, hundreds of gunmen were among the protesters, and children burned tires in protest, sending plumes of black smoke into the air.

Cars drove through the streets blaring calls for revenge over loudspeakers. Some aired recordings of Yassin, saying, "We chose this road, and will end with martyrdom or victory."

Mosques read passages from the Qu'ran and two Gaza churches rang their church bells.

Yassin was by far the most senior Palestinian terrorist killed in more than three years of Israeli-Palestinian fighting.

Announcing Yassin's death, the Hamas leadership said, "Sharon has opened the gates of hell and nothing will stop us from cutting off his head."

Yassin was given a life sentence by Israel in 1989 for founding Hamas and inciting Palestinians to attack Israelis. But Israel released him in 1997 as a goodwill gesture to Jordan's King Hussein after a failed Israeli attempt to assassinate Hamas leader Khaled Mashal in Amman.

In September, an Israeli warplane dropped a bomb on a building where Yassin and other Hamas leaders were meeting, but Yassin escaped with just a small wound to his hand.

A loud explosion echoed on the Palestinian side of the main crossing between Israel and the Gaza Strip on Monday and an Israeli soldier said a bomb was thought to have detonated there.

"A small bomb exploded on the Palestinian side," said an Israeli soldier manning a watchpost.

An inventory of murder by Hamas

Sheikh Ahmed Yassin

Since September 2000, 956 people have been killed by Palestinian violence and terrorism.

Between Sept. 29, 2000 and Feb. 1, 2004, Magen David Adom treated a total of 6,145 casualties as follows: 823 killed, 534 severely injured, 759 moderately and 4,029 lightly injured, including 11 MDA staff members.

The following is a list of the more infamous Hamas suicide bombings and terrorist attacks:

• June 1, 2001. Suicide bombing of a Tel Aviv discotheque. Twenty-one people murdered and 120 wounded.

• Aug. 9, 2001. Suicide bombing of a Jerusalem restaurant. Fifteen people murdered and 130 wounded.

• Dec. 1, 2001. Double suicide bombing on the Ben Yehuda St. pedestrian mall in Jerusalem. Eleven people murdered and 188 wounded.

• Dec. 2, 2001. Suicide bombing of bus no. 16 in Haifa. Fifteen people murdered and 40 wounded.

• March 9, 2002. Suicide bombing of a Jerusalem café. Eleven people murdered and 54 wounded.

• March 27, 2002. Suicide bombing of a Netanya hotel on the first night of Passover. Thirty people murdered and 140 wounded.

• June 18, 2002. Suicide bombing of bus no. 32A in Jerusalem. Nineteen people murdered and 74 wounded.

• Aug. 4, 2002. Suicide bombing of bus no. 361 at Meron junction. Nine people murdered and 50 wounded.

• Nov. 21, 2002. Suicide bombing of bus no. 20 in Jerusalem. Eleven people murdered and 50 wounded.

• March 5, 2003. Suicide bombing of bus no. 37 in Haifa. Seventeen people murdered and 53 wounded.

• May 17, 2003. Suicide bombing in Hebron. Two people murdered.

• May 18, 2003. Suicide bombing of bus no. 6 in Jerusalem. Seven people murdered and 20 wounded.

Abdullah visits Sharon

King Abdullah of Jordan last week paid a secret visit to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Sycamore Ranch in the Negev, where the two leaders met over an extended lunch. The Prime Minister's Office declined to comment on details of the conversation, but a senior political source said "the visit was meant to allay King Abdullah's fears that construction of the [West Bank] fence will prompt a flight of Palestinians over the border into Jordan."

False-bottom bombers

The two suicide bombers who struck in Ashdod last week are believed to have reached the port by hiding in a cargo container. While X-raying one of the cargo containers trucked into the port, the Shin Bet discovered explosive components in a large hidden compartment. They believe the terrorists hid in the container before it was shipped out of Gaza via the Karni border crossing. The Shin Bet has ordered the Karni crossing, the lifeline for thousands of Palestinian farmers, closed indefinitely.

Child was meant to die

An Israeli human rights organization condemned the Palestinians' use of a child to transport explosives. Taking advantage of a child compounds the crime of attacking civilians, B'Tselem said of the attempt to smuggle a bomb through a security checkpoint near Nablus. Abdallah Qar'an, 11, was stopped after an Israeli police officer noticed wires jutting out of the boy's bag. Palestinian terrorists then tried to explode the bomb by calling an attached cellphone detonator, but it failed to explode, sparing the boy's life. "Using a child to transport explosives is in and of itself a war crime," the group said.

High flier

Maj.-Gen. Dan Halutz was made Israel's deputy chief of staff. Halutz, one of the few active veterans of the dogfights of the 1973 Yom Kippur War and an advocate of the air force's track-and-kill operations against Palestinian terrorists, is considered a leading contender to replace Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon when he steps down as chief of staff in 2006. Halutz replaces Maj.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi as Ya'alon's deputy. A successor to Halutz as chief of the Israeli Air Force has not yet been named.

Israel, EU are off in space

Israel is to co-operate in a European Union space project. Following an agreement signed last week between Israeli representatives and the European Commission in Brussels, Israel will participate in the development of the European Space Agency's Galileo project. As part of the project, the agency plans to launch some 30 satellites, beginning in 2008. Israel is the third non-EU country to participate in Galileo, after China and Canada.

New Israeli tax law takes a bite out of immigrants

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Come April 30, immigrants to Israel from Canada and elsewhere will for the first time be required to pay tax on the investment income they earn abroad.

This year, the new law will only affect immigrants who have been in Israel for 10 years or more, but next year, it will apply to all those who have been in the country for at least five years.

They will be expected to file a declaration to the Israeli Income Tax Authority that includes foreign-earned interest, dividends, capital gains, rents, royalties and pensions – and pay tax on them at rates ranging from 15 to 35 per cent.

"It used to be that foreign income for new immigrants from Canada wasn't taxable in Israel unless it was actually brought into Israel," explains Modi'in-based Jerome Pollock, who has taught at Tel Aviv University and is one of only a handful of Israelis to hold the designations of certified financial analyst and chartered accountant in both Canada and Israel.

"The main change is that now, immigrants are obligated to declare their foreign income, as well as their Israeli income."

A 1974 agreement between Israel and Canada does, however, prevent immigrants from paying twice.

"When Canadians who are paying tax on income in Canada declare it in Israel, the amount of tax paid in Canada will be deducted from the amount of Israeli tax on that same income," Pollock explains.

Where Canadian immigrants will be most affected by the change in law is on securities that are exempt from taxes in Canada, such as investments in an RRSP.

"Whereas Canadians were getting a great deal before, managing not to pay tax on those securities in any country, now they are obligated to pay a 15 per cent tax on them in Israel," says Pollock, who lists GICs of five years or more and bonds issued or guaranteed by the federal and provincial governments among the most common investments of that kind.

But not everyone agrees Canadians were getting a free ride.

"My so-called tax-exempt Canadian investments are hardly a 'great deal,'" says one 35-year-old immigrant from Toronto who asked not to be named.

"None of my investments are actually tax-exempt. Every dollar I've invested is either an after-tax dollar or a dollar that will be taxed in Canada when I withdraw it from my RRSP," he says.

"I have to retire at some point, and since the Israeli government isn't giving me a pension and the Canadian government isn't giving me a pension, I am obligated to take care of building my own pension," the 12-year resident of Tel Aviv says.

"I am an honest person and I have never cheated on my taxes. I have already paid over 50 per cent marginal income tax to either Canada or Israel. My retirement savings are my retirement savings, and I am not volunteering to pay any more taxes to anyone."

Pollock says the reason for the tax reform has more to do with foreign investments made by longtime Israelis than those made by new immigrants. Up until a few years ago, Israelis were not permitted to buy foreign currencies and, therefore, could not legally make investments outside the country.

"In other words, it meant that the only people who had access to a foreign income in Israel were new immigrants," he says.

When the law was changed in 2001, Israelis were allowed to make tax-exempt foreign investments just like immigrants, thereby avoiding taxes both in Israel and abroad.

"The main purpose of this latest reform is to force Israelis to pay tax on their foreign incomes," says Pollock

"The reforms are not unreasonable. The law is merely correcting an unfair advantage that some new immigrants had."

But the Toronto-born Canadian investor says the thinking behind the reform is irresponsible.

"Governments who discourage investments are unwise governments," he says. "It's a short-term cash grab that will just postpone social problems. If I have no money when I'm 65, it's going to be someone's problem.

"Is the government of Israel trying to attract producers to this country, or consumers?" he asks.

"Breaking the backs of the producers in order to feed the perpetual consumers of tax dollars is a third-world concept that doesn't lead to economic prosperity in the long run."

Part of a series of amendments to Israeli tax laws since 2002, the obligation to declare of foreign income is only one of the new changes.

Another involves the mandatory filing of annual returns for those whose monthly salaries are over 17,000 NIS ($5,100 Cdn). (Most Israelis are not obligated to file yearly returns, as their employers deduct their income tax off their paycheques.)

Top Fatah activists defecting to Hamas

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Palestinian officials speaking at a meeting in Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Ramallah headquarters this week presented a grim picture of the PA's situation in Gaza, highlighting in particular the PA's lack of control over many activists from the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, Fatah's military wing.

Palestinian terror groups already have a reputation for abusing the population of the West Bank and Gaza and scorning PA security chiefs. But reports from last week's meeting, which was attended by Arafat, Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia and PA security force chiefs, are even more disturbing for the PA and for Arafat in particular.

The reports say a significant segment of armed Fatah leaders in Gaza answer to senior Hamas officials, and the Fatah leaders aren't even taking phone calls from the leadership in Ramallah.

This is the situation in several parts of Gaza, according to reports, including the Jabaliya refugee camp and the adjacent neighbourhood of Jabaliya in the northern part of the strip, where the two suicide bombers who carried out last week's attack in Ashdod's port came from. It is also the case in the Dir al-Balah area in the centre of Gaza, Abasan to the south of it and the Dahaniyeh region in southern Gaza.

Two major groups that have effectively stopped operating under Fatah are the Abu Reish Brigades, which has been carrying out attacks in Gaza regularly over the last few weeks in conjunction with Hamas activists, and the Saladin Alayubi group, the armed wing of an organization that had been considered closely linked to Arafat. It has only recently become known that some members of this group now refuse to take instructions from Arafat.

Although they have not declared an overt revolt against him, their actions indicate they have defected to Hamas, whose leaders understand that recruiting members of other groups can help Hamas widen its power base in Gaza and break down Fatah's loosening hold there.

In some cases, as in Dir al-Balah, the Hamas-Fatah connection was made when Fatah and Hamas members met at the Islamic University of Gaza, a Hamas stronghold. In the Jabaliya region, Fatah and Hamas men know each other through family or neighbourhood ties.

The recruitment of Fatah activists is expected to significantly help Hamas if the Palestinian Authority decides to take action against it in Gaza, as well as in the case of local elections in Gaza at some future point.

Half an hour after the terror attack in Ashdod, a man known as Abu Qusay, who said he was an Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades member in Gaza, appeared on Hezbollah's television station Al-Manar to read the names of the suicide bombers who carried out the attack.

The attack was the apex of a series carried out by both Hamas and Fatah. As Abu Qusay said, "The Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades carry out the instructions of the true leadership of the Palestinian nation, and not the instructions of the people in Ramallah, who have special interests and privileges."

About 10 recognized armed Fatah-linked groups and several smaller, family-based groups operate in Gaza. Mapping out where their loyalties lie is complex.

During a visit to Arafat's Ramallah compound, Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman demanded that Arafat maintain law and order in Gaza as a precondition to Egypt's readiness to deploy forces along the Gaza-Egypt border.

This reflected the Egyptian leadership's concern that, in the absence of PA and Fatah control of Gaza, Egypt will have no one to deal with there after an Israeli withdrawal.

Fatah's growing terror involvement

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Information about recently thwarted terror attacks, which the Shin Bet security service released for publication last week, provides interesting clues about the extent to which the Fatah organization has been involved in terror.

Analysis

A Fatah-related Tanzim group from Nablus was responsible for 14 out of 15 attempted terror attacks that have been foiled since the start of the year. And the two large-scale terror attacks perpetrated this year in Jerusalem were the work of a different Tanzim cell based in Bethlehem, which was also planning to hijack an Israeli bus.

About 80 per cent of the 40 intelligence warnings currently under review by the Shin Bet relate to Tanzim groups. Ten per cent are connected to Hamas and the remaining 10 per cent to Islamic Jihad and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

The practical significance of such data is that Fatah and its splinter groups have now become the dominant terror force in the West Bank, nudging out Hamas.

Though it still sends suicide bombers on strikes against Israeli targets, Hamas today is mainly involved in rebuilding, trying to overcome the blows it suffered during the Israel Defence Forces' 2002 Defensive Shield operation and subsequent actions.

Meanwhile, helped by money from Lebanon and Iran, the Tanzim groups are strengthening. Most of the Palestinian explosive experts in the West Bank now belong to Tanzim.

The terror cell that was uncovered in Bethlehem exemplifies Fatah's increasing involvement in terror. For a long time, Shin Bet investigators had no idea who was responsible for planning the two terror attacks on Jerusalem buses earlier this year.

Once the first solid lead surfaced; however, Shin Bet officials were able to quickly fit together pieces in the puzzle, IDF sources say. The prime force behind the mobilization of the Bethlehem terror cell was Ahmed Mugrabi, who managed to bring various Fatah operatives from the Bethlehem area together to plan terror strikes against Israeli targets, even though he is being held at Nafha prison.

The self-confidence of the Tanzim Bethlehem cell rose after the two terror attacks in Jerusalem, Israeli security officials explain, and so they took up work on their next project, the hijacking of an Israeli bus either in Jerusalem or in Efrat.

Israel preparing for 'day after' ICJ

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — No one knows exactly when the International Court of Justice will issue its verdict on Israel's West Bank security barrier, but advocates for the Jewish state are already planning for the "day after."

Pro-Palestinian groups at the United Nations are likely to act immediately on the court's advisory opinion – with potentially grave consequences for Israel.

The court's non-binding opinion could come anytime between now and July. Most observers anticipate that the majority of the court's 15 judges will issue an opinion saying Israel's fence is illegal under international law.

If so, Arab countries could call for a UN Security Council meeting to punish Israel with sanctions like those imposed on apartheid-era South Africa. The United States likely would veto any such sanctions.

Failing that, Arab states may try to use the opinion as backing for UN General Assembly resolutions barring Israel from international events or curtailing its UN credentials.

An opinion against Israel might also set a precedent for solving other international political conflicts through litigation – potentially significant to countless countries around the globe.

With that in mind, Israel and U.S. Jewish groups are trying to make sure U.S. officials and the American public know what's at stake.

Alan Baker, the legal adviser to Israel's Foreign Ministry, said his visit to the United States last week was meant to "prevent this thing from snowballing." Baker set Israel's legal strategy for the court hearing at The Hague last month.

Israel presented a written brief to the court arguing that the court had no jurisdiction in the case, and chose not to attend the late-February hearings.

Baker was in Philadelphia, Boston, New York, Washington and Los Angeles last week to promote Israel's position to reporters and influential lawyers. On Friday, he was slated to meet with members of the U.S. State Department to devise strategy.

Even if Israel can forestall harmful resolutions at the United Nations, an unfavourable opinion from the international court could spell trouble.

"Because the ICJ has been involved, it's changing the ball game," Baker said in an interview in New York. Unlike other UN organs that are considered contaminated by politics, the International Court of Justice retains a good reputation, he said.

The court's gravitas might influence the foreign policy of major European governments, Baker said.

Despite their written briefs objecting to the case because it would politicize the court, European countries might consider the court's opinion "the law from Sinai," he said.

While the court's opinion is only advisory, "it will have the imprimatur of law," said Marc Stern, legal director for the American Jewish Congress (AJC), which paid for Baker's U.S. tour.

If the "Palestinians win this case, you can be sure that there will be a 'right-of-return' case and a borders case," Stern said, rattling off other Palestinian grievances against Israel. "Instead of negotiating peace with Israel, they're going to litigate."

In a letter to a U.S. congressional committee, Stern outlines the dangers of expanded jurisdiction of the ICJ, arguing the court has shown itself in the past to be biased against self-defence. Stern calls for a congressional hearing on the jurisdictional arguments in the case, saying the AJC is willing to testify.

Several other Jewish groups also are gearing up for the court's verdict.

The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organization is co-ordinating diplomatic meetings with UN member states to protest the politicization of UN bodies. It also is urging its members to defend Israel's case in Op-Ed columns wherever possible.

For example, James Tisch, chairman of the Presidents Conference, criticized the ICJ case in the March 14 edition of the New York Daily News.

"The judges may be unbiased, but the question brought to them by the General Assembly is nothing more than the UN's routine discriminatory treatment of Israel dressed up in lawyers' robes and wigs," Tisch wrote.

Concert to feature art from Theresienstadt

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Jews were rounded up by the Germans in the late 1930s, many artists were sent to Theresienstadt, the infamous "model" Nazi concentration camp.

Told it would be an ideal place to work and live, musicians arrived with their instruments and artists brought canvases and paint to the former Czech garrison town. They were encouraged to be productive.

When the camp was liquidated in 1944, most of the Jewish artists had perished, but some of their art survived. This work will be showcased at a concert and lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation's junior chapel on March 27 at 8 p.m.

The Gideon Trio will be performing several works by two Czech composers, Gideon Klein and Hans Krasa, while Montreal artist Rita Briansky will present a slide show of the artwork.

"The evening is spliced between the music and the slides," says violinist and writer Deborah Kirshner, producer of the show and a member of Gideon, a string trio named for composer Klein. She will also give a commentary on the music.

"There is a lot of recent interest in the chamber music composed in the camps. The discovery of these musicians has had a tremendous impact in Europe," she notes, describing the music as "great and important."

She says Klein was an accomplished concert pianist before his internment.

"He had already made quite a name for himself. He did not do much composing until he got to the camp. He was a real genius. He wrote lots of piano music.

"Had he lived, he probably would have written symphonies. I believe he would have been a major force in 20th century music."

Klein survived Theresienstadt, but later died in a labour camp at age 26.

In 1990, some of his music was found in a suitcase hidden in the home of his close friends. "We don't know if they had smuggled out the music or if he gave it to them," Kirshner says. "It was kept in the basement and discovered by the next generation of that family."

Street Scene of Terezin by Karel Fleischmann.

She says the music of Hans Krasa, who died at age 44, is rooted in the eastern European tradition.

"He wrote music that was very much in the tradition of the day – very ironic with a Czech flavour. There are a lot of folk melodies. The music is rustic, intense and raw."

The Beth Tzedec concert had already been booked when Kirshner, on a visit to Montreal, discovered that Briansky was giving lectures about the art of Theresienstadt and invited her to be part of the Toronto event.

Briansky says her own art became very much influenced by the Holocaust after she visited Auschwitz in 1995. Following a trip to the Czech Republic in 1998, Briansky began accumulating a library of art produced in Theresienstadt and doing slide presentations on it.

"I felt that these artists should not be forgotten. We owed it to them to keep their memories alive."

Briansky notes that the camp was populated by sophisticated urban Jews, among them a large group of musicians and visual artists who were encouraged to be creative so the Germans could present this "model ghetto" to the world.

"In June of 1944, the International Red Cross was brought to Theresienstadt to see what a great place – a paradise – the Germans had created for the Jews," Briansky says.

But a group of dissident artists had secretly recorded the reality of Theresienstadt – the slave labour and crowded living conditions. "The garrison was meant to hold 7,000 people, but about 42,000 Jews lived in the barracks. Those artists painted the true conditions and hid their work under floor boards and in the walls."

Briansky will be showing the works of the main dissident artists, including Leo Haas and Bedrich Fritta of Moravia; Karel Fleischmann, a Bohemian; and Austrian Otto Ungar.

Prior to the 1944 Red Cross visit, Theresienstadt was cleaned up and made to look like a real town, Briansky says.

"Before the inspection, someone smuggled out a picture by one of the dissident artists. A Red Cross official who had seen it inquired about that part of the camp during the inspection. After the visit, all the artists were shipped off to the Theresienstadt jail. Only Haas survived."

The children were also encouraged to do art and were taught by a young Viennese artist named Friedl Dicker-Brandeis, who was also deported. She didn't have much in the way of art materials, so they were rationed for the children's use, Briansky says.

"They created 5,000 drawings. One of her students salvaged two suitcases, which were hidden in Prague.

"Most of the work was very optimistic. The truth of the horror was that all the children under the age of 14 were not allowed to live. Most of them perished."

Kirshner, who will be performing with violist Rose Shaw and cellist Orly Bitov, says she's thrilled about the upcoming concert and grateful to Beth Tzedec's Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum and his assistant Marlene Laba for their support. "Rabbi Tanenbaum was instantly interested and instantly supportive.

"[Beth Tzedec's] Cantor [Meir] Finkelstein was the final judge. I had to send him a tape. After he heard the music, he felt this would be an important concert to bring to the Jewish community."

Tickets are $10 at the door.

Musical night at Beth Tikvah features Glick's Suite

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Israeli songs and Srul Irving Glick's Passover Suite will be featured at an evening of Jewish music at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

"The Promised Land – Songs of Our People," features the synagogue's Cantor Tibor Kovari and Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am's Cantor Marshall Loomer. The first half presents the late Glick's Passover Suite, a musical journey through the Hagaddah sung by the Beth Tikvah choir and accompanied by the Festival String Quartet. The second half changes pace by offering modern Israeli tunes sung by Kovari and Loomer, with the Nafshi Band.

"In the first part, there is music that shows how Jews escaped to freedom," says Kovari, "and then the Israeli music signifies how Jews arrived in their homeland, the Promised Land." Musically traveling through history should be an exciting experience, for both performers and audience, Kovari adds.

Loomer asserts that this concert will impart a unique feeling. "Some cantorial concerts have become variety shows, with a mix of Broadway and Chassidic songs. ["The Promised Land"] will be simply the Passover Suite and Israeli music." Loomer's repertoire that evening includes Lu Y'hi, a song of hope in the same vein as The Beatles' Let It Be, and Ha Milchama Ha Achrona, in which an Israeli father promises his daughter that an upcoming conflict will be the final war.

"It's quite rare to hear cantors sing Israeli music," Kovari says. "But I want to make this light springtime concert a fun singalong."

What may also appeal to Jewish music lovers is hearing a choral piece composed by the legendary Glick, who was choir director and composer-in-residence at Beth Tikvah. Kovari is enthusiastic about presenting the Passover Suite, written in 1992, because it "reaches all generations," he says.

Glick selected the melodious highlights in the Hagaddah, from such sections as Ha Lachma Anya, Ma Nishtana and Avadim Hayinu, and composed music that blends traditional and modern nuances. Many Beth Tikvah families already use his compositions during their Seder nights, Kovari notes.

Loomer says he's honoured to be part of an evening featuring Glick's music. "Having known Glick personally, and having sung in his home before he passed away, makes this evening all the more special."

Kovari hopes that the concert will be part of a diverse musical program at Beth Tikvah, strengthened by the recent arrival of choir director Eyal Bitton, who will conduct the Passover Suite. Previously, Bitton served as musical director during the High Holidays at Montreal's Adath Israel Synagogue.

"The Promised Land – Songs of Our People" will take place March 28, 7:30 p.m. at Beth Tikvah Synagogue. Tickets are $20 in advance, $25 at the door and $36 for advance reserved seating. Tickets available by calling 416-221-3433 or through Matana Judaica, Negev or Israel's stores.

Holy Blossom hosts Passover choral concert

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Youthful voices will be heard alongside adult ones at a "Passover Sing-In" titled "A Celebration Across the Generations," Thursday, April 8 – the third day of Passover – at 8 p.m., at Holy Blossom Temple.

The Renanim Youth Choir, which brings together the Renanim Children's Chorus (children up to age 13), and the Renanim Youth Singers (youth to age 19), will be featured along with the Beth Emeth Choir/Zemer Chorale, the Holy Blossom Temple Singers and the Lachan Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir.

"As an intergenerational concert, the story of Passover is passed down from one generation to the next," says Susan Michaels, founder and director of the Renanim Youth Choir, now in its fifth year.

"The concert enables our diverse inter-denominationally mixed community to speak with one, united Jewish voice."

The Renanim Youth Choir will perform many favourites, including Oifn Pripitchuk and L'Dor VaDor. The youth soloists include Sharon Rochberg, Jakie Young, Jeff Bornstein, Chantal Cohen, Marshall Goldfarb, Yehezkel Lipinsky, Adina Mincer and Rebecca Wolanski.

"The whole idea of Passover is to pass on the information through the generations," says Holy Blossom's Cantor Benjamin Maissner, who created the Lachan Choir in 1993 and is its musical director.

"Lachan – one of the Hebrew words for melody – is a group of experienced Toronto-based musicians who share a love of Jewish music," he says.

Members of the Renanim Youth Choir will be performing with three adult choirs in a Passover concert at Holy Blossom Temple. Choir director Susan Michaels is standing at right.

The versatile 25-voice choir has performed in Canada, the United States and Europe.

Maissner is also Holy Blossom's music director and the director of the Holy Blossom Temple Singers, who will be hosting the concert with Charles Heller, conductor of the Zemer Chorale of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

The Renanim Youth Choir will join the adult choirs in a rousing version of Hallelujah. The evening's repertoire will also include a medley of songs by Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, popular verses from Shir Hashirim (Song of Songs) and an eclectic mix of other Jewish liturgical and secular melodies.

Tickets are $10 and can be purchased at Holy Blossom Temple in advance or at the door. Proceeds will go to a children's charity.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

AUSCHWITZ CREEPS INTO ARTIST'S DOMESTIC WORLD

Born in Toronto half a century ago, artist Rochelle Rubinstein likes to draw whatever is around her. In recent months, she has made so many drawings of her studio and other familiar surroundings and their contents that she has used them as the raw material for "INSITE," a new exhibition that opens this week on Queen Street West.

Rubinstein recently introduced a glaringly different type of artifact into her art-filled studio: a set of aerial photographs of the Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp. Snapped by British Air Force reconnaissance fliers and only recently declassified, the Auschwitz photographs and other wartime photos appeared recently in a Toronto newspaper.

A child of Holocaust survivors, Rubinstein felt transfixed by the aerial perspective of Auschwitz-Birkenau with its hundreds of cleanly aligned barracks, gas chambers and other buildings. The photographs were taken on Aug. 23, 1944, about three months after her mother's arrival there.

"It took me about 24 hours to actually figure out what was what, because it's so neat and orderly," she said. "The barracks were tiny rectangular shapes, all lined up. They reminded me of Lego pieces."

Although she has drawn, painted, printed and sewn many works dealing with her family and the Nazis, Rubinstein said she "became obsessed by this new visual information." The death-camp imagery soon filtered into her art.

Her large black gouache drawings and accordion books are on view at the loop Gallery, 1174 Queen St. W. March 27 to April 11. Opening reception, Sunday, March 28, 2 to 4 p.m.

Travel Talk

By BILL GLADSTONE

THE JEWS WHO RETURNED TO EGYPT

Eight centuries after Moses led the Children of Israel from Egypt, a Jewish community thrived on Elephantine Island, a small isle on the Nile in Southern Egypt near present-day Aswan.

Archeologists date the origin of the Elephantine community to the dispersion and exile of the Jews from ancient Israel following the destruction of the First Temple in 586 BCE.

Almost everything we know about this interesting chapter of Jewish exilic life comes from the discovery by American Egyptologist Charles Edwin Wilbour in 1893 of a large collection of scrolls, known as the Elephantine papyri, dating back to antiquity. Eight of these papyri and many related artifacts go on view next month at the Skirball Cultural Centre of Los Angeles in a major exhibition titled "Jewish Life in Ancient Egypt: A Family Archive from the Nile Valley."

Five hundred years older than the Dead Sea Scrolls, the papyri provide historical information about marriage, labour conditions, real estate, religion and burial among the Jews of Elephantine in the 5th century BCE. They are a fascinating reflection of the Biblical accounts given in II Kings and Jeremiah that Jews returned to Egypt after the destruction of Solomon's Temple.

Having seen the Jerusalem Temple destroyed, the Elephantine Jews built a new temple in which they burned incense, performed animal sacrifice, and worshipped the God of Abraham. As the papyri indicate, the Jews of Elephantine observed the Sabbath and the Feast of Matzah (Passover) like their modern counterparts. However, they also worshipped secondary gods and borrowed many sacred rituals from their Egyptian and Persian neighbours, with whom they lived in multicultural harmony.

The presentation of the papyri is enhanced with numerous ancient artifacts related to the life of the period. The exhibition will be on view at the Skirball from April 30 to July 18. 310-440-4500. Web site www.skirball.org Jewish Genealogy: The Israel Genealogical Society is hosting the 24th annual International Conference on Jewish Genealogy from July 4 to 9 in Jerusalem.

If you're researching a family tree, this is a wonderful opportunity to meet genealogical experts and fellow genealogists from around the world, with whom you may tour important Israeli museums, archives and libraries.

The conference takes place at the Jerusalem Marriot Renaissance Hotel, which is offering room rates of $40 to $48 (US) per adult in a double room, including a full Israeli breakfast and all service charges and taxes. El Al is also offering a 10 per cent discount and is waiving all minimum-stay requirements.

"This is an opportunity of a lifetime, with volunteer help every step of the way," said one of the many Israeli organizers who have been busy preparing since last summer. "Archives are extending their hours just for us. We hope to see you this year in Jerusalem!"

Israeli Theme Park: Mini Israel, a relatively new theme park located 15 minutes by car from Ben-Gurion International Airport, presents an opportunity to view "Israel in miniature." The park offers small-scale replicas of many of Israel's holy sites and architectural landmarks and relics, including models of the Old City of Jerusalem and the Negev mountains.

Enhanced by sound, light and miniature garden landscaping, Mini Israel emphasizes the uniqueness of the land and its inhabitants. It is located in the heart of the historical and picturesque Valley of Ayalon, across from the famous Latrun Monastery.

Dance workshop brings Pesach alive

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

"Then Miriam the prophet... took her timbrel in her hand and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dancing."

Brenda Simon, a dance and drama teacher in Toronto, is hosting two workshops that explore the themes of Passover through dance.

"The basic intention of the workshop is to bring that quote from the Bible alive through actual dancing," Simon says.

The workshop is divided into four one-hour segments.

In the first hour, Simon tells the Passover story and discusses it with the group. "I emphasize the metaphorical meaning that the Miriam story carries," she says.

The second part connects the story to the body through meditation, yoga and writing.

"We look for a point of contact between ourselves and Miriam – between our own personal experience and the story of Miriam."

The third hour involves structural dance, led by Simon, involving the Nia technique. It involves modern dance, martial arts such as Taekwon-Do and mind/body techniques like yoga.

"I put together a program that involves the whole body movement," she says.

There are 18 songs through the dance sequence, each taking the dancer through the different aspects of Miriam's story.

"All of the music is taken from world music and is very rhythmic." She says the dance is not too physically demanding and can be performed by people of all ages.

"Last year, we had people ranging from their 20s to their 60s," she says of the workshop's debut.

"I don't recommend it for teenagers, though, because it demands a lot of focus from beginning to end." She says men are more than welcome.

The last hour winds down with the afikoman ceremony. It's mostly silent and allows the participants to "literally incorporate the story into your head and take it with you to your seder."

Simon's goal is to make the story come alive. The Haggadah, she says, was intended to be home-based theatre.

"The workshop is a theatre experience with you as the participant and as the audience."

The two workshops run March 27 at the Walmer Centre, 188 Lowther Ave., and March 28 at the BJCC's Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. Cost is $45, $50 at the door. For times and to pre-register, call 416-536-5944 or e-mail brendasimon@rogers.com.

Richler biography an intimate portrait of a complex man

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Reading Michael Posner's The Last Honest Man, Mordecai Richler: An Oral Biography (McClelland & Stewart) feels like eavesdropping on the late writer's shivah.

Posner's unusual technique of piecing together verbatim conversations with dozens of Richler's relatives, friends, colleagues and acquaintances going back to the late writer's childhood, and interspersing Richler's own words among them, may be the only way to come close to explaining this complex man. Posner keeps his voice to a minimum, filling in explanatory notes that keep the story moving along in fairly chronological order.

There is an intimate, even gossipy, tone to The Last Honest Man that makes for engrossing reading. Posner, an entertainment writer with The Globe and Mail, is more than up to the task of synthesizing so much material contributed by both the famous and the obscure.

More has been said since Richler's death about what made him tick than about what he wrote

More has been said since Richler's death in July 2001 at age 70 about what made him tick than about what he wrote. This book was written with the co-operation of Richler's wife Florence and their five children, but it is not hagiography, at Florence's insistence.

After all the tales of Richler's legendary surliness and offensiveness in this portrait, what emerges is a man who, as the title suggests, is fundamentally moral, and too honest for his own good.

Richler left few people indifferent. It is hard to imagine how so many contradictory qualities could be found in one man. Even those closest to him – and he had many friends – never fully fathomed him, which is consistent with Richler's own view that we can never really know one another.

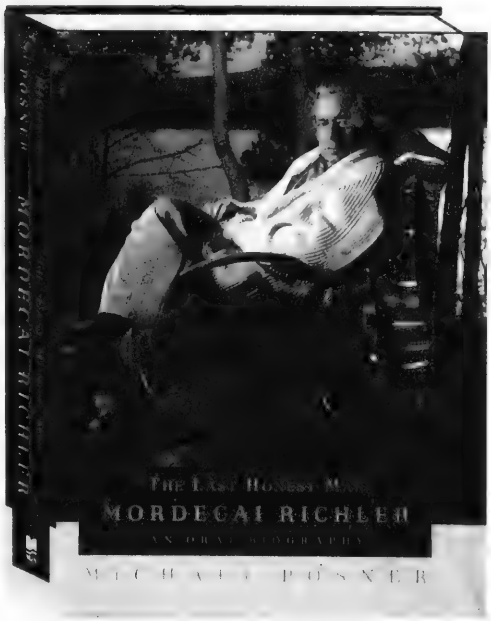
This book is as much about a marriage as about an individual. Florence and Mordecai's was a sort of Beauty and the Beast union. The stunning, elegant Florence seemed mismatched to the boorish young Richler, yet by all accounts theirs was a model of devotion and lifelong romance.

The book shows Florence was his support and anchor, and the gracious one who smoothed over many a social gaffe. She was also Richler's first reader and editor. No matter what anyone says about Richler, no one denies he doted on his wife. It seems he was as surprised as anyone by his good fortune.

Richler's personality is explained in large part by his relationship with his mother, an Orthodox rabbi's daughter. The two despised each other. He had no contact with her for 20 years and didn't go to her funeral only five years before his own. He felt she humiliated his father, a junk dealer. The book gives an account of him finding his mother in bed with another man when he was a boy.

Richler's feelings for his older brother Avrum, his only sibling, were not much warmer, since Richler believed Avrum sided with his mother. But Avrum, a dentist in St. John's, Nfld., harboured no ill will and the two brothers had an emotional reunion about a year before Richler's death.

The strength of the Richler marriage reflected Mordecai's desire to compensate for his unhappy childhood by creating a strong, almost idealized, family of his own. Florence was also looking for security. She was adopted and grew up in working-class Point St. Charles. It was a second marriage for both of them. Richler's first lasted just four years. Florence's first marriage, to filmmaker Stanley Mann, produced Daniel, who would become a Richler.



Domestic life with Richler was not always a bed of roses. Florence had to put up with his embarrassing scenes, moods, including long silences, and self-destructive habits. An entire chapter is devoted to Richler's drinking and cigar-smoking. The preponderance of opinion is that all those single-malt scotches shortened his life.

Richler's son Noah reveals that the family thinks Richler died as he did – unexpectedly – because of inadequate care in hospital. All concede he was dying from cancer, but the end did not appear imminent. Noah suggests that a lack of staff over the Canada Day weekend, when his father died, may be the reason an ulcer was not attended to as it should have been.

All five children are frank in discussing what it was like to have Richler as a father. His dedication to them is clear and there is no question he was a good provider. Richler was a workaholic, toiling every day at his typewriter. Drinking did not affect his self-discipline. Although best known for his novels and articles, Richler took on all kinds of writing work over the years and was financially successful. For the weekly column he did for Southam newspapers from 1997, he negotiated a remuneration of at least $100,000 US.

All the children except the youngest, Jacob, recall how uncomfortable Richler was around them when they were kids, and how impatient he was to see them grow up. Daniel describes it as a "Victorian" upbringing, with the kids and adults living largely separate lives. Nevertheless, their loyalty and respect for their father is clear.

What may be surprising is that Richler maintained some contact with his wider family. Mostly, they are perplexed by him, especially what they see as his unfair depiction of Jews.

Richler authorized a biography by writer/broadcaster Michael Coren in 1994, but Coren eventually gave up, finding that people were not forthcoming. Perhaps they were not ready to be frank about Richler while he was still around.

While a definitive biography of Richler is yet to be written, The Last Honest Man provides plenty of insight in the meantime.

Teach them while they're young

How many of us remember our pre-teen years? Remember the youthful excitement, energy and optimism that filled those days? I also recall, along with that exuberance, how formative those years were with respect to the building of my self-image and self-esteem. Our thought processes begin to become ingrained during these years, and our perceptions and world views begin to form who we are.

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

As parents, we expend much effort to nurture the physical and spiritual essence of our children. Often, in our own race through life, as we try to raise upstanding citizens with good character traits while managing our homes and doing everything else that Jewish "superwomen" try to accomplish each day, we forget to take time to maintain our own health and well-being. Our children see us taking care of everyone except for ourselves. We forget to drink enough, sleep enough, eat right, exercise and breathe in a little of the joy that we are meant to take notice of. Unfortunately, as we do so, we teach our children to take the same approach to their own well-being.

As we know, no matter what we tell our children to do, they will emulate our actions instead. The greatest impact we can have on our children is to model the behaviour we want them to emulate. If we want them to live a healthy lifestyle so they have the energy, enthusiasm and positive outlook to maximize their potential, then we, too, have to live a healthy lifestyle.

If we did not have positive role models when we were young, then many of us will continue as adults to struggle with our self-image and persist in turning to negative "satisfiers" to respond to these struggles. Similarly, when we respond to stressful situations, we often do exactly the opposite of what would most benefit us. If we think back to when some of our negative behaviours began, in all likelihood, they can be traced to our pre-teen/teenage years. It is at that age that certain behaviours begin to stick with us and start to mould our personality, as well as our identity.

As a wellness instructor of pre-teen and teenage girls, I have noticed how vulnerable their moods and self-confidence can be as they grapple with their increasing responsibilities, schoolwork and their growing awareness of life and personal issues. I believe it is essential at this stage to ensure these girls have positive role models to help them establish the proper approach to maintaining a healthy spiritual, emotional and physical life balance. It is at this critical juncture in their lives that either healthy or unhealthy habits and modes of thinking begin to take root within them.

Through my own experience, I have found that one of the most effective ways to tame negative emotions and stress is to do some kind of physical workout. Nothing changes our perspective more immediately than going outside and taking a walk, riding a bike, going for a swim or doing some stretching and deep breathing. Afterward, we feel like we can accomplish anything. If we train ourselves to do this regularly, and if we make any of these activities our regular response to difficult situations and emotions, we will begin to form a stronger, more positive perspective and self-image. And if we teach our children these modes of behaviour, it will become second nature to them to seek positive responses to life's challenges, which will result in a lifelong healthy and optimistic perspective.

I am so pleased when I see my children, even my younger ones, choose healthy snacks on their own, read the ingredients on boxes of snacks and exercise without my even suggesting it to them. At that moment, I witness first-hand the power and effect of my own actions.

Golfer Bruce Fleisher is red hot on the senior tour

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

MIAMI — Life can begin at 50, and get better.

At an age when many people start to think about slowing down and getting ready for retirement, pro golfer Bruce Fleisher proved he could finally make a comfortable living in golf when as a rookie on the senior professional tour in 1999 he won the Royal Caribbean Golf Classic in Key Biscayne.

"There is an angel on my shoulder," said Fleisher after his win. "It is hard to believe a 50-year-old man can stand here and cry."

Fleisher's angel returned as he won the Royal Caribbean Classic again in 2000. Fast forward to 2004. In February, Fleisher had an angel named Jay Fiedler, the quarterback of the NFL Miami Dolphins, who walked the fairways inside the ropes in the last round with Fleisher. Fiedler and thousands of fans witnessed history as Fleisher won the Royal Caribbean Classic a third time, a tournament record.

"Bruce is totally focused. I met him through a mutual friend this week and we have much in common. Watching him win was thrilling," Fiedler said.

The king of the Royal Caribbean Classic won his crown in dramatic style. A birdie on the final hole of the three-day tournament gave Fleisher a six under par 210, finishing one stroke ahead of runner-up Dana Quigley.

"There's something very amazing that goes on when we come here," said Fleisher's wife, Wendy. "I always feel like he can win. Bruce loves the course. To win it again is just unbelievable."

"I was very lucky," said the modest Fleisher, who had to have nerves of steel to deal with the cheering and glad-handling from his hometown supporters. Fleisher has lived most of his life in Miami.

"I always put a lot of pressure on myself, especially at the Royal Caribbean Classic. I feel everyone expects me to do well out here, so I didn't want to disappoint anyone," said Fleisher, who earned $217,500 for the victory.

Fleisher won by avoiding critical mistakes. He posted three birdies on the final day and managed to earn par after falling into the sand trap on four holes.

As of March 18, Fleisher was fifth in the 2004 Champions Tour all-around ranking.

The days when Fleisher doubted he would make a living on the pro tour seem like a lifetime ago. Prior to 1999, Fleisher had won only one PGA tournament – in 1991 – in more than 30 years of competition, despite his breakthrough in 1968 as a "can't miss" kid. At the time, 19-year-old Fleisher became the youngest golfer to win the U.S. Amateur Championships since Jack Nicklaus.

Bruce Fleisher
(c) 2004 PGA TOUR

After turning pro in 1971, following his marriage to Wendy in 1970, Fleisher laboured anonymously, never breaking into the top 10 money winners on the PGA Tour.

By the time he hit his mid-40s, Fleisher was planning for the day he would turn 50. He knew his excellence on the greens and play on shorter courses made his game more suitable to the senior circuit, today called the Champions Tour.

Since his first senior victory in 1999, Fleisher has become one of the circuit's dominant players. He has earned more than $10 million (US), winning 17 tournaments, including the U.S. Senior Open in 2000.

These Tiger Woods-like numbers make it hard to believe Fleisher is the same man who had doubts about earning a living in golf only 10 years ago.

"For many years, Bruce never believed he was as good as everybody said he was. While he was competing on the PGA Tour, he never felt that he was that good. He felt that he was lucky," said Wendy.

In 1980, Fleisher's thoughts were not on making birdies or winning tournaments. At the time, Wendy developed complications under anesthesia while giving birth to their daughter, Jessica. Although Jessica was healthy, Wendy was given only a 20 per cent chance to live. Another year would pass before her health was restored.

Bruce became the family's cook, nurse, babysitter and custodian while Wendy recovered. He quit the pro tour, taking jobs as a teaching pro.

His desire to pursue the life of a golf pro returned in 1989 when he entered local tournaments and won the Club Pro Championship in Boca Raton.

One of the key men behind Fleisher becoming a competitive golfer was the late Sam Sharrow of Miami Beach. When Fleisher's family moved to Miami in 1966, Sharrow recruited Fleisher as his top prospect as coach for the American golf team competing at the 1969 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

"Bruce was a great, down-to-earth kid whom I saw would be a great golfer," said Sharrow in 1991.

Fleisher won the tournament in Israel and the gold medal for the U.S. golf team.

Sharrow is beloved in Israel and immortalized in the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in Tel Aviv for founding the Caesaria golf course, Israel's first and only course, in 1989.

Fleisher followed Sharrow's footsteps and coached the U.S. golf team at the 1989 Maccabiah Games.

"Hardly a day goes by that I don't think of Sam. He meant everything to any Jewish kid playing golf," Fleisher said.

Record turnout at day schools hockey tourney

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Wayne Nathanson was amazed at the turnout at the recent 9th Annual Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Hockey Tournament in which a record 15 teams took to the ice.

The tournament co-ordinator and coach of Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Ducks saw close to 250 kids from 10 Toronto-area schools participate in the event, held this year on five rinks at York University's Ice Gardens.

Associated, which dominated last year's competition, had two teams in the senior division (grades 6-8), but it was United Synagogue Day School (USDS) Bayview that won the senior title. Bayview upset its USDS Bathurst counterpart 5-4 to capture first place, defeating a Bathurst team that had entered the championship having won all its previous games.

USDS Bathurst repeated as champions in the Tel Aviv Division, one of two junior groupings for those in grades 3-5. Associated-Posluns campus won the juniors' Jerusalem Division.

USDS Richmond Hill took part in the senior division for the first time and struggled, but still had a great time, which is what the day was all about.

"It's a really nice community event," said Nathanson, who coached his 13-year-old son Jesse, a left winger. "Some kids got community service hours being timekeepers or scorekeepers and helped the event run smoothly. Everybody had a really good time."

He was especially proud of his team for the way they fought back after starting out a game trailing 8-1, only to lose 8-7.

"I thought for sure my kids were going to give up," he recalled. "I kept saying, 'You know we haven't lost the game yet. We gotta show 'em who's boss, be hungry.'"

Schools played exhibition contests over the winter months as well as a handful of tournament games leading up to the season-ending event at York. The games were held at local rinks from 7 to 8 a.m., ensuring the children could arrive at school by 8:30.

The players ranged in age from seven to 14, representing all skill levels from house league to AAA.

Participants received long-sleeve T-shirts, skate mats and a trophy. The winning schools received large trophies to put in their display cases.

Nathanson was assisted by Michelle Adler, who convened the junior division, as well as Bruce Cowley, who took care of food requirements, including breakfast, lunch, and snacks.

On the shoulders of our shtetl Jews

The Jewish community of Toronto has grown like a teenager's foot over the last century. Its character has been formed by the immigration of Jews from places such as Morocco, Russia, Israel, Ethiopia, Yugoslavia, India and many other parts of the world, but originally it was shaped by our disproportionately large eastern European Jewish population.

Over the years, a charming and sometimes mystifying quirkiness has created a personality that is very distinctive to this neck of the Jewish woods, with its strong shtetl influence.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Did you know that when eastern European Jews arrived in their new land, they established organizations called landsmanschaften (benevolent societies) to financially assist their fellow landsman with sick benefits, insurance and lodge doctors? The landsmanschaften, such as the Shtopnitzers and the Kelcers, were named after the shtetls the founding members came from. Many of our modern communal institutions are descended from the landsmanschaften.

Today, a Shabbat walk in the Orthodox neighbourhoods along Bathurst Street is akin to a stroll one might have taken on the roads of chassidic eastern Europe. Men dressed in long black kapotas (black frockcoats) and shtreimelech (round fur-rimmed hats) and trimmings that imitate the styles worn by the Polish nobility of the 17th and 18th centuries walk briskly to the Agudah shul or Bobover shtiebl, their tallis strings flowing behind them.

Unbeknownst to many, however, there are metaphysical fashion statements reflected in the various hats and coats that the shul-goers wear. As an example, Jews belonging to the chassidic movement called Bobov wear tall, furry hats, while Ger Chassidim wear flat furry ones and Lubavitchers wear fedoras. Look closely next Shabbat and you'll notice the differences.

We are indeed a colourful and intriguing community, though sometimes quite simple in our tastes. Our community is not known for our interest in Cordon Bleu cuisine the way the New York Jewish community is. We are satiated instead by cabbage rolls, chicken fingers and gefilte fish – variations on comfort food from the old country.

Over the years, ambitious restaurateurs and chefs have presented us with beef carpaccio dishes, but our collective taste buds have chosen the old faithful heimishe fare reminiscent of what we might have eaten in the shtetl.

This trend is slowly changing, however, because of a strong generational awareness of gourmet ingredients and divergent culinary impressions made by food aficionados from the Moroccan community and other groups.

In the area of culture, Toronto Jews have tended to rely on the community at large to meet our creative needs. Jewish theatre and journals are generally things of the past. We do not have our own radio station, unlike other smaller ethnic communities. This is a curious phenomenon, especially in light of the fact pre-Holocaust Poland was abuzz with Yiddish theatre and publications reflecting every conceivable ideology. It is almost as though eastern European Jews brought culture with them to Toronto, and subsequent generations chose not to build upon it. Yet, with the advent of the Ashkenaz festival and the Jewish Film Festival, this trend has started to change.

I believe it is important that we express our appreciation to Toronto's eastern European Jewish population, who danced magnificently, courageously and creatively around the stumbling blocks placed in their paths by their painful memories, anti-Semites and, sometimes, other Jews.

Today, well over 100 shuls dot the religious landscape of the Toronto Jewish community and Jewish education is flourishing. Like the song Dayeinu on Pesach – a song of appreciation – we should express admiration to our eastern European Jewish forebears for the fabric they stitched with such toil, ultimately creating a most attractive garment called the Toronto Jewish community.

PASSOVER SPONGECAKE W/APPLES

1/2 cup matzo cake meal
1/4 cup potato starch
6 large eggs, separated
3/4 cup + 1 tblsp. sugar
1 tsp. grated fresh lemon zest
1 tsp. lemon juice
1/4 tsp. salt
1 1/2 tsp. cinnamon
2 apples, peeled, thinly sliced

Preheat oven to 325°F.
Beat yolks and 1/2 cup sugar in large bowl until pale and thick. Stir in zest and juice. Beat whites with salt in another bowl with clean beaters on high-speed until soft peaks form. Gradually beat in 1/4 cup sugar until whites form stiff, glossy peaks. Fold sifted cake meal and potato starch into yolk mixture; fold in whites.
Combine remaining tablespoon sugar/cinnamon. Spoon 1/3 batter into ungreased 9" springform pan. Top with half of apple slices; sprinkle with half of cinnamon/sugar. Repeat with remaining batter, apples and cinnamon/sugar ending with batter. Bake cake 1 hr. or until top is golden, firm and tester comes out clean. Cool in pan completely.

About Life

Dear Ella,

With Passover just around the corner, my anxiety attacks are becoming more severe.

You see, I recently met and instantly fell in love with Kevin. He is my Mr. Right, but he has yet to see my family interact when they are all together. He has met my immediate family, and although they're no picnic, they're nothing compared to the gathering at our Passover seder. There is always fighting, yelling and insults. My family doesn't mean anything by it. It's just their way.

We all gather at my aunt's house in Richmond Hill just north of Toronto and the minute everyone walks in the house, it starts. "I can't believe how far you live. Why do we do this every year?" And she answers, "Don't do me any favours! You know where the door is."

Anyway, Kevin comes from a small family of third-generation Canadians. He is not used to this kind of "love." What should I do?

Petrified at Passover

Dear Petrified at Passover

Your story sounds a little like the movie My Big Fat Greek Wedding. You can't hide your family forever. They are part of your life. It doesn't mean they all get to move in with you. It just means you have to spend a few hours together. I bet you can turn it from scary to heimish very easily. As Kevin is not used to this, he needs some preparation beforehand so he knows they really do love each other and it is not a battleground.

Don't be ashamed of your family – they are your roots. I bet there are some very accomplished people in this crowd, people who have survived many things in their lives and have many stories to tell. To alleviate some of your worries, you could give Kevin a better understanding of your family dynamics.

Have faith in Kevin that he won't judge you by your relatives' interactions. Focus on the good parts, too, and above all, don't be embarrassed.

Give Kevin some credit to be able to see your family for the special people they are. After all, you are part of them.

Happy Passover.

IN SOLIDARITY AGAINST ANTISEMITISM AND HATE

ON GUARD FOR TOLERANCE: Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty led political, religious and community leaders at a rally last week in Toronto against anti-Semitism and hatred. Recently, the Toronto area has seen a spate of racist and anti-Semitic vandalism. From left are Toronto Mayor David Miller, MP Art Eggleton and UJA Federation's David Engel. Please see related stories on pages 3, 5, 22 and 23. [Stephen Epstein photo]

Pesach has arrived

Editorial

The two photo images on this page are incongruous, indeed, almost incompatible. The stern, steely determination on the faces of the leaders and representatives of the three levels of Canadian government eloquently attests to their utter contempt for, and complete renunciation of, anti-Semitism, hatred and all forms of bigotry.

The trusting, sweetly smiling gazes on the faces of the two children as they bite into the same piece of matzah bespeaks a much gentler truth of their innocent world. Pesach has arrived.

But the juxtaposition of the images is deliberate. For both images evoke essentially the same message: we will not be intimidated. Neither the Jewish people nor Canadian society will be intimidated, afflicted or oppressed by the hateful, malevolent individuals who harbour disdain for other people's dignity and for other people's lives.

Sharon's legal problems bring calls to resign

We are fortunate to live in Canada

By KEITH LANDY

Pesach is a time for us to celebrate the freedom that we all cherish. We remember not only our physical emancipation from slavery, but also the spiritual deliverance that began with the Exodus from Egypt and led to Sinai where we received the gift of the Torah. Through the beauty and meaningful symbolism of the seder, we relive the joy of liberation as we are bidden to imagine that we, personally, were delivered from Egypt.

How ironic, then, that throughout the centuries, enemies of the Jewish people have used this festival of freedom as an occasion to perpetrate vicious anti-Semitism and murder on the basis of the blood libel.

Today we are witnessing the re-emergence of anti-Semitism worldwide. In Europe, the new spate of anti-Semitism has been especially alarming in its violence and brazenness. European political leaders are finally beginning to acknowledge the scope of the problem after several years of denial. Due in large part to the advocacy of Canadian Jewish Congress's sister organizations – the European Jewish Congress and the World Jewish Congress – the European Union, in a historic first, convened an anti-Semitism conference in February. And at the end of April in Berlin, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) will also mount a major international forum on the subject.

Canada, unfortunately, has not been immune. Although the anti-Semitic incidents here generally have not been as severe in scope, frequency, violence or malevolence as those in Europe, there has been a disturbing increase in their number, and many of them are in the serious category. Hatred has been propagated and incited, institutions and other property have been vandalized, synagogues and cemeteries have been desecrated, and some places of worship firebombed and individuals and groups as well as the community as a whole have been harassed, abused, threatened and attacked. We, therefore, must continue our vigilance and fight all manifestations of anti-Semitism from wherever they come and to whatever degree.

As I write this message, the Greater Toronto Area has been subjected to a spate of terrible anti-Semitic vandalism. These crimes, yet unsolved, have elicited widespread condemnation by politicians such as the mayor, the premier and the prime minister, as well as chiefs of police, religious leaders and many ordinary citizens. The police are not dismissing or diminishing the seriousness of these crimes, but are sparing no effort to catch the culprits. It is important to take comfort from, and recognize, these widespread demonstrations of support for the Jewish community. Such solidarity was similarly exhibited by Christians along the entire denominational spectrum in reaction to our concerns of potential anti-Semitic repercussions arising out of Mel Gibson's recently released The Passion of the Christ.

Passover Greetings

This Pesach, we should be mindful of how fortunate we are to live in this country today. Each of us has the job of ensuring that Canada remains a place committed to pluralism and diversity, harmonious intergroup relations and civil political discourse. I can assure you that the CJC will continue to play its leadership role in advocating for such a society, but the effort requires a parallel increase in grassroots community involvement in the political process. Organizational advocacy, combined with community civic participation, is the formula for partnership that we must strive to achieve so that the personal liberation we experience at Pesach will manifest itself in collective security and well- being.

I wish you and your family a chag kasher v'samayach.

Keith Landy is national president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Community organizations step up security

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish institutions, schools and synagogues are stepping up their security measures in a rash of anti-Semitic incidents has put the community on edge.

Responding to the concerns of worried parents, schools have stepped up security and are planning a meeting this week under the auspices of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) to discuss further steps.

Some schools and synagogues have hired private security companies or off-duty police officers to patrol their premises and Toronto Police have increased their presence around Jewish buildings, checking the facilities several times a day.

The flurry of activity follows several high profile incidents of anti-Semitic vandalism. First, 13 houses and cars in Vaughan, a community north of Toronto, were daubed with swastikas and other anti-Semitic graffiti. That was followed about a week later when windows were broken at the Pride of Israel Synagogue and at Eitz Chaim Day School in the Bathurst and Steeles area. Nearby, at the Bathurst Lawn Memorial Cemetery, 27 headstones were overturned.

Shortly after that, a 46-year-old Iranian native was arrested in Bloor West Village as he drew swastikas painted with the Star of David on construction site hoarding. Det. James Hogan of the Toronto police hate crimes unit said there is no evidence to link the Bloor incident to those in the rest of Toronto.

Police forces increase presence

In other occurrences, the Lubavitch Centre in Vaughan was struck with eggs while two non-Jewish schools also were hit by vandals. The Pleasantville Public School in Richmond Hill was defaced with two swastikas and other symbols while the St. Elizabeth Catholic High School in Vaughan was spray-painted with the Star of David and the words, "Revenge 4 Nazis."

In Vaughan, police arrested two boys, aged 13 and 14, for allegedly harassing a family with anti-Semitic phone calls. One of they boys has been charged with threatening death and with criminal harassment. The other has been referred to the Youth Criminal Justice Referral Program.

Police in Toronto and Vaughan each offered $10,000 rewards for information about the anti-Semitic incidents while CrimeStoppers pitched in $1,000.

Hogan said the recent spate of incidents was the most concentrated he'd seen in his 2½ years in the hate crimes unit. He declined to speculate on the motivation of the perpetrators, but he suggested they're not likely "sophisticated people."

Last week's rally against anti-Semitism is not likely to deter them as "they're on the margins of society," he said.

Lynn England, office manager for Bathurst Lawn Cemetery, said that within two days of the vandalism, all the headstones had been restored to their original positions. The cemetery will bear the costs of any damage, she added.

Meanwhile, security measures taken at Jewish schools varied across the city, depending on each institution's resources, said Joel Kurtz, the BJE's director of school liaison. The BJE has engaged a firm to survey the current security situation and present recommendations on possible measures. Kurtz noted that schools with larger enrolments appear better able to meet the added costs of extra security, while smaller schools "may have trouble financing it."

At Bialik Hebrew Day School, education director Uri Korin said, "We hired off duty police, we increased surveillance day and night and we follow the guidelines of the community." The cost of extra security is being borne by the school, he added.

Greater Toronto Area

'They make us stronger'

From the editor's desk

Near the end of a long day of meetings and consultations with various officials and community leaders in Toronto, Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada, recently dropped by the offices of The CJN for a pre-Pesach discussion about current events and the state of the Jewish world.

Unfortunately, there was a great deal to talk about. Terrorists had struck in Madrid; hatemongers and vandals had struck in the GTA; and anti-Israel propagandists were striking with their guerrilla theatre at universities and on the street.

The ambassador is urbane and debonair and carries himself with casual, quiet confidence. When he speaks, his eyes lock on to those of the listener, and the muscles in his face clench with fierce resolve.

We spoke about the bombings in Madrid.

"People who blame these horrible incidents of terror on the Arab-Israel conflict are wrong. Events have proved them wrong," Divon said. "Bowing to the will of terrorists does not bestow immunity from terror. Most people understand this. Most people also understand that the terror threatening the Middle East region also poses a threat to the free world.

"9/11 was a watershed event because it exposed the former western policies of appeasement [towards the Gulf states] as a failure. Those policies were aimed at seeking to maintain the stability of the regimes in the area. But stability was simply a euphemism for securing a pro-western tilt in the outlook of those regimes, along with, of course, an open flow of oil. But the policies paid no heed whatsoever to the pressing need to reform the deep structures of the regimes."

Here, the ambassador was expressing his support for the broad policy aims of the American administration in trying to democratize the regimes in the Middle East. He cited a recent UN study written by Arab scholars about the woeful level of social, economic and educational advancement within the Arab world as proof of the need to undertake a deep reform of their societies.

"Reform is the instrument of societal change in the Arab world," he said. "The Americans appear to appreciate this more than any other western country. President [George W.] Bush is saying to the world and to the Middle East regimes that something has to be done."

As for the prospects for structural change in the Middle East, Divon cited Iraq as a reference point. "Most countries view the situation in Iraq through incorrect lenses, namely through the viewfinders of the as-yet unfound weapons of mass destruction and the lack of multilateral authority for the campaign against Iraq.

"The proper approach though," he suggested, "is to view Iraq by examining the results. Without denying the violence there, we must look at the restoration of fundamental educational, health, banking and social services.

"In addition," Divon emphatically asserted, "the changes taking place in Libya's foreign policy owe themselves to the prosecution of the war in Iraq. The risk of nuclear accident is reduced and global security is enhanced."

Haim Divon

When asked to comment on the vandalism and anti-Semitic graffiti in Toronto, the ambassador's answer came quickly. "This tells us how important is the sense of Jewish community. The most effective answer to the attempted intimidation is a strong community, active and involved. Whatever one's views and affiliations and politics, we have to show a sense of communal belonging and caring one for the other. The people who committed those ugly disturbing acts must know that with each incident, they make us stronger."

He then related his own experiences of a week earlier when he travelled out west, as he often does, to meet and speak with students, university officials and businesspeople. He had been invited by Hillel to speak to the students at Langara Community College and at the University of British Columbia (UBC).

At Langara, the ambassador "was shouted down, and met with curses and epithets. Invectives were hurled with nearly frothing hate. They tried to hijack the program. But I stayed to the end and I could see how this irked and annoyed the Israel-deniers who wanted to send me out of the room."

The RCMP accompanying the ambassador were so disturbed by the demonstrators, they suggested he cancel his appearance the next day at UBC. But he refused. He would not be cowed by the decriers and defamers of Israel. "This is a front we must not desert," he told me, as if he were telling it to the RCMP as well.

One student at the UBC event publicly spoke of her shock at the vehemence of the anti-Israel feelings. "I am often very critical of the policies of the government of Israel, but what I saw tonight – the hatred, the aggression and the animosity, makes me wonder what they [the anti-Israel demonstrators] are doing."

"The answer for us," Divon emphasized, "is just to be there. The minute we let them take over, we have lost. But," he added sternly, "we are not running away. We'll be there whenever called upon. This is part of the meaning of our Pesach. That is the answer for us. It is time to think about – and ask ourselves – why we are in shul. What is the meaning of the holiday? What are the obligations of being part of a community?

"We are not running away."

High school students rally against hate

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Close to 1,400 high school students gathered to sing Israeli songs, dance and wonder why in a country as tolerant as Canada, the answer to anti-Semitism is still blowing in the wind.

Last week, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's student council organized a rally in Earl Bales Park against hate in response to recent racist attacks in the city.

Participants, including a number of students from Newtonbrook Secondary School and the Grade 8 class from United Synagogue Day School, waved Israeli and Canadian flags and cheered for the various speakers who encouraged them to be proud of their Jewishness and stand up against discrimination by showing their concern in reasonable ways.

The students sang Israeli songs, some Hebrew translations of Bob Dylan and folk-danced to show support for tolerance and diversity.

"Do not become disillusioned by cowards who act in the middle of the night. That is not what Ontario is about," said Monte Kwinter, the province's minister of community safety and correctional services.

Noted Canadian poet and University of Toronto English professor, George Elliot Clarke, told the students that their stand against intolerance is "essential for maintaining liberty, civil liberty and justice for everyone."

Clarke, a seventh generation Canadian of African American and Mi'kmaq Amerinidian heritage, said that hate crimes try to divide democracies by splitting a community into a "scattering" of different groups.

"We must fight against these attempts to divide us," Clarke said.

Matt Zarek, the head of the student council at CHAT Richmond Hill, warned the students not to let "acts of hate define us.

"We are Jews because we share common ideals and principles. We are Jewish because we love being Jewish – on our terms, not theirs."

He also pointed out that Israel does not cause anti-Semitism. Anti-Semites do. "They hate us not because we're left or right-wing, rich or poor… They hate us just because."

Referring to the Holocaust, Talia Radcliffe, the head of the student council at CHAT's Tanenbaum campus, said that it is about time that "we eradicate the notion that the Jews went to the ovens like sheep to the slaughter.

"The Jews of Toronto will not ignore anti-Semitism," the Grade 12 student said.

Radcliffe also warned the students to recognize the difference between arguing with "those of the anti-Israel policy persuasion and those of the anti-Israel persuasion."

U of T law professor Ed Morgan, who also serves as chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, advised the students to learn their facts.

"You will be faced with a lot of lies and misconceptions about what Israel has been doing over the past few years. Students on campus will try to equate what Israel is doing in this conflict with the Holocaust," Morgan said.

"While every loss of life on each side is a tragedy, there is a difference between the Holocaust where millions of Jews lost their lives in a systematic attempt to eradicate a people, and the current dispute in the Middle East over statehood."

To date, more Americans died on Sept. 11, 2001 than have Palestinians over the past three years, he said.

"Learn your history and know the facts," Morgan told the students.

York lifts suspension of Hillel activities

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

York University has lifted its one-week suspension on the activities of Hillel and Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights .

A third student organization, Generations, a Zionist outreach group at York, has also had its privileges restored.

The suspensions, which barred the groups from hosting events and activities on campus, were imposed after separate March 16 protests led to clashes between the groups in York's Vari Hall.

In street-theatre style, about 25 SPHR activists portrayed checkpoints as places where Palestinian women are indiscriminately murdered by Israeli soldiers. More than 100 Hillel students tried to block the presentation of what they felt was a racist depiction of Israelis.

While Hillel had a permit to conduct a vigil outside Vari Hall for victims of terror, SPHR had not applied for a permit.

According to a statement by York's administration, both groups were disciplined because "Hillel and Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights were aware that, as of Feb. 1, Vari Hall, an academic building, was no longer available for events."

Consequently, both Hillel and SPHR had their privileges suspended for one week while the administration investigated the incident.

The York statement also said that "while we understand that one side may see the other's demonstration as a provocation, nonetheless both clubs were aware of the rules and knew that they were not permitted to demonstrate in Vari Hall."

Last week, Zac Kaye, the executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto and Prof. Marty Lockshin, director for York's Centre for Jewish Studies, met with York's vice-president of student affairs, Bonnie Neuman, and its director of communications, Richard Fisher, in an attempt to resolve the matter.

Kaye said the university could have done more prior to March 16 to prevent the confrontation.

He also suggested at the meeting that it might be beneficial for the university to improve its image by addressing some of the Jewish community's concerns, such as the use of lecture hall podiums by professors to attack Israel and Jews.

Kaye encouraged the university administrators to become more pro-active in bridge-building and suggested that "it would be helpful to meet with the president of York [in a roundtable discussion]."

Lockshin said that he was proud that Jewish students "stood up to be counted against an evil, immoral demonstration," but he recognized that the students engaged in civil disobedience.

"Those who do such things know that there are consequences," he said. "This time, the consequences were light."

In its statement, the university warned the student groups that "future infractions will result in disciplinary proceedings."

York spokesperson Nancy White said the university is still investigating the incident.

60th anniversary of Hungarian Holocaust marked

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The Allies came to call it the greatest crime within the greatest crime. The massacre of the Jews of Hungary – some 480,000 people in just eight weeks of deportations – represented a concentration of killing that outstripped any other place the Nazis scourged.

And since even the German high command considered the war more or less lost by that point, the murder of Hungarian Jews was that much more monstrous.

The madness began March 19, 1944, when the Germans invaded Hungary without resistance and occupied its ally chiefly to prevent it from pulling out of the war.

Anti-Jewish laws were implemented immediately and the deportations of Jews from the countryside lasted just from May 14 to July 9. At more than 8,000 people a day, it was at a rate that not even the crematoria of Auschwitz could absorb.

Some 400 survivors of the slaughter and their descendants pondered the dark days at the Baycrest Terrace's Wagman Centre last week at a service to mark the 60th anniversary of the Holocaust in Hungary.

Chaired by well-known local Holocaust survivor and educator Judy Cohen, the memorial featured a moving candlelighting ceremony, live music from the film Schindler's List and remarks from Hungary's consul general in Toronto, Istvan Emri.

The Hungarian government has declared April 16 a memorial day to mark the Holocaust, Emri said, and the country will host Holocaust-related conferences and seminars in Budapest this spring.

Also among the speakers was Hungary's former chief rabbi, George Landesman, who fled to Canada about a decade ago after receiving death threats for intemperate remarks he'd made about Gentiles.

The number of Jewish deaths in Hungary exceeded the total number of military fatalities sustained by the United States in all theatres of World War II by almost a third, said keynote speaker Annie Szamosi, a screenwriter, director and Holocaust scholar.

Much of Hungarian Jewry was highly assimilated following World War I, and Jews attained high positions in finance and industry. The community remained more or less safe until relatively late in World War II, Szamosi said in her overview.

The first instance of mass murder took place in 1941, when some 12,000 Hungarian Jews were murdered in Galicia. Following the establishment of forced labour battalions of up to 60,000 Jews, between 45,000 and 50,000 died in 1941 and 1942 in German-occupied areas to the east, Szamosi noted.

Hungarian officials, she said, co-operated with the invading Germans in 1944 "with remarkable enthusiasm." Only weeks after the occupation, Jews had to wear the infamous yellow Star of David.

Once the rural deportations ceased, the Nazis divided the remaining Jews in Budapest into two groups: those herded into a ghetto and those who had found refuge in safe houses under the neutral protection of Switzerland and Sweden.

But between October 1944 and January 1945, more than 98,000 Jews were either killed, committed suicide or died of illness or starvation.

Szamosi paid tribute to two heroes from the era, the diplomats Carl Lutz of Switzerland and Raoul Wallenberg of Sweden, who combined to rescue tens of thousands of Jews by issuing false documents.

The memorial was sponsored by the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

Pesach has arrived

We do not yet know who was responsible for all of the recent vandalism in the Toronto area. But it is very likely they share the same dark delusions and fantasies about Jews and Israel as those of their fellow miscreants in Europe and the Middle East.

For nearly four years – ironically since the UN-sponsored conference against racism held in Durban, South Africa, – those fantasies and delusions have been increasingly common fare in mainstream newspapers, on the streets where protesters blandish their placarded piffle, and even in the sheltered hallways of universities.

Some people attribute the increase to the unresolved struggle between Israel and the Palestinians. In truth, however, the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians is not the cause of the re-expressed hatred; it is only the excuse.

As Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University told a large gathering of high school students last week in Toronto, "No one should believe that anti-Semitism is caused by Jews… While we Jews are the targets of anti-Semitism, it is the non-Jews who are affected by the illness. It is the non-Jews of conscience who must lead the fight against the illness that affects non-Jewish society."

But lest people think he suggested that Jews have no role to play in the battle against this most ancient but persistent form of bigotry, Lockshin made plain what our response should be.

"The proper reaction of Jews," he said, "when we see swastikas in Thornhill or homicide bombers in Jerusalem, is for us to do more Jewish things and to dream of new ways to protect and manifest our Judaism."

That prescription, of course, brings us directly back to the photo of the two young children sharing the piece of matzah. It brings us to Pesach and to one of the key, prototypical "Jewish things," the seder.

At the seder we will include the two youngsters in the photo and their siblings and cousins, from the youngest to the oldest, from the shyest to the most playful, from the mischievous to the wise. All will be included.

All will sit around the table – or at least will start the evening around the table – to join in the telling of our ancestors' exodus from Egypt.

At the seder, where their curiosity is aroused and their involvement assured, our children will start to learn who they are. They will learn that the power of 4,000 years of Jewish history stands behind them. They will learn that their lives have meaning and value. They will learn that the world will one day depend on them, too.

With those seder lessons learned, the odds are ever greater that they will succeed in making the world a better place. And in the process, they will also fulfil Lockshin's dictum to "do more Jewish things." For what could be more Jewish than to try to mend what anti-Semitism, hatred, bigotry and violence have broken.

Chag Samayach.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO…

Recent anti-Semitism

There are two words to describe the recent wave of anti-Semitic incidents that have occured in the Canadian Jewish community, especially in Toronto: Mel Gibson.

Al Weinberg
Toronto

Let's show our own truth

How long will Jews continue to be the passive receptors of hateful attacks? Can you imagine the outrage and demonstrations that would follow if someone dared make a movie depicting Arabs/Muslims as murderers, as the Jews were portrayed in The Passion of the Christ?

Despite the fact we voiced polite requests, Mel Gibson went ahead and released his anti-Semitic movie. Now we suffer the backlash in our own backyard and throughout the world. At least Israel had the good sense to ban the movie altogether.

There are enough Jewish film directors in Hollywood – in fact, according to anti-Semites, don't we "own" Hollywood? – and around the globe to counter movies such as The Passion and show the world our "truth." It's time to be proactive about the increasing hate that is being directed at us.

Elisabeth Sipos
Thornhill, Ont.

Passion horror

We were horrified at the page 2 article of The CJN's March 18 issue, "Rabbi links synagogue vandalism to Passion."

No Christian who has studied the Scriptures can blame the Jews for the death of Jesus. God's love for the Jews is all over the Old Testament and New Testament.

Our sin, Adam and Eve tasting of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, killed our close relationship with God.

Jew and gentile and Christian – there is only one God, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

Again, we ask forgiveness for the many sins of gentiles and Christians against the Jews.

Margie Tyson Smith
Thornhill, Ont.

Joint Muslim Jewish statement

On behalf of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, we express our profound outrage over the recent acts of hate and bigotry against our Jewish brothers and sisters in Toronto.

The shameful acts of overturning gravestones, painting crude swastikas on private homes, spraying racist and anti-Semitic graffiti on synagogues and community centres are unacceptable in Canada and have no place in a society that prides itself on its tolerance, acceptance and richness of multicultural, multi-religious and multi-racial components.

The association does not see these acts as isolated vandalism directed against the Jewish community only. We have witnessed with great alarm the rise of anti-Semitism as well as Islamophobia in Canada in recent years. We are all diminished when one race or one religious group becomes the victim of venomous attacks by hatemongers. These acts bring shame to all of us who regard Canada as a model of racial and religious harmony.

Shahid Akhtar and Barbara Landau, co-chairs, Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims

MIT Hillel stands by York

We have recently become aware of the suspension of Hillel@York by the administration of York University. We are shocked and bewildered by this action. In the 1930s, Nazi Germany banned Jewish organizations from university campuses, and now 70 years later, we have seen two Canadian Hillels suspended within one year. Though we have entered the 21st century, it appears that we cannot leave behind the ignorance and hatred our grandparents experienced only a few decades ago.

At MIT, we are only now starting to deal with anti-Semitism on campus. Last month, an anti-Israel group printed blatantly anti-Semitic articles in the student newspaper. We are struggling to convince the administration to condemn this hatred before it gets out of hand.

We realize how important it is to have allies when combating anti-Semitism on campus. You should know that you have our full support in your fight against hatred and bigotry.

While Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights is a political group, Hillel fills many other needs on campus. By suspending Hillel, York is preventing Jews from assembling together for prayer and kosher meals, social events and religious education. The school is preventing its Jewish students from enriching their religious or cultural identities.

We, along with the rest of the Hillel community, are standing with you as you fight this injustice. Wishing you the best of success.

A different view of the 'debate'

Please allow us to correct the impression that was created in "Union's anti-Israel activities draw criticism" (CJN, March 18, online edition) about our photographic presentation about the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which took place at York University in February.

In the article, Seth Winberg is quoted as saying that "the presenters made it clear that they were not interested in actual discussion or debate."

This comment is not only incredulous, but also remarkably brazen, considering that the entire presentation was recorded both in audio and video. The recording shows that Winberg was one of about seven Jewish students who orchestrated a disruption of the presentation barely 15 minutes after it began. After screaming and waving their arms about yelling, "Lies! Lies!" the group abruptly left amid the shock and embarrassment of the audience.

When asked to defend their audacious claims publicly and engage in debate, Winberg and the group refused.

Terror is still seen as legitimate in today's world

The following are edited excerpts from a briefing made by Israel Defence Forces chief of general staff Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon at the International Conference on Low Intensity Conflict Warfare in Israel on March 23.

I would like to focus today on our struggle against Palestinian terrorism, a struggle that has lasted so many years and that has yet to reach a conclusion…

There is no doubt that the present chapter [in the fight against terror] is different from the previous ones. It is a result of a policy adopted by the Palestinians, with Yasser Arafat at the helm, between 1994 and 2000. Instead of building toward peace, the Palestinian leaders – at the same time as peace talks – developed the consciousness of struggle. They avoided confronting the Palestinian terrorist organizations. Instead of taking responsibility for their own fate and concentrating on negotiations, they preferred to place the responsibility for their impotence on Israel. [In their eyes,] terror is a legitimate means in their strategy. The campaign waged by the Palestinians against Israel since September 2000 is a direct continuation of this policy…

The Israel Defence Forces's first and foremost goal is to prevent terror by an uncompromising battle against all those involved in terrorism…

Direct activity against terror operatives cannot on its own bring about a decisive conclusion to the confrontation, despite its major importance in preventing attacks and saving lives. The IDF, together with other security services, currently prevents more than 90 per cent of planned suicide bomb attacks, but we are well aware that the immediate achievements in this preventive activity have only limited significance…

Nevertheless, the accumulation of successful actions against the terror infrastructure, together with the growing damage we have made to the leadership and our success in preventing so many attacks, have a certain effect on the capabilities of terror organizations…

> 'We cannot continue to accept a situation where the Palestinians want to enjoy the rights of a state, but behave as if they are a gang'

An effective struggle against terrorism cannot be carried out by actions against terror operatives only. There also must be efforts to dismantle infrastructures… These infrastructures are first and foremost composed of the industry that produces the legitimacy for terror that exists in the Palestinian consciousness. We use the term "incitement" to describe this infrastructure, and we demand its cessation. We do not refer only to the regular incitement in the media, in the mosques and in the statements of senior officials, but also to the fundamental incitement in the education system and in the public dialogue, which refuses to refer to attacks as acts of terror and instead justifies them.

It must be clear: terror is terror is terror. Even an especially shocking attack – and every attack is shocking – such as the double bus bombing in Jerusalem, which killed many children and received severe denounciation, is not defined by the Palestinian leadership as an act of terror and does not constitute a reason to raid the responsible organization or the perpetrator. Portraying the perpetrators as shahids (martyrs) and heroes and not as vicious murderers creates legitimization for more terrorism. A change in this bitter reality is essential, in my view, for a real change in the relations between our peoples.

It is also necessary to deal with the weapons infrastructures, with everything connected to the smuggling and production of arms and explosives…

The financial infrastructures of Palestinian terrorism must also be dealt with: confiscated funds of "charity associations," which in effect serve the Hamas movement; the transfer of funds to terror organizations from Arab states, especially Saudi Arabia – the main source of Hamas funds; and fund transfers to other terror operatives via Syria and Lebanon from Iran and Hezbollah and from the Palestinian Authority (PA) itself, with Arafat's instructions and approval. Money from other resources, such as donations for humanitarian causes – even from western countries – finds its way to terror purposes, incitement and violence.

Finally, Israel has to contend with the human and operational terror infrastructure – both by arresting cell leaders and their commanders, questioning them, putting them on trial and sentencing them, as well as by dismantling the industry that ostensibly manufactures these operatives and the suicide bombers. For this is the civilian system run by terror groups, which supplies welfare, health, education and religious services to Palestinians.

At the end of this process, there must not be any terror infrastructure in the PA… We cannot continue to accept a situation where the Palestinians want to enjoy the rights of a state, but behave as if they are a gang.

The IDF's second goal, which is combined with the first goal, is… to strengthen the Israeli public's endurance by a just, moral and uncompromising war against terror and to help the Palestinians recognize they will not be able to advance their goals by employing terror, whereas cessation of terrorism is the only way to resume negotiations – based on U.S. President George W. Bush's vision from June 2002 and the road map peace plan – which hold opportunities for them. It is my belief that there is a growing understanding among the Palestinians of this message, and this is of great importance, even if at this stage we have not yet concluded this confrontation…

The IDF's third goal is to expose the truth behind the actions of Palestinian terror groups, mainly with regard to undermining the legitimacy of their methods in Palestinian society and in the international arena, and on the other hand, increasing the legitimacy of IDF operations – that is, the uncompromising war against terrorism. I believe it is important to emphasize in this connection that the struggle over the legitimacy of employing terror as a tool to act against the West in general, and against Israel in particular, is far from reaching a conclusion, even though it seems terror has no legitimacy. Iran, Syria, Hezbollah and Palestinian terror organizations, and to a certain extent the rest of the Arab world, continue to support terror. And even in some western states, the recognition of the need to fight terror and deny it any legitimacy is incomplete…

It is important to say a few words about the link between Palestinian leaders' deliberate policy of not taking responsibility [for the security situation there] and terrorism.

Arafat and Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia refuse to take responsibility, so Palestinian terror continues. The Lebanese refuse to take responsibility for security in Southern Lebanon in accordance to the United Nations Security Council Resolution 425, so Hezbollah continues to carry out provocations along Israel's northern border. The Syrians also refuse to take responsibility over the situation in Lebanon or for the operation of terror headquarters in Damascus. The refusal to take responsibility has become an epidemic in the Middle East. This dodging should not be treated as an acceptable policy and these regional actors need to face the fact that, in line with the principle of "admission by omission," they are responsible for the terror carried under their auspices.

In light of the PA's unwillingness to be accountable, Israel is currently considering the possibility of disengaging from some of the areas under its control, including the dismantling of settlements. This disengagement is not designed to unilaterally determine the final status and borders of a future Palestinian state, but rather to allow Israel to manage the conflict until the Palestinians demonstrate their willingness and/or ability to return to the peace process and to implement the steps outlined in the road map peace plan that pertain to dismantling terror infrastructures and taking responsibility for security. Until then, the security fence is a vital part of Israel's ability to defend its citizens. It has proved to be most effective as a preventive security device that has decreased the ability of suicide terrorists to infiltrate into Israel. It should be emphasized that this fence is temporary and does not constitute a political border between Israel and the Palestinians.

We, the Israeli defence community, have to provide our citizens with the best defence we can. While planning the security fence and its features, we bear in mind two things: on the one hand, we strive to provide maximum security for Israelis, and on the other hand, to reduce the Palestinian population's suffering. But the reality is very complex, though in those places where the contradiction emerges between the two – that is, between the freedom of movement and the right to live – we shall always choose the right to live.

In conclusion, the struggle against terror in general, and against Palestinian terror in particular, is a complex and difficult one. The terrorist leaderships have succeeded in adopting within Palestinian society a system of distorted concepts that fly the flag of terror. In order to defeat terrorism and prevent state elements that allow these groups to perpetrate terror, there is a need not only to fight the terrorists themselves and to dismantle the physical infrastructures, but also to… expose the truth about the culture of terrorism that we are contending with.

However, this is not a worthless struggle, as some Palestinians are reassessing the subject and together with international policies determined to fight terrorism and deny its legitimacy, and the uncompromising battle by the IDF and Israel's security services against terrorist groups, this Palestinian soul-searching may strengthen over time and lead them to sever their connections with terrorism… When the Palestinians understand that terrorism takes them backward and that their aspirations will never be fulfilled through terror, that will probably be the turning point. I believe that is the challenge for a new and different Palestinian leadership, and their obligation to their own people.

Between parenting and grandparenting

On Passover, we are commanded to experience the exodus personally, to tell the story as if we had gone out of Egypt ourselves and not our ancestors.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

The ritual is meant to help us transcend the space-time continuum. It is a difficult if not impossible challenge. Yet, this feeling of presence marks our tradition and informs us of our personal commitment and stake in the history of our people. This attempt at time travel enables us to feel that God redeemed us, too.

Recently, on a very personal level, I managed to experience such a time warp.

As some of you may know, I have just spent four months in New York caring for my three grandchildren, ages 18 months, three and five. There I was, almost 60, doing what I did at 30 – car pool and lunch boxes, diapers and early mornings. And I did it. In fact, I experienced the entire event as though I was the parent.

I am not referring to being in charge or to the awesome responsibility involved, nor even to the amazing fact that I had the energy for it all. Rather, the experience itself imposed on me all the senses I had had when my children were those ages. As I pushed the youngest in her stroller or checked on the boys as they slept, I would feel a smile on my face. The reality of my situation was nothing to smile about: my daughter-in-law was ill and I was taking care of the entire household. But I was transported into a time of full parenting and things were good on that level.

It is a strange feeling to live in two time zones. We do it as Jews, and I think we do it as grandparents.

OK, I have to say it. There is nothing like being a grandparent. If on Shabbat we get a taste of the world to come, as grandparents we get an intimation of immortality. It is not that it is easier to be a grandparent than a parent, but that the pleasures are unadulterated. Love for a grandchild extends beyond the bonds of family and beyond the bounds of self-expectations. Without direct responsibility, one's sense of self is expanded. The continuity of generations is visible and ultimately concrete.

We may give our children the gift of life, but when they marry and have children, they create eternity. As older people, we get to know death. As grandparents, we meet the never-ending chain of human existence, of eternal life.

So on Passover this year, as I sit surrounded by my family, I will celebrate redemption and durability of the national and human kind.

Gimme that old-time religion

Last month, I went to see Mad Max Mel Gibson's splatter/gospel film, The Passion of the Christ. Having grown up in a Christian household, with my father, grandfather and uncle in the Protestant ministry, I thought I had heard and seen it all. I was wrong.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Whatever Vatican II said about the need for the Catholic Church to rescind its blame of the Jews for the death of Jesus, you won't find it in this movie. This is back to the 13th century, with a vengeance. A whole lot of vengeance.

I saw the film with a Catholic theologian, Charles Paris, the former executive director of the British Columbia branch of the Council of Christians and Jews. If anything, he was more horrified than I was. After, I had dinner with his family and their friend, a Catholic priest and teacher. He too was appalled at the film and its unsubtle message.

"A movie of unremitting violence from beginning to end," Paris said. "[It was] produced by one who revels in the depiction of human depravity. It distorts the Gospels and the vigorous and compassionate post-Vatican II Christian spirituality."

There are many reasons why this movie – made by a man whose departure from modern Catholic teachings is well-documented, and who built his own church where I guess he can revel in his dark fantasies of restoring the Inquisition – is anti-Jewish. I will give only two.

First, we see Jesus in the garden of Gethsemane, being tempted by a satanic and slimy figure – the devil. And in case you think Satan is just some lurking flasher, out from under his robe slithers a snake, which sidles up to Jesus, who is already writhing on the ground, and crawls over him. Up rears Jesus and crushes the snake's head. Wow! Dark foreboding and a reminder of the sin of Eve.

That satanic figure reappears in a howling mob of priests who turn up to have Jesus arrested. He is then brought to trial in front of what look like the Elders of Zion, and sent off to the Romans to be executed. The priests themselves are in full Hollywood mode, with really big gold crowns of various types, full tallitim and staffs that look like they were borrowed from Raiders of the Lost Ark. So – get it? – the Jewish priests are really from the Synagogue of Satan. Satan finally gets swallowed up in a big sandstorm when Jesus dies, so Jesus finally defeats the satanic forces of you-know-who.

The second thing that gives heft to The Passion's anti-Jewish theme is the priests' demeanour. They are portrayed so stereotypically that it hurts. While it is not translated, the line about Jesus's death, "Be it on our head," trembles on their lips when Pilate – a noble Roman, you betcha – caves in to their begging. They remain stony-faced while Jesus is whipped and even accompany him to the cross, where they again revel in his suffering.

That evangelical Protestants across the globe are taking their congregations to this movie, and, worse, taking children and teens to it, makes me ill. Who would know that this quivering mass of flesh, this swooning Jesus (played by James Caviezel) crawling along the fictitious Via Dolorosa was the same man who gave the Sermon on the Mount? You won't learn that from this movie.

What you will see is the snarling Jews turning him over to a kindly, if conflicted Roman official, who finally gave in to their raucous demands and told them, "It's on your head, I wash my hands of it."

What is worst of all is that most people who go to see this film will know next to nothing about the Gospels and about the distorted picture they give of the Jews. Few will have an understanding of modern interfaith studies of the Christian Bible, dialogues that counter the contemptuous teachings that poisoned Jewish-Christian relations for so long.

Many have laboured long and hard to overcome that teaching of contempt. But as Paris said, "[The Passion is] a movie that, in the immature and unbalanced mind, leads easily to the contempt of the Jewish people."

It should be called Braveheart Goes to the Crucifixion.

Judaism: it's not just for kids

My son turned three a few days ago and almost overnight, his command of English improved tenfold. I'm having a busy month, so I've asked my toddler to write the column this time. But just this once – he's my son and I love him, but business is business.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

Thanks, Daddy. Now that my speech and writing have improved, I feel that I can share a few thoughts about growing up Jewish. Let me begin with the bris. WHAT WERE YOU THINKING? I realize that circumcision is a time-honoured mitzvah, one that has connected Jews to the days of Abraham for many centuries. And, if you're forced to drink wine before nine in the morning then Manischewitz is clearly the way to go, but for goodness sake, please don't do that to me again!

I guess what I've enjoyed the most in my slightly more than 1,000 days of life are the Jewish holidays. I don't fully understand them, but they seem to break up my routine quite nicely.

Rosh Hashanah – not bad. I'm in some kids' program all morning doing puzzles while the grown-ups pray. I get to visit a few times for a few minutes while a guy in a bathrobe blows a horn. I don't recognize the tune, but it's loud, so it's cool. What I love the most are the Rosh Hashanah lunches and dinners – all I can say is "show me the honey!"

Sukkot – love it. I don't understand why the treehouse in our back yard is only up for eight days and why it's not in a tree, but I like waving around the branch and sniffing the lemon.

Chanukah – what can I say? There are presents, sweet foods, candles and the dreidel game. The story is pretty violent – more so than anything I'd be allowed to watch on TV – but I get chocolate coins, so I cope.

Purim is pretty cool, too. It's like Halloween, only without having to wander in the dark and knock on the neighbours' doors. The story about how some man wanted to kill Jews troubles me, but, like Chanukah, I get a treat later.

Pesach is coming up. What strikes me the most about Pesach is the irony of the afikoman. I'm not allowed to drink apple juice in a closed cup in the living room, but my mom or dad can take a crumbly piece of matzah, wrap it in a napkin and shove it under the couch cushions while my sister and I run around the house looking for it. I also can't figure out why the treats we get on Pesach all taste like egg or why that piece of Pesach cake is taller than I am.

My confusion aside, the holidays are fun. When I think about it, though, I wonder: are my Mommy and Daddy having fun too? Or are they just making sure that my sister and I have a good time? When I looked around the synagogue during the megillah reading, I noticed all of the kids were wearing really cool costumes, but some of the adults weren't wearing costumes at all.

Is Purim just for kids? Is Sukkot? Chanukah? Pesach? That's OK with me for now, because I'm a kid. But I'd like to be convinced that these holidays will continue to bring me joy when I'm older.

With Pesach just around the corner, more than anything, I want to see all the grown-ups around the seder table singing songs, telling the story of Pesach, learning – and enjoying it all.

The best Jewish holiday gift any grown-up can give a child is their own enjoyment of the holidays. Keeping me happy and engaged is good for ensuring Jewish continuity. But modelling grown-up engagement gives that continuity a purpose.

Judaism isn't just for kids. I want the grown-ups to enjoy it with me, in ways that that are meaningful to them. I might even hide the afikoman this year and make the adults look for it.

I've enjoyed writing for you, but I have to go. It's time to throw soup.

Chag samayach.

Yassin's crusade to destroy Israel burns brightly

Israel's assassination of Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, the founder and spiritual leader of Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement, was anything but surprising.

Born in a fishing village near Ashkelon, Yassin was an implacable enemy whose contemptuous and dismissive attitude toward peace and reconciliation was predicated on his desire to destroy Israel and replace it with an Islamic state where Jews might be tolerated as dhimmis, or second-class citizens. At times, he may have been willing to settle for an extended ceasefire after a full Israeli withdrawal from the territories and the return of Palestinian refugees to their former homes in what is now Israel. But ultimately, Yassin's strategic objective was Israel's destruction through armed struggle.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

When he and his cohorts talked about Israel's occupation, they were referring not only to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, but to Israel itself. The jihad of unbridled terror they unleashed a decade ago has claimed the lives of hundreds of Israelis and tragically transformed Israel into the world's most dangerous country for Jews.

Still, Yassin's brutal clarity was eerily refreshing in what is too often a tableau of Palestinian prevarication regarding their intentions. Yassin did not mince words, nor has his uncompromising successor, Abdel Aziz Rantisi, who opposed last summer's short-lived hudna, or truce. Last week, a day after Yassin was obliterated by a barrage of missiles as he left a mosque near his home in Gaza, Rantisi declared: "The Israelis will not know security. We will fight them until the liberation of Palestine, the whole of Palestine."

Ahmed Yassin

Yassin's demise was foretold by Israeli actions and words. Last September, following Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's official declaration of war on Hamas and Israel's botched attempt to eliminate Rantisi, Israel tried to assassinate Yassin. Though slightly wounded, he lived to see another day. But his days were numbered.

In mid-January, Israel's deputy defence minister, Zeev Boim, announced that Yassin was "marked for death" and would be tracked down. On the eve of Yassin's assassination, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz indicated that Israel would ratchet up its concerted campaign against Hamas' leadership.

Yassin was targeted not because he actually planned the 52 suicide bombings Hamas perpetrated since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising, but because he sanctioned, legitimized and stamped them with the imprimatur of Islam.

Yassin orchestrated hundreds of attacks, including shootings and stabbings, but two operations appear to have finally sealed his fate.

The first, the Passover massacre in Netanya in March 2002, killed 30 Israelis, an unprecedented toll. Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, the current chief of staff, has described it as a tipping point, the moment Israel decided, once and for all, to kill Yassin. By virtue of his status as a political rather than a military figure in Hamas' hierarchy, Yassin had enjoyed a kind of immunity.

Israel arrested Yassin twice, in 1984 and again in 1989, but refrained from imposing the ultimate penalty on him. However, in the aftermath of the devastating Netanya bombing, which triggered Israel's invasion and occupation of the Palestinian autonomous areas in the West Bank, Israel modified its policy.

The second incident that brought Yassin one step closer to "martyrdom" – a concept he apparently cherished – was the recent double suicide bombing in the port of Ashdod. Carried out by Hamas in conjunction with the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, an offshoot of Fatah, controlled by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, it was the last straw insofar as Israel was concerned.

The attackers, having sneaked into Israel either through the heretofore impregnable Gaza security fence or in shipping containers, killed 10 civilians. But their prime objective appears to have been the port's storage tanks containing toxic chemicals. Had they succeeded in blowing up these surprisingly vulnerable facilities, they would have caused a catastrophe. By targeting Ashdod, Hamas raised the stakes, escalating the grinding conflict to new, more deadly heights. And so, in a fatal stroke, Yassin signed his death warrant.

Yassin's associates, ranging from Rantisi and Mahmud Zahar to Mohammed Dief and Khaled Mashaal, probably will fare no better, as Mofaz has suggested. They have been singled out for elimination because, like Yassin, they categorically reject the idea of peaceful coexistence with Israel and hew to a one-state solution. Should Arafat formally renounce the two-state solution, he will doubtless meet Yassin's fate.

Viewed more broadly, Israel's decision to take out Yassin was inextricably bound up with Sharon's much-publicized plan to disengage unilaterally from Gaza. By all accounts, Sharon intends to pull out from most or all of Gaza – a Hamas stronghold – and from a handful of isolated settlements in the West Bank within a period of about 18 months.

Yet, with Lebanon in mind, Sharon does not want the withdrawal to be perceived as a retreat under fire and a sign of weakness.

Israel's unilateral pullout from its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon in May 2000, though militarily and politically sound and necessary, took place far too hastily and under a dark, defeatist cloud. Hezbollah proclaimed victory, while the Palestinians, not without reason, concluded that they would be able to drive the Israelis out of the West Bank and Gaza also by violent means. Thus emboldened, and using Sharon's ill-advised foray to the Temple Mount as a convenient pretext, they lit the fuse of the intifadah.

In an effort to dispel the mounting Palestinian perception that the disengagement plan is a tacit admission of fatigue and weakness, Israel has responded to continuing Hamas attacks by stepping up the frequency and ferocity of its armoured incursions into Gaza. In tandem with these raids, Yassin's assassination was designed to convey two points: Israel is strong and resolute and intends to pound Hamas relentlessly.

Abdel Aziz Rantisi

Nevertheless, Sharon gambled by killing Yassin, a revered leader and an iconic symbol of Palestinian steadfastness.

If the past is any guide, there is sure to be a severe counter-reaction. In the wake of Israel's 1996 assassination of Hamas bombmaker Yehiye Ayyash, known as The Engineer, Hamas and Islamic Jihad killed 59 Israelis in a wave of retaliatory bombings that spelled the end of Shimon Peres' hopes of defeating Benjamin Netanyahu in the general election. (Interestingly enough, Peres was critical of Yassin's assassination, saying he had not been a "ticking bomb" and warning of an escalation in terrorism). And after Israel killed the leader of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine in August 2001, the Israeli cabinet minister, Rehavam Ze'evi, was assassinated.

Immediately after Yassin's assassination, gunmen fired mortars and rockets into Israeli settlements in Gaza and tried to attack a settlement there. In separate incidents in Tel Aviv and Jaffa, unknown assailants injured six civilians. To say that these attacks were merely a foretaste of things to come is to understate the case.

Certainly, Yassin's passing will redouble Hamas's resolve to sabotage what is left of the tattered peace process, and may yet complicate Sharon's efforts to extricate Israel from Gaza.

With Yassin having been elevated to an instant martyr and hero, the Palestinian Authority – which is already abysmally weak, politically fractured, torn by anarchy and riddled with corruption – will be even less motivated to crush Hamas-style terrorism, a key demand of the internationally sponsored road map to peace.

And as long as the Palestinian Authority is soft on terrorism, Sharon will not engage the Palestinians in talks and continue to insist that Israel has no "real Palestinian negotiating partner for peace." Hence his preference for a unilateral disengagement, or separation, from the Palestinians.

Sharon's plan, though, is problematic for two reasons. It is not reciprocal. The Palestinians are not expected to make political concessions in exchange for tangible Israeli moves. And Sharon's demand to annex three West Bank settlement blocs – Gush Etzion, Maale Adumim and Ariel – in return for a withdrawal from Gaza and from several isolated West Bank settlements is opposed by the Palestinians and the United States. These issues will be thrashed out when Sharon visits Washington on April 14.

Whatever happens in Washington, you can bet that Hamas will not lay down its arms. Thirsting for revenge after Yassin's assassination, Hamas is gearing up for a new round of attacks. Several weeks ago, a senior Hamas official, Osama Hamdan, pledged to fight until "the rest of Palestine" is "liberated."

Yassin lies dead and buried in Gaza, but among the Palestinian faithful, his zealous crusade to eradicate Israel still burns brightly.

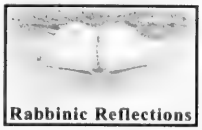
Pesach and silencing the inner dogs

By RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN



There is a delightful story about a fox who was looking for lunch when he noticed a beautiful bird sitting on top of a tree. The sly fox tried to convince the bird to come down.

"What do you think, I'm a fool?" said the bird. "If I come down you will certainly devour me!"

"No, No!" said the fox. "I won't hurt you. Haven't you heard the news? Mashiach has arrived and Isaiah's prophecy that 'the wolf will lie down with the sheep' is the new way of life. Come down, my dear bird. There is nothing to worry about. I am now your friend".

As the fox finished speaking, they heard the sound of barking dogs in the distance. A hunting expedition was on its way and the fox started to flee in fear for his life.

"Didn't I just hear you say the messianic era of peace has dawned?" asked the bird. "Why do you rush away?"

"What should I do?" asked the fox. "You and I know the truth, but those hunting dogs don't believe in Mashiach!"

You see, Mashiach cannot come in isolation. Mashiach is about transforming the world around us. As long as the dogs of this world don't believe and haven't changed their ways, the utopian era of Mashiach cannot become a reality.

This week, we celebrate Pesach with Jews the world over. The focal point of the holiday is obviously the seder, when we will recall the amazing story of the Exodus. While we will surely remember the physical freedom of our ancestors from slavery in Egypt, we will also emphasize the spiritual birth of our people, one that culminated with us standing at Mount Sinai and God giving us the task of teaching morality to the world.

This spiritual birth of our people was accomplished in two steps, the first being the hasty Exodus and disengagement from the unholiness and pagan ways of Egypt. This was followed by a process of spiritual rehabilitation for a period of seven weeks, known as Sfirat Ha'Omer, the counting of the Omer.

On a deeper level, we can all experience these two phases of the Exodus. "Egypt" is not a geographic location, but an unholy place in our own hearts. As in the Exodus, we must first extricate ourselves from the evils within. Then we must start to rehabilitate ourselves and transform the challenging parts of our personality into holiness.

Pesach is our road map to practical spiritual growth. First, we must stop speaking badly of others and hurting their feelings, and refrain from all immoral and unholy behaviour. But this alone is not enough. Disengagement must be followed by transforming ourselves on a deeper level. We must change our attitudes and approach toward our fellow man and we must work to change our spiritual attitudes and develop a relationship with God. Only then can we truly achieve spiritual freedom. As long as the inner "dogs" are still barking, spiritual freedom is just wishful thinking.

Recently, there has been much talk about Israel's security fence. After three years of suicide bombings and many more years of disillusionment with the Palestinian leadership, Israel's leaders have decided the only way to deal with the horrific terror plaguing the country is by unilaterally disengaging from the Palestinians and building a fence to protect its citizens.

Yet, despite the best of intentions, the approach is set for failure. Beside the basic problem of it being perceived as a further concession to terror and the issue of giving up chunks of Israel without getting anything in return and further risking the security of Israelis, it simply won't work. As long as Arab children are being taught in schools, homes and mosques to hate Israelis, all attempts to disengage will ultimately fail. Disengagement may temporarily solve the problem, but it's a Band-Aid solution.

The only possibility of living in harmony will come with a major change in attitudes and the re-education of Arab youth to have a positive approach to Israel and Israelis.

Pesach 2004 is a time to think about the "mean dogs of this world" on the inside and outside, and what we can do to rehabilitate them so that we can hasten the arrival of Mashiach in our days.

Answers to Passion's questions, part 1

The Historical Jesus* by J. D. Crossan, HarperCollins, 1991.
Judaism and Christianity: The Differences* by Trude Weiss-Rosmarin Jonathan David, 1972.
A Rabbinic Commentary on the New Testament* by Samuel Tobias Lachs KTAV Publishing House Inc., 1987.
Jesus and the Judaism of His Time* by Irving M. Zeitlin Polity Press, 1988.

What is the Jewish attitude toward Jesus? How do Judaism and Christianity differ? Since the release of Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ, I have received many requests to provide answers to these complex and many-sided questions. These books can help provide answers.

It should be said at once that there is no official Jewish teaching about Jesus any more than there is a definitive Jewish posture in regard to such giants of the spirit as Muhammad, Buddah or Confucius. What follows is a personal approach that is shared, I believe, by many students of Jewish and Christian religion.

For more than 200 years, ever since critical analysis was first applied to biblical literature, Christian scholars have attempted to write an objective biography of Jesus. These accounts have been as different as the temperaments and interests of their authors. Some of the biographies have depicted him as a fiery prophet and social reformer, some as a personality with a simple message of charity and love for his fellow man, some as a self-proclaimed messiah, some as a supernatural figure with miraculous healing powers. It is not surprising that even pious seekers agree that the quest for the historical Jesus is futile.

The so-called "real" Jesus is hidden behind four different accounts of him in the Christian Bible, and aside from these Gospel versions, there are virtually no other sources from which to gain any knowledge of his life or teachings.

Unfortunately, the Gospels – written from 40 to 90 years after his death – are filled with gaps and contradictions, encrusted with legendary accretions, influenced by the theological preconceptions of their authors and concerned with influencing or placating the Roman authorities of the time.

I think it is helpful in this discussion to make a distinction between the terms "Jesus" and "Christ" and what they imply.

"Jesus" is a proper name for the Hebrew Joshua. It denotes a Judean of 19 centuries ago, around whom the Gospels weave a radiant biography. They indicate that his concern was an ethical and redemptive message to a strife-torn and restive society, addressed especially to the poor and outcast.

"Christ," on the other hand, derives from the Greek word for saviour, closely akin to the Hebrew word "Mashiach." "Christ" represents the concept of a man-God, not a mortal creature, who came voluntarily into this world to atone for the sins of men and women by self-immolation on the cross. This is an act that cleanses all who accept it.

In my Jewish frame of reference, Jesus is a human being who served men and women by his life and teachings, and "Christ" is the term for a hallowed deity who served men and women by his death. Jesus is the man who strove to pattern this world into a kingdom of God; "Christ" is a God-head who would win for his followers a future paradise beyond.

Jesus' life and his ideas were a product of his Jewish birth and background, though his apparent belief in the imminent dawn of the kingdom of God led to important deviations from his Jewish faith. It was the Hebrew Scriptures, particularly the prophets' vision of brotherhood and peace, that nurtured his message and teachings.

Scholars point out that the so-called "Lord's Prayer" and the Beatitudes from the Sermon on the Mount, perhaps the most familiar and enduring of his teachings, can be reproduced almost phrase by phrase from contemporary Jewish sources. Jesus's great contribution was to collect this rabbinic material and present it in an original and memorable form.

When Jesus was asked about the essentials of his religion, he replied, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One" and, "Love your neighbour as yourself." Both are quotations from the Hebrew Bible, and the very foundations of Judaism's faith.

Pesach foods for special diets - Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Cooking for Passover is tough enough, but for people with food allergies, observing the holiday is extra difficult. Luckily, there's plenty of Passover dietary advice on the Internet.

Rivka Leah Schwartz knows a challenge when she sees one: "Surviving Passover with Food Allergies." Schwartz has kids who are sensitive to wheat and eggs and some who are also allergic to milk products, as well as parents who can't have eggs and relatives who aren't allowed mushrooms and dried fruit (sulfites). What does she do? A lot of planning. And she has plenty of advice to share, such as:

- People with sensitivities to wheat can look for matzah made of oats or spelt.
- Buy a kosher-for-Pesach steamer and steam lots of vegetables, such as broccoli, cauliflower, carrots and celery.
- For breakfast, try "baked apples, baked pears, meringue cookies, cakes made with nuts, matzo and jelly, baked potato or sweet potato… You may just find you eat better during… Pesach than you do the rest of the year!" [www.jewishholiday.com/allergies.html]

And then there is the nut problem. People with nut allergies must be extra vigilant on a holiday when so many foods contain them as ingredients. Michael Kesztenbaum only found out at a Passover seder that he was allergic to nuts. Now his family avoids most processed foods, ice creams, chocolate and store-bought cakes. "Ground nuts are used in many Pesach cakes to replace the flour and work with the matzah meal to give the pudding flavour and texture." His family only uses olive oil, because many vegetable oils include nut oils. And of course, charoset with nuts is out. On the other hand, they say, manufacturers are becoming more sensitive and are starting to offer more nut-free Passover products. [www.totallyjewish.com/pesach/features/]

In his article "The Kosher Consumer Copes with Allergies," Joe Regenstein gives this key advice: "Consumers should not assume that kosher markings ensure the absence of trace amounts of the ingredient to which they are allergic. We also recommend that the very allergic consumer consider purchasing cases of product – testing each product in small amounts first before allowing unrestricted access. A new lot of the product (i.e., a different code) should be treated as a new product." [http://makeashorterlink.com/?F21B31963]

If you maintain a natural, yeast-free diet, here's where you will find recipes for vegetable soup, matzah balls, charoset and pears 'n honey matzah pie. [www.nutritioninstitute.com/Passover.html] Speaking of matzah balls, what do you do for someone who has celiac disease and can't digest wheat gluten? [www.celiac.com/] Debbie Kerry made some gluten-free matzah balls using eggs, margarine, chicken stock and potato flakes. Ground almonds can be added, but you'll need to fiddle with the quantities to get the right stiffness. [www.jewish-food.org/recipes/matzglut.htm]

And then there's a different kind of food safety that can affect any family. Israel's Magen David Adom recommends extra care be taken around the holiday table against choking. As Judy Siegel wrote in the Jerusalem Post, "hard, dry matzah can be dangerous, and increased fish consumption during the holiday raises the risk of getting a fish bone stuck in the trachea… Magen David Adom has warned parents to be very careful about giving matzah to young children, particularly when they are unsupervised." If possible, learn or refresh your CPR and artificial resuscitation skills before the holiday. [www.jpost.com/Editions/2001/04/04/Health/Health.24153.html]

And finally, everyone, even those with the strongest constitutions, is a potential victim of what might be called "Pharaoh's Revenge." After dining on a diet of matzah, horseradish, wine and assorted foods low in fibre, digestive complaints could include heartburn, gas and of course, constipation. What can you do? Drink a lot of water to help your intestines deal with all the matzah; eat fresh and cooked fruits and vegetables since fibre helps digestion; and munch on whole-wheat matzah, instead of the regular kind. [http://info.jpost.com/2000/Supplements/Pessah/w2.html]

Have a wonderful holiday and don't forget to exercise, or at least take a walk.

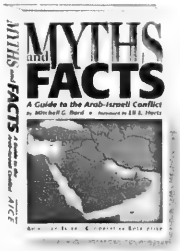
Egypt amassing arms

MYTH:

Egypt is no longer a military threat since signing a peace treaty with Israel.

FACT:

While Egypt remains formally at peace with Israel and honours its Camp David commitments, Cairo has nevertheless amassed a substantial offensive military capability in recent years. Prudent Israeli military planners are carefully monitoring Egypt's buildup in case regional events take a dramatic turn for the worse. If the present regime in Cairo were overthrown, for example, the prospect for continued stable relations with Israel would diminish substantially.



Despite its status as a U.S. ally, Egypt has purchased Scud missiles from North Korea and is believed to possess chemical weapons. Its army, air force and navy now field a wide range of the most sophisticated western arms, many identical to Israel's own weapons. In 2003, for example, Egypt requested F15 jets armed with joint direct attack munition (JDAM) "smart" bombs. These sophisticated weapons were used by U.S. forces in the 2003 war with Iraq.

Such sales are a matter of concern for Israel because the principal threats faced by Egypt today are internal ones. No nation poses any danger to Egypt. So why has Egypt been spending billions of dollars to amass an arsenal that includes 3,000 tanks and more than 500 aircraft, especially when it has serious economic problems caused in large measure by an exponentially growing population that does not have enough food, shelter or employment?

If Egypt's military simulations are any indication of the regime's thinking, Israel has good reason to worry. Egyptian forces have staged large-scale military training exercises that included simulated operations crossing into the Sinai against an unnamed adversary to the east (that is, Israel). In fact, Israel is the "enemy" in all of Egypt's war games.

In December 2003, Israel protested Egypt's use of unmanned aerial vehicles, called drones, to spy on Israeli military facilities. Israel reportedly threatened to shoot down the drones, whose flights violate the peace treaty, and prompted increased concern over Egypt's military buildup.

Israel is also worried about the looming succession crisis in Egypt. President Hosni Mubarak is 75 and has been the nation's ruler since Anwar Sadat's assassination in 1981. No one knows who will succeed him. Given the strong Muslim fundamentalist movement in the country, and the antipathy of the military toward Israel, it is by no means certain that Mubarak's successor will maintain the "cold peace" that has prevailed now for nearly 30 years.

Bombing survivor recalls death of cousin by terror

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Student's talk held on a bus

On a Greyhound bus, driving around Toronto's downtown core after rush hour, Gideon Black talked about the day in September 2002 that changed his life.

The 20-year-old British student had been studying in a yeshiva in Israel with his cousin and best friend Yoni (Jonathan) Jesner. The two had gone – by bus – to visit relatives in Tel Aviv for Sukkot. In Tel Aviv, they hopped on the Number 4 local bus to their hotel, lugging their suitcases with them. Fifteen minutes into their bus ride, a man stepped on board and detonated a bomb attached to his belt. There was a loud bang. The windows exploded. When Black looked for his cousin, he found him crouched on the floor of the bus, unconscious and bleeding.

"The first thing that I thought of wasn't about the suicide bomber. I only cared about Yoni," recalled Black.

Jesner died the next day of a head injury. Black escaped with minor injuries.

Hamas and Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the attack that killed six people, plus the bomber.

Jesner's parents donated his organs. Shortly after, the family read in the newspapers – in what was heralded as a milestone of religious tolerance – that one of their son's kidneys had saved the life of an eight-year-old Palestinian girl who had been waiting more than two years for a transplant. Black remembers that his cousin's family was pleased that Jesner's organs had helped someone.

At the time, Black had 10 more months left in his two-year yeshiva program. He opted to stay until the end instead of returning home, despite pressure from his parents to leave Israel.

"I felt that if I had gone home, I would have been giving the terrorists a victory," he told a group of mostly University of Toronto students who had clambered aboard the bus to hear him speak about being a survivor of terrorism.

Black's talk was organized by Betar Tagar, the campus wing of Herut-Likud that has chapters at U of T and York University.

Back in Israel, it took Black two weeks before he could get on another bus. "If I didn't do it then, when would I?" he asked. "I had nine months left of yeshiva. I knew that if I wanted to get around I would need to take the bus."

"Every time I heard a bang, I jumped," he admitted. "I was very on edge."

Black has been on a short speaking tour at universities in Ontario, making visits to the University of Guelph, McMaster University, U of T and York. He said the reason he gives these talks is to share his cousin's life with others.

"It was such a waste of life. In 19 years, he had accomplished more than most people had in a lifetime. It would be wrong and unfair just to mourn quietly," said Black.

Jesner, originally from Glasgow, was very active in Scotland's Jewish community. He had deferred his medical school acceptance to study in Israel.

Betar executive director Itay Gadot said that the location for Black's talk – a bus – was chosen because of its symbolic meaning.

"When he points at the place where he was on the bus, you see how claustrophobic it was. When it's on a bus, it's more powerful," he said.

Jihadist Muslims want to take over West: author

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Muslim jihadists want to create a new world order and brand Jews, Christians and Israel as mortal enemies, a historian warned recently in a dark and pessimistic speech.

Bat Ye'or, an Egyptian Jew who has written books about the subordinate status of Jews under Islam, said Muslims seek to Islamicize Western society and eventually take it over.

Speaking at a cocktail reception at a private home, sponsored by the Montreal-based Canadian Institute For Jewish Research, Ye'or said that "Jews in the West are totally unaware of the jihad danger that threatens them. They don't know the ideology and structure of jihad."

Charging that jihadists have expropriated Christian anti-Semitism, Ye'or said one of their goals is to weaken the United States, decouple it from its European allies and use Europe as a battering ram to destroy Israel.

"We have allies, the Christians, and we can defend ourselves," said Ye'or, whose books range from The Dhimmi: Jews and Christians Under Islam to Islam and Dhimmitude: Where Civilizations Collide. "But we must prepare the young generation to face this threat."

Ye'or, who left Egypt in 1957 with her family and immigrated to Britain before settling in Switzerland, said that the concept of "dhimmitude" is central to Islamic civilization.

She defined dhimmitude as a system of oppression and discrimination applied to non-Muslims.

And she added, "The principles of jihad and dhimmitude are still essential to Islam."

Ye'or claimed that European leaders, having "lost control of their own territory," have chosen "a policy of alliance and symbiosis with Arabs."

And so, she concluded, "Europe is contaminated by Islamic anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism," a phenomenon that has reached university campuses.

Since the short-lived 1973 Arab oil embargo against the West, she said, Europe has become complicit in the Arab policy of eradicating Israel, and French President Jacques Chirac is the leader of this anti-Israel policy.

"Europe is taking part in the war of delegitimization and demonization of Israel."

But in reply to a question from the floor, Ye'or allowed that the Soviet Union's former satellite states are pro-U.S. and not part of this European-Arab nexus, which she dubbed "Eurabia."

So captive is old Europe to its alliance with the Arabs that it has abandoned the idea that European culture is grounded in Christian roots, Ye'or said.

Moderate Muslims do exist, she noted in closing, but they are unorganized and lack power.

Such Muslims should join Jews and Christians in the struggle against jihadist Islam, a war that must be fought with ideas and ideology, as well as military might, said Ye'or.

Sheraton Centre Grand Ballroom, 123 Queen Street West

Guest Speaker - Pulitzer Prize winner Charles Krauthammer

The Rabbi Jordan Pearlson Tribute
Sunday, May 16, 2004
Sheraton Centre, Toronto

Rabbi Jordan Pearlson is being honoured for fifty years of dedicated service to the Toronto community, the Canadian community and the State of Israel. He is a Founder of Israel's youngest institution of higher learning, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

Guest speaker at the tribute dinner will be Pulitzer Prize winner for distinguished commentary, Charles Krauthammer. Mr. Krauthammer is a strong and dynamic voice in international affairs and his weekly column appears in more than 100 newspapers.

As founding Rabbi of Toronto's Temple Sinai Congregation, Jordan Pearlson has, for half a century, seen the Congregation's growth from forty families to a community of over 6,000 men, women and children. Committed to peace through understanding, Rabbi Pearlson is a founding member and pioneer of every level of Canadian and international interfaith consultation. He is a recipient of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews National Humanitarian Award.

Jordan Pearlson is a founder of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and served for many years as National President of the Canadian Associates of BGU. A continuing and general studies education program, particularly for adults in the outlying Negev development towns and settlements, bears his name. He played a key role in the absorption and education of young Ethiopian immigrants to Israel, enabling them to acquire a university education.

Proceeds from the Pearlson Tribute function will be used to establish the Pearlson Chair in Internal Medicine at BGU. The Pearlson Chair will spark new medical research to be used to improve medical knowledge and practice in Israel and to be shared with Canadian medical institutions.

We look forward to your presence at this event honouring an eminent Canadian.

Vice Chair of Campaign 2005 is prepared for her new role

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

In light of the recent spate of anti-Semitic incidents plaguing Toronto and the ongoing crisis faced by Israel, Ariella Rohringer, Vice Chair of UJA Federation Campaign 2005, knows the importance of this year's campaign.

Rohringer joins Campaign 2005 Chairs Robert Harlang, Chuck Winograd, along with Fran Sonshine, Chair of UJA Federation Women's Campaign & Advocacy.

Ariella Rohringer

"The increase in anti-Semitic incidents in the Greater Toronto Area, coupled with the anti-Israel sentiment on our university campuses, is deeply disturbing and must be addressed with greater vigour than ever before," says Rohringer. "The chronic crisis in Israel continues to be heart wrenching and we must work to relieve the strain on the social services net."

Rohringer, a member of UJA Federation's Board of Directors and a long-time UJA volunteer, chaired its Lawyers & Accountants Division in past years, as well as its Business Cabinet last year.

Born in Israel, Rohringer feels that the work done through the annual UJA Campaign is absolutely vital, and she didn't hesitate when asked to come aboard.

"I am a Sabra and, as such, I feel that it is a very small sacrifice to give as much of myself as I can to UJA, especially compared to the Israelis who make the enormous sacrifice of sending their children off to perpetual war to protect our Jewish homeland and Jews all over the world," says Rohringer, herself a mother of three.

Rohringer feels that her years as a UJA volunteer have helped prepare her for this important new role.

"I felt I had learned a lot over the years working on campaigns and wanted to try to put some of that knowledge to use on a broader basis. I hope I can help in some small way to identify and facilitate new leaders and raise awareness for this campaign," she says.

Rohringer, along with husband Earl Rotman, also a long time UJA volunteer, are both children of Holocaust survivors, a fact that adds to her passion and commitment.

"Because of that, we feel strongly that we must make every effort to ensure that the future of our children can never be shattered as was the childhood of our parents," she says. "I am confident that we will be able to count on the support of Toronto's incredible Jewish community to help those less fortunate both here, and in Israel."

Women helping women

A unique program designed to help Jewish women from other countries successfully integrate into Toronto community life wrapped up this week and thanks to everyone involved, the lives of eleven women from Argentina, Israel, Mexico and the former Soviet Union have improved drastically.

Dubbed the "Woman to Woman Mentoring Program," funded by UJA Federation's Jewish Women's Venture Philanthropy Fund and developed by JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto, the program matched the recent immigrants with Canadian women through their common work and personal interests in order to help them better their opportunities in the Canadian workplace.

Through a series of interactive workshops, the eleven mentors also provided the new Canadians with work-related learning opportunities, and the chance to network.

"It's incredible to see how much this program has done to help the women feel connected and comfortable in their new city and their new country," says Janis Roth, executive director, JIAS Toronto. "When we first met with them in the spring of 2003, they were asked to fill out a questionnaire. Most of them responded with a 2 or 3 out of ten when asked how much they felt they belonged here. Now, as the program concluded, those scores have gone through the roof. They really feel as if they're home now."

One of those women is Lia Kisel, a 35-year-old mother of three who came to Toronto from her native Mexico City eight months ago, and is currently employed by JIAS Toronto on a temporary project. In her native country, Kisel was a dentist.

"I couldn't believe that JIAS and UJA Federation had this mentoring project," says Kisel, who now speaks almost flawless English. "We had some incredible workshops with our mentors that taught us so much about how to prepare our resumes, and how to network looking for jobs. My mentor, who is also a dentist, took me to her office to meet people, make contacts, and explain how dentistry works here."

In her job with JIAS, Kisel uses her own experiences to help others.

Janis Roth, executive director, JIAS Toronto and Lia Kisel, a recent immigrant to Toronto from Mexico City.

"I help others – Spanish and Hebrew speaking immigrants – who now live here," she says. "I'm meeting people who were in the same situation as I was, coming to a new country to make a home. I love being able to help them by answering their questions and helping them with their fears and worries."

Kisel decided to leave Mexico City after a rash of kidnappings had plagued her community.

"My eleven-year-old son's best friend was kidnapped from his school bus; that's when we decided to come to Canada," says Kisel. "Eight months ago I was so scared, so uncomfortable. Today my whole family is so happy I feel like I'm in paradise here. Because of JIAS, UJA Federation and this amazing program, I'm able to enjoy a good life in Toronto now without worrying about the safety of my children. We all are Torontonians now; we even love the snow."

An insider's look at Israel

The joint UJA Federation/Israel Bonds Solidarity Mission to Israel takes off on May 17, 2004.

Members of Toronto's Jewish community have a unique opportunity next month to not only make an important visit to Israel, but also to gain a comprehensive "insider's look" behind the headlines.

Participants of the upcoming UJA Federation/Israel Bonds Joint Solidarity Mission, slated for May 17-24, and chaired by Les Aaron and David Chaikof, includes a special dinner with senior Israeli government officials, a meeting with IDF soldiers on a navy base in Haifa, and an interactive panel discussion with local and foreign journalists.

"Visiting Israel has always been an important thing to do, and this mission is no exception," says Aaron, who will be chairing his second mission. "We all know how important it is for us to visit Israel as a sign of solidarity and support, and this trip will accomplish that, but it will do more. Participants will have the chance to involve themselves, ask questions, and more importantly, get answers about what's really going on in the Middle East, instead of merely reading the newspapers or watching CNN."

Participants will also have the opportunity to travel to the north of Israel where they will spend a very special Shabbat in Jerusalem, as well as taking part in a fun and interactive outdoor experience along the Golan.

Mission participants will also have the chance to pay tribute to a true Israeli hero as they visit the grave of astronaut Ilan Ramon.

The special mission will also include a special visit to the trauma unit of a leading Jerusalem hospital, as well as tours along portions of the new security fence and neighbourhoods affected by the current situation.

"This will be a very special mission for my husband and I," says participant Marci Pearlman who, along with husband Mark, is looking forward to this trip with tremendous anticipation. "My husband told me that I could have anything for my recent 50th birthday, and I told him that I wanted Israel for my birthday, so that's where we're going. I feel such an enormous pull to go, now, to Israel. There are so many reasons to go to Israel, and yet so few excuses not to go. We can't wait."

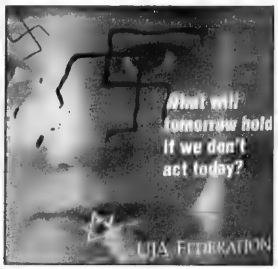
UJA Federation replaces vandalized signs quickly

Community "will not be intimidated" by anti-Semitic acts

By WENDY LAMPERT
UJA Federation

As a signal to those who preach hatred that they will not intimidate Toronto's Jewish community, UJA Federation began replacing lawn signs that were vandalized with anti-Semitic graffiti last week, just hours after the damage had been discovered.

Numerous signs were vandalized throughout the city, mainly in the Bathurst/Finch and Bathurst/Steeles areas. The same weekend, a rash of anti-Semitic incidents were discovered in the city: more than 20 headstones were overturned at the Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park and broken windows and vicious anti-Semitic graffiti were discovered at two synagogues, a community centre and a Jewish day school. The previous week, 13 homes in Vaughan were vandalized with anti-Semitic graffiti.



One of the many UJA signs that were vandalized recently with anti-Semitic slurs.

"We will not be intimidated by these reprehensible, criminal acts," said Leslie Gales, Chair of UJA Federation's Board of Directors. "Toronto prides itself on its ethnically diverse makeup, and simply will not tolerate this kind of violence against any one ethnic group."

This is the first time in more than two decades that such extensive damage has been done to UJA Federation signs. And while the community is appalled by the damage, UJA Federation will continue to post its signs proudly -- now and in the future, Gales said.

"Toronto welcomed our community decades ago as we escaped from tyranny. We are extremely proud of our community's heritage, and the contributions we have made to this outstanding city. We firmly believe Toronto is a wonderful city in which to live and bring up our families," she added.

UJA Federation's offices have received numerous calls asking that signs be posted outside homes, offices and places of worship as a show of support.

When signs at three buildings managed by Grover Realty Management were damaged, property manager Michael Farr immediately asked that they be repaired, and that signs be posted at three additional properties he manages along Bathurst Street.

"It's great that the signs went back up so quickly. It shows that no matter what they do, these criminals won't stop our community. We're not going to let them push us around," Farr said.

"I'm not Jewish, but I'm just disgusted with the whole thing," said Kim Heathcote, the superintendent at one of Farr's properties who discovered the damaged signs. "You can't let a group of sadistic people get the better of you. If they take down or deface a sign, put up two in its place."

Responding to the recent spate of anti-Semitic incidents around the GTA, many people called UJA Federation to offer their own properties to erect new signs.

In a show of support, the Ecumenical Ministerial Association of Thornhill has sent a letter to Jewish community centres and synagogues in the area to let them know the Christian community stands with them. "We're appalled," said Cannon Linda Nichols of Holy Trinity Anglican Church in Thornhill, a member of the Association. She noted that these events have galvanized Christian support for the Jewish community.

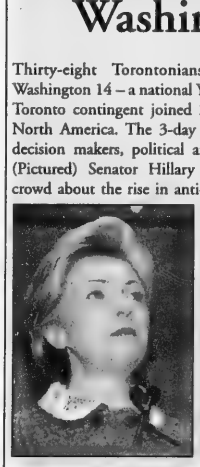
"The good thing is that it's drawing the community together to stand up and say that this is not okay, that it's not behaviour that Canadians will tolerate. It's not behaviour that Christians will tolerate in their community, no matter who it's directed at. That's why we're standing up publicly, and we're saying it to our congregations," she said.

Gales also noted the irony that the message on the defaced signs, "What will tomorrow hold if we don't act today?" has proved its point.

"Visitors to Toronto often tell us that we are lucky to live in a city where we can so proudly exclaim the pride we have in our community by openly displaying our signs in the streets. These incidents will not change that," she said.

Washington 14

Thirty-eight Torontonians participated in the recent Washington 14 – a national Young Leadership Conference. The Toronto contingent joined 2,000 young Jewish leaders from North America. The 3-day conference featured international decision makers, political analysts, and top Jewish speakers. (Pictured) Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton addresses the crowd about the rise in anti-Semitism. "We see a rise in anti-Semitism in many parts of the world," Clinton told delegates. "It is imperative that we pay special attention to protecting those places that might be of special risk." Ironically, Ted Sokolsky, President of UJA Federation, was scheduled to appear at the same conference, but due to anti-Semitic incidents in Toronto over the weekend, had to stay in town to help organize the community response.



Toronto Hillel awarded with prestigious honour

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Hillel students of Toronto were honoured recently for their commitment to providing students on campus with the chance to take part in important community programs in a Jewish environment.

Tzedek Hillel, part of Hillel of Greater Toronto, was named this year's recipient of the prestigious Tzedek Exemplar of Excellence Campus Award. The annual award honours original, innovative campus-generated projects and programs that enhance the quality of life on the campus and in the general community.

The award was presented to Devora Schwartz, Social Action Coordinator of Tzedek Hillel, and four students representing York University, the University of Toronto, and Ryerson, during the recent Spitzer Conference in Boston, by Avram Infeld, Director of Hillel International.

"This award is meaningful to us because Tzedek Hillel in Toronto is fairly new," says Schwartz. "It has grown tremendously over the past three years and it was very special for our students to be recognized by Hillel International for their efforts. This award recognizes Hillel as a leader in Tzedek initiatives and reflects the diversity of Hillel's programming."

Among the innovative programs instituted by Toronto's Tzedek Hillel are a weekly sandwich making for the homeless program where they make sandwiches in public areas on campus and invite passersby to stop and help.

Through their weekly tutoring program, Tzedek students volunteer at a local elementary school. The program has proven so successful that many of the school's students and parents now specifically request Hillel tutors.

Devora Schwartz (bottom right) Tzedek Hillel's Social Action Coordinator, joins Tzedek Hillel students as they proudly display their Tzedek Exemplar of Excellence Campus Award.

In order to draw attention to the issue of homelessness, Tzedek students recently completed a documentary about homelessness in Toronto which will be shown both on campus and in the community-at-large.

"Toronto Hillel continues to challenge itself and its students to get involved in Tzedek work," says Michelle Lackie, Director, Tzedek Hillel, in Washington. "They have built up a program that is student-initiated which shows the commitment of the student body. The multiple programs they run, student involvement, and leadership, make them an excellent Tzedek Exemplar Award recipient."

Community rallies against anti-Semitism

Federal, provincial and municipal political leaders, as well as police chiefs from Toronto and York Region, joined the Jewish community in a show of solidarity against anti-Semitism in a rally at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on March 24.

Jews, non-Jews unite against anti-Semitism

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Sometimes, it takes a crisis to bring people together.

Privately, Jewish leaders are saying that not since the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin has Toronto's Jewish community joined in such a vigorous display of unity.

While the recent spate of anti-Semitic desecrations, graffiti and vandalism in the city and York Region has left Jews angry and shaken, it has also had the effect of not only erasing old labels of left and right, Orthodox and Reform – at least for now – but of unprecedented expressions of friendship and solidarity from other ethno-cultural and religious groups.

All that was plainly evident at last Wednesday night's standing-room-only rally against anti-Semitism and hatred at the Leah Posluns Theatre, hastily co-sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The proceedings spilled over into two adjacent gymnasiums, a hallway and an outdoor courtyard. More than 3,000 people cheered messages condemning hate and those pledging action to champion tolerance.

The tone was set by David Engel of UJA Federation, who declared to a standing ovation, "We will not be intimidated. We will not be silent. And we will take action."

Traditional differences melted away at the boisterous event. A who's who of communal, civic, ethnic, political and religious leaders joined Jewish war veterans, students and ordinary citizens, and federal NDP leader Jack Layton clapped just as enthusiastically as former Canadian Alliance leader Stockwell Day.

There were several ovations, but few as warmly received as the announcement that police in Toronto and York Region have each offered a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the attacks on a Jewish cemetery, school, synagogue and private property last month.

Toronto Police Chief Julian Fantino, greeted by loud cheers and applause, revealed that so far in 2004, half of the 23 hate crimes reported to Toronto police have been against Jews.

Hate, he said, "is the finality of all human relations." He pledged that police are treating hate crimes seriously.

Warmly welcomed too was Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty, who, in a solemn address, said he would rather not have had to attend a rally like this one.

"This hate is the stuff of cowards," McGuinty said. "What could be more cowardly than defiling the resting places of those who cannot stand up and defend themselves?

On Campus

Feeling unwelcome at my own school

By JONAH BROTMAN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

When I drove up to the beautiful campus of Carleton University last September for the start of my first year, I had no idea what to expect. I arrived with an open mind, knowing that the next four years of my life would provide me with amazing educational opportunities, as well as a great time. Sadly, I now feel unwelcome in my own university.

While riding one of the elevators in my residence building a couple of weeks ago, there was a faint smell of burnt plastic that everyone in the elevator noticed. Unsure about where the smell was coming from, I glanced toward the ceiling and was shocked to see a swastika burned into it. I immediately informed Housing Services about the graffiti, and was promised that it would be painted over within a few days. After four days and no change, I got on that same elevator and was shocked yet again. Someone had spray painted a Magen David in blue ink near the swastika. I approached Housing Services yet again, and I was promised that both would be painted over immediately, but as of last week, nothing had been done.

Due to the fact my residence building has 11 floors and only a few elevators, I have had to ride that elevator many times over the past few weeks. Each time, I try not to look, but my eyes are drawn toward the hateful graffiti. Interestingly, when I look around at my fellow students, who are almost exclusively not Jewish, I notice that no one else on the elevator even notices the symbols, and when they glance at the graffiti they do not appear to care. Perhaps this can be attributed to the almost invisible Jewish presence at Carleton, or perhaps it is because many of the students are from regions where very few Jews reside, but no matter what the reason, anti-Semitism is not acceptable anywhere.

Many of my Jewish friends from Toronto chose to attend McGill University or the University of Western Ontario this year, and one of the most consistent reasons was because they wanted to go to school in a Jewish-friendly environment. While both schools are reputable and do have large Jewish populations, I disagree with the idea of self-segregation. I chose to attend Carleton mainly because of its prestigious journalism program, but also because I knew it was an Arab-dominated environment and I wanted to change opinions.

I have attended several events organized by both Ottawa Hillel and the local chapter of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), and in both cases, the audience has been almost entirely pro-Palestinian. SPHR recently organized a viewing of Discordia, a documentary about the campus atmosphere at Concordia University after Benjamin Netanyahu's visit in 2002 and the riot that ensued when he tried to give a speech there. While the documentary was interesting and informative, students in the audience booed when members of Montreal Hillel spoke.

I am not an aggressive supporter of the State of Israel and by no means am I advocating aggressive actions, but I do believe it is important for Jewish Canadians to educate other Canadians about the truth of the situation in Israel. As a university student in a somewhat hostile environment, I feel it is my duty, and the duty of all young Canadian Jews, to teach the truth to those who are less knowledgeable about the reality that Israelis face every day.

If the Shoah taught us one thing, it is that we cannot tolerate racism and we must stand together and say "never again."

Jonah Brotman is a first-year undergraduate journalism student at Carleton University in Ottawa.

ZIONISM DAY: Dov Ben-Reuven, right, director of Jewish Students' Association, Hillel – Ottawa, engaged students in spirited debate on Zionism Day at Carleton University last week. In light of recent anti-Semitic acts in Toronto and events at York University, a security guard was on hand, but the Ottawa event remained low-key. [Adam Grachnik photo]

Misleading impressions about life at York U

By ALEX POMSON

Guest Voice

I am troubled by the impression created by The CJN's recent report on "anti-Israel rhetoric" at York ("Union's anti-Israel activities draw criticism," March 18). I too am disturbed that the CUPE local at York often seems more interested in bashing Israel than in fulfilling its mission "to bargain collective agreements, defend workers' rights and fight on behalf of oppressed workers everywhere." But I am also concerned by the impression the article creates of what life is like for Jewish students at York.

I fear that in the paper's desire to highlight the presence of anti-Zionism on campus, it overlooks the many positive ways that Jewish life at York has been energized by the present confrontation. From my perspective, as a York professor who spent his undergraduate years in England during Israel's Lebanon campaign, I see an awakening of Jewish student activism much like the one experienced by my peers in the 1980s.

I have been at York for eight years, and for much of this period, I was disappointed by Jewish student ignorance and apathy concerning Israel. Yet, in the last two years, while anti-Zionist rhetoric and acts have increased on campus, so has the willingness and capacity of students to respond – a phenomenon that is not often mentioned.

Let me cite some impressive instances: Instead of complaining about the anti-Zionist tone of the student press, thoughtful Jewish students have been proactive in assuming senior journalist positions with campus newspapers. Fed up with the misplaced obsession with Israel at the York Federation of Students, the Hillel-supported "Progress not Politics" slate won a stunning victory in this year's student elections.

Unfortunately, this paper focused on the battle to have the victory ratified and not on the significance of the victory or the university administration's intervention on behalf of the victors. In recent weeks, Jewish students have shown impressively that they are not willing to be intimidated by anti-Israel rallies. I'm afraid that your reporting focuses on the fact that anti-Israel events are allowed to take place rather than the energetic Jewish response to them.

As a teacher of Jewish studies and Jewish education at York, I can testify to a noticeable increase in the engagement of Jewish students with Jewish history and life in the university classroom. For many years, York has been home to Canada's largest and liveliest university-level Jewish studies program. My own sense is that over the last couple of years, Jewish students have flocked to our courses so as better to prepare themselves for the struggles they face elsewhere, on campus and beyond.

The best universities offer students a preparation for life. I believe that at York, we are seeing the forging of a new generation of Jewish leadership in a context where, unlike in many other public institutions, a sophisticated network of support is available. This development may feel painful and may sometimes take place in uncomfortable circumstances, but its value and importance should not be underestimated.

Prof. Alex Pomson is Koschitzky Family Chair of Jewish Teacher Education at York University.

"I've now lost the weight PERMANENTLY!"

"My name is Pierrette Daoust. I am a French teacher for the City of Toronto.

In February 2001 I walked into the Positive Changes office feeling desperate about my weight gain. I wanted to lose weight permanently. It was the third time in my life that I was struggling with excess weight.

The other two times, I joined Weight Watchers. I was able to lose weight, but could not live measuring my food and counting calories for the rest of my life. I lost 70 pounds in 30 weeks.

I was 198 pounds when I started. I lost a steady 3 pounds a week for the first 20 weeks, then 1 to 2 pounds a week for the next 8 – 10 weeks. I now weigh 128 pounds and am easily maintaining that weight.

If you're looking for ways to empower your life or to lose some unwanted weight, do consider getting some support from Positive Changes. My time spent there has been a great power of support for me.

It can be for you too! GO FOR IT!"

יידיש־ווינקל

רעדאַגירט פֿון: אַלעק סילווער

מחשבות צום יום־טוב פסח

פֿון הערמאַן סאָובע (האָשינגסאַן)

(..אלע ניסים אין דער הגדה זיינען רייניגד אמת". (אַנט פֿראַנ. קאַליין י. האַמפֿרי פֿון קעמברידזש אוניווערסיטעט)

מיר וויל זיך אויך אָפּשטעלן אויף א פּלום וועגן אַדאָלף היטלער ר"ש: „דער אויפֿשטייג פֿון שלעכטס", וואָס איז געווען געוואָרן אויף דער טעלעוויזיע, וווּ א „מתנה" צום 60סטן יאָרטאָג פֿון וואַרשעווער געטא אויפֿשטאַנד. צווישן די פֿראָרוצידער פֿון דעם פֿילם, וווּ אויך א צאָל פֿון די אַקטיאָרן זיינען יידן מיט אַזעלכע נע־מען וווּ מאַרגאָלעס, זוסמאַן א"א. אין תלמוד געפֿינען מיר: „בימוּ שׂשׂו שׂונא ישׂראל". מיר זעען דאָס אין אייראָפּע, וווּ אנטיסעמיטים קומט וויַ א נאטילעכע אינסטינקטיוּוע אייגנשאַפֿט. אבער ווען דער אָסן־האָס קומט פֿון יידן, וועלכע זוכן צו מאַכן קאָמפּיטאַל פֿון דער שואה, רופט עס אויס וידערוויליק און וויטיק. וווּ שנעל די דאָזיקע יידן האָבן פֿאַרגעסן דעם „זכור את אשר עשׂה לך עמלק". וווּ מאַכן געלט אויפֿן חשבון פֿון אונדזער פֿאַלקס טראַגעדיע און דאָס טוט וויי, שטאַרק וויי . . .

'An attack on any of us is an attack on us all'

"You and I can erase that hate if we speak out," the premier said in a hushed tone. "To fail to speak out would be wrong… here we practise tolerance, with one notable exception. Here, there is zero tolerance for hate and those who would spread it.

"An attack on any of us is an attack on us all."

Toronto Mayor David Miller said to applause that anyone who overturns gravestones or spraypaints anti-Semitic messages "is not welcome in Toronto."

Vaughan Mayor Michael DiBiase, wearing a kippah, echoed that sentiment, saying his city adopted on March 22 a resolution pledging zero tolerance for hate crimes.

"My Vaughan includes everyone – everyone, that is, except for people who hate," DiBiase said.

Noting that some of the attacks took place in his riding, Liberal MP Art Eggleton repeated a message of condemnation and support he had read into the record in the House of Commons a few days earlier.

Eggleton said the Liberals are putting the final touches to a new federal plan to combat racism.

Engel of UJA Federation and Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, read aloud messages of support from several Canadian Islamic organizations and Christian groups. Morgan noted, to cheers, that some churches in Toronto have offered to place UJA signs that had been defaced on their lawns.

Morgan and Engel also read messages of support from Prime Minister Paul Martin and Conservative Party leader Stephen Harper.

On the day of the event, Vancouver NDP MP Libby Davies, who attended the rally, put forward a resolution in the House condemning the rash of anti-Semitic attacks "in the strongest possible terms" and calling on international agencies "to combat the scourge of anti-Semitism in Canada and globally." The measure was passed unanimously.

Thousands came out for the rally last week. [Stephen Epstein/Big Dipper Communications photo]

Also representing CJC, Prof. Rachel Turkienicz of York University (and a CJN columnist) said she's confident that police will uphold talmudic principles of truth, justice and peace in their work.

Because the desecrated gravestones at Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park were in the Shaarei Tefilah Congregation section of the cemetery, the synagogue's Rabbi Moshe Stern recited Psalm 121.

Other officials on hand included Ontario Lt.-Gov. James Bartleman; CJC national president Keith Landy; Israeli consul general Ya'acov Brosh; Thornhill MP Elinor Caplan; Ontario Conservative leader Ernie Eves; MPPs Monte Kwinter, Gerard Kennedy, Mario Racco and David Caplan; York Region Police Chief Armand La Barge; Terence Finlay, the Anglican Archbishop of Ontario and Bishop of Toronto; representatives of B'nai Brith Canada; several municipal leaders; officers from at least three police forces; and representatives of Turkish, Chinese, Korean and Islamic groups.

Leading children to murder

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On March 24, the Israel Defence Forces stopped 14-year-old Hussam Bilal Abdu, who was wearing an explosives-packed vest, at a West Bank checkpoint. Had the teen carried out his mission, he would have become the youngest Palestinian suicide bomber yet.

A week earlier, Israeli soldiers intercepted an 11-year-old boy who was tricked into carrying a bomb through the same checkpoint. The armed wing of Fatah, the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, claimed responsibility for both incidents. And last month, Israeli police arrested three boys, aged 12, 13 and 15, who said they were on their way to carry out a shooting attack in Israel.

According to a report in Ha'aretz ("IDF apprehends 14-year-old suicide bomber," by Amos Harel and Arnon Regular, March 25): "Abdu told the soldiers he had dreamt of meeting 70 virgins in heaven, as his dispatcher had promised him, and said that he had been tempted by the promise of sexual relations with virgins. He said he had been bullied at school for his poor academic performance and that he wanted 'to be a hero.'"

Abdu's mother told Ha'aretz her son had "been exploited and manipulated… Those who persuaded him to do this must be punished because this is against our beliefs, and we are responsible for him."

The article also quoted Dr. Said Zidani, director of the Palestinian Organization for Human Rights in Ramallah, who said that "anyone who sends a child to carry out a bombing must be punished and the media, schools and organizations must condemn this vehemently."

The local Palestinian media, controlled by the Palestinian Authority, refrained from reporting the incident. This comes as no surprise to many Israeli analysts. The silence of the Palestinian media is just one symptom of the deeper crisis besetting Palestinian society today: the cynical promotion by its leadership, through the media, schools, and mosques of a culture that encourages and celebrates shaheeds, or martyrs.

Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat himself has repeatedly praised martyrs in the service of jihad – even during the Oslo period, when Palestinians were supposed to be engaged in a process of reconciliation with Israelis. This was often excused in the West, and by liberal Israelis, as harmless, colourful rhetoric.

Unfortunately, Palestinian culture is seldom subject to criticism, writes Robert Fulford ("When Palestinians become oppressors," National Post, Feb. 12). "The mistreatment of Palestinians by Palestinians has seldom been given more than cursory examination by journalists outside the Middle East… Those who sympathize with Palestinians don't want to remind anyone of how badly they treat each other. Palestinians have somehow become the favourite oppressed people of intellectuals and journalists in Europe and elsewhere. It's unfashionable to say a word against them."

A brave exception that Fulford draws attention to is Palestinian human rights campaigner Bassem Eid. "A vehement opponent of suicide bombing, [Eid] thinks it scandalous that Yasser Arafat encourages Palestinians, including children, to kill themselves and others."

Perhaps, finally, the world is beginning to take notice of the child "martyrs." On the day Abdu was caught, Amnesty International – which is often critical of Israel – issued a press release denouncing the use of children in armed attacks as suicide bombers: "Amnesty International has repeatedly condemned suicide bombings and other attacks against civilians by Palestinian armed groups as crimes against humanity. Using children to carry out or assist in armed attacks of any kind is an abomination. We call on the Palestinian leadership to publicly denounce these practices."

The Palestinian people, the overwhelming majority of whom want to live normal, peaceful lives, deserve better leadership.

MPs push motion on suicide bombings

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A non-partisan group of MPs from the four parliamentary parties are co-operating on a joint motion that would amend Canada's war crimes legislation to include suicide bombings as a crime against humanity.

Anita Neville

At the same time, the Simon Wiesenthal Center is urging the government of Canada to press other members of the G-8, who will meet in June, to declare suicide bombings a crime against humanity.

Liberal MP Anita Neville, one of the MPs backing the motion, said its prompt passage by parliament would "give the government leverage at the international level."

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the centre's Los Angeles office, said parliamentary approval of the MPs' motion would give Canada the authority to prosecute those who incite or finance suicide bombers outside the country, while the move on the international front would persuade other nations to amend their domestic law to allow for the prosecution of suicide bombing supporters.

Rabbi Cooper was in Ottawa last week along with Leo Adler, the centre's Canadian spokesperson, to meet with parliamentarians including Foreign Minister Bill Graham and Justice Minister Irwin Cotler.

"We found the foreign minister's reaction quite positive," said Rabbi Cooper, who spoke to The CJN before his meeting with Cotler.

Canada's international reputation as a multicultural society gives it particular clout when weighing in on this issue, he said. "A serious window of opportunity exists" for Canada to say "this behaviour is outside the Pale."

Neville agreed. "I think Canada does have a role. It is singular in its relations with the European Union an the United States and I think it can bring them together on the issue."

Although she had not canvassed all committee members, she said, "I think there is support. It's a hard issue not to support."

Neville was joined by MPs Stockwell Day (Conservative), Richard Marceau (Bloc Quebecois) and Judy Wasylycia-Leis (NDP) in seeking the support of their colleagues in two parliamentary bodies: the standing committee on foreign affairs and international trade and the standing committee on justice and human rights.

Adler, an adjunct professor of law at Osgoode Hall, said Canada is already a signatory to a convention outlawing terrorist bombings. "But what we are seeking is to specify suicide bombing… and to make sure that whoever promotes it is criminalized."

In a news release announcing their joint declaration, the MPs stated, "Those who plan, organize, inspire and recruit people to perpetrate suicide bombings that target civilians, in public places, are committing vile and unjustifiable acts. Canadian law must be made more explicit, so that those who engage in such acts are charged with crime against humanity."

Rabbi Abraham Cooper

The news release urged the Canadian government to join the Wiesenthal Centre's campaign to convince the international community to treat suicide bombings as crimes against humanity. Canada should "play a leading role in expanding the scope of prosecuting those who finance and arrange suicide bombings under international law," the MPs said.

Adler said Canada has particular "credibility and the credentials" to advance an initiative of this kind. If Canada brings up the issue with its G-8 partners and is able to forge a consensus with them, "it begins to change international law."

Adler noted the resolution has universal application and would not be limited to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Canadians, he pointed out, have been killed by suicide bombers in Afghanistan, New York City and Israel. "It affects people of all communities… I can't imagine any politician voting against it."

With a federal election expected in the spring or fall, it is unclear whether the MPs' motion will pass in time. In the meantime, the centre will seek support for the initiative from other Canadian groups, Rabbi Cooper said.

In a legal analysis of the issue, Adler wrote that the need for the specific inclusion of suicide bombing within existing legislation would help "avoid any argument that parliament did not intend for suicide bombing to be considered a crime against humanity.

"As well, the recruitment, solicitation, payment, enticement and aiding and abetting in the recruiting, outfitting, transporting, financing and participating in any facet of suicide bombing ought to be explicitly prohibited," he wrote.

Vancouver federation marks 'breakthrough year'

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver has pronounced 2003 as its breakthrough year.

At the recent annual general meeting, JFGV president Arnie Fine said the 2003 Combined Jewish Appeal campaign, which brought in $1 million more than the 2002 campaign, showed "remarkable progress" in the community's commitment to local needs and to the needs of Jews in Israel and in other parts of the world.

Of the extra $1 million, Fine said, $670,000 is going to finance urgent needs in Israel, a new educational initiative in Vancouver's partnership region in northern Israel, relief funds for Jews in Argentina and support for a major new Canadian Jewish advocacy initiative on behalf of Israel. Poverty relief in Vancouver will receive an additional $330,000.

Keynote speaker at the AGM was Hershell Ezrin, CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CCIJA).

After thanking JFGV for its support of CCIJA, Ezrin recounted how he had been having breakfast at the King David Hotel in Jerusalem on the Sunday morning in February when the 14A bus was blown up by a suicide bomber.

"I was struck by how Israelis went on with their lives even as rescuers rushed to the site of the bombing," Ezrin said.

Noting that swastikas had recently been daubed on the doors of Jews in Thornhill, Ont., Ezrin said that Canadian Jews have their trials, too. "We must learn to be strong like Israelis, in the way we deal with anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism," he said.

Ezrin listed some of the challenges faced by Canadian Jews. For example, recent demographic changes have made it more difficult for Canadian Jews to have a voice in government policy. "Twenty-five years ago there were twice as many Jews as Muslims in Canada," he said. "Now it's the other way around."

Ezrin also cited anti-Semitism on Canadian university and college campuses and harassment of pro-Israel speakers at public events. "Our success in meeting these challenges depends on the commitment and involvement of everybody in the Canadian Jewish community," he said.

Ezrin said the Vancouver Jewish community is important now and will become more important in the future. "The CCIJA must have a voice in Western Canada and Western Canada must have a voice in CCIJA," he said. To that end, the CCIJA is planning to hire more staff for its Vancouver office.

Ezrin decried the lack of support for Israel by Canadian non-Jews compared to non-Jews in the United States. "Unfortunately, Canada is much closer to Europe in this regard," he said.

Nevertheless, Canadian Jews can still have a positive impact on government policy, he said, citing the example of CCIJA successfully persuading the federal government that the Israeli security fence should not go before the International Court of Justice in the Netherlands.

Consul General of Israel to Canada Ya'acov Brosh brought greetings. Brosh, who was was recently shouted down at nearby Simon Fraser University when he tried to deliver a speech about Israel, was visiting Vancouver for the first time.

Thirteen JFGV officers and executive committee members were nominated for one-year terms: president, Arnie Fine; vice-president for allocations, Ron Rozen; vice-president for financial resource development, Mitchell Gropper; vice-president for leadership development, Gail James; vice-president for planning, Diane Switzer; treasurer, Michael Kalef; secretary, Phyllis Moscovich; CJA campaign chair, Jeffrey Goldberg; CJA women's campaign chair, Susan Mendelson; Jewish community foundation chair, Garry Zlotnik; members at large, Craig Diamond, Michael Fugman and Janice Margolis.

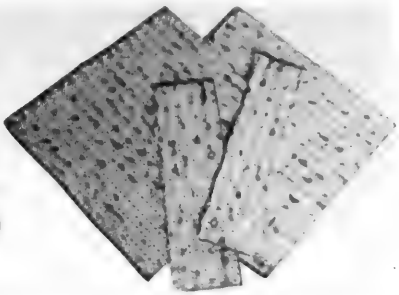
Passover Food Ideas



Low-carb ideas that work for Passover

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Passover comes with many culinary challenges, but for those following a reduced carbohydrate diet, it is even more difficult. With the help of some of my internet "pan-pals" here are some wonderful low-carb side dishes that you can enjoy during Passover or all year round. They're perfectly delicious, even if you are not cooking the low-carb "weigh!"

My friend Risa Golding of Oxford, N.J., belongs to a group of cookbook collectors from all over the world and so do I. Her recipe for Brussels sprouts is a winner. Golding writes, "I learned to cook some of the holiday dishes from my mom, who learned at the heels of her mom. I didn't watch my mom as much as I should have. I learned mostly from reading, from watching TV and from Internet conversations, too. This delicious low-carb side dish will bring rave reviews from family and friends!"

RISA GOLDING'S ROASTED BRUSSELS SPROUTS

1½ lb. brussels sprouts, well trimmed boiling salted water
3 tbsp. olive oil
¼ tsp. kosher salt (or to taste)
freshly ground black pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 400. Trim off ends from Brussels sprouts and pull off any yellow leaves. Wash well. Bring water to a rolling boil in a saucepan, add brussels sprouts and cook for 3 minutes. Drain well; immediately place sprouts in a bowl of ice water for a few minutes. Drain thoroughly. (This is called blanching. See variation below.)

Place sprouts in a bowl and toss with olive oil, salt and pepper. Turn them out onto a baking sheet and roast for 20 to 30 minutes, until crispy outside and tender inside. Be sure to shake the pan occasionally to help the Brussels sprouts brown evenly. Sprinkle with additional kosher salt and serve immediately.

Variation: Cut blanched brussels sprouts in half and roast them for half the time. They are also fabulous drizzled with lemon juice.

Makes 4 servings with 16 grams carbohydrate and 5 grams fibre, making a usable (net) carb count of 11 carbs. 5 grams protein.

Rabbi Hirsch Meisels, the director of Jewish Friends with Diabetes, runs a wonderful support group for Jewish diabetics and another support group for those on a low-carbohydrate diet. Visit his website at www.FriendsWithDiabetes.org. Rabbi Meisels was kind enough to share the following kugel recipe he got from cookbook author Dana Carpender.

Carpender has written four low-carb cookbooks, including 500 Low-Carb Recipes (Wm. C. Brown Publishers, $28.95 Cdn). She is sensitive to requirements for kosher recipes and was glad to share this easy cauliflower kugel recipe, which I have modified slightly for Passover. Dana knows more ways to cook cauliflower than anyone I know and is the queen of creating low-carb recipes!

DANA CARPENDER'S CAULIFLOWER KUGEL

This savory kugel is a nice side dish with a simple fish course. It could also be served as a vegetarian main dish.

2 packages, 10 oz. each, frozen cauliflower, thawed (or 1 large cauliflower, well-trimmed, cut in florets and cooked until nearly tender)
1 medium onion, chopped
1 cup cottage cheese
1 cup shredded cheddar cheese
4 eggs
1½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
paprika

Chop the cauliflower into smallish bits – pieces about ½ inch or so.

Combine with all other ingredients except paprika in a large mixing bowl, and mix very well. Spray an 8x8-in. square baking pan with non-stick cooking spray and spread cauliflower mixture evenly in it. Sprinkle paprika lightly over the top. Bake at 350 for 50 to 60 minutes or until set and lightly browned.

Makes 9 servings, each with 5 grams of carbohydrate and 2 grams of fibre, for a usable carb count of 3 grams. 10 grams protein.

Marilyn Westerfield, who lives in Maine, loves eggplant. She is a member of the Jewish Food List. Westerfield says this is the easiest and tastiest way to make eggplant. "I have this at least weekly and since I'm the only eggplant lover in the family, generally eat the entire eggplant myself! I got this recipe from a fellow South Beach dieter. I like it because there's no oil or frying involved, yet it has a rich taste that makes this easy eggplant recipe perfect as a side dish."

MARILYN WESTERFIELD'S EASY EGGPLANT SIDE DISH

Preheat oven to 375. Slice eggplant into ½-in. slices. (You can salt and drain the slices for about 15 minutes, then rinse and pat dry.)

Thinly spread mayonnaise (low-fat is fine) on one side only. Place on a baking sheet sprayed with Pam, mayonnaise-side up. Sprinkle with pepper and parmesan cheese. Bake until golden brown, about 25 minutes.

Makes 4 (or less) servings, depending on who is eating it! One serving contains 13.5 grams carb and 3.4 grams fibre, for a usable carb count of 10.1 grams. 5.6 grams protein.

Variation: You can also cook the eggplant slices for a shorter time, then layer it with your favourite ricotta cheese mixture and pasta sauce in a casserole dish. (If desired, top with sliced or grated Mozzarella cheese.) Bake at 350 for about 30 to 40 minutes, until tender.

Wendy Baker of New York also loves eggplant. She is always aware of the carbs in recipes as she is diabetic and experiments to create recipes that are diabetic-friendly.

I met Baker through the Jewish Food List and many of her recipes appear in their archives. She wasn't able to provide exact quantities, but she shared two simple recipes that are simple, quick and guilt-free. Enjoy.

WENDY BAKER'S MICROWAVE EGGPLANT PARMIGIAN

Slice an egplant in thinnish circles, spray with oil and microwave in a rectangular glass dish covered until quite soft. Pour on either jarred or home-made tomato sauce (about 13 to 14 oz.). There are several brands that are kosher for Passover. Cover with sliced Mozzarella cheese, sprinkle with Parmesan cheese and microwave for about 1 minute, or until the cheese is nicely melted.

WENDY BAKER'S SPAGHETTI SQUASH

Spaghetti squash makes a side dish since it is about the lowest in carbs of all the squashes. (Net carbs after fibre is deducted is about 3.4 grams per half cup cooked.) Wendy cuts it in half vertically and cleans out the seeds.

Either microwave it cut-side-down or bake it in the oven with a little water in the pan until soft. Running a fork over the squash produces the strands.

Serve with tomato sauce and cheese, just like pasta.

Passover Food Ideas

New ways to use boiled chicken

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Without question, the most anticipated dish at our Passover seder is my mother's chicken soup. The rest of the meal – the brisket, roasted turkey, gefilte fish and kugels – is a mere footnote to the wonderful broth and kneidelach lovingly prepared by my mother.

She usually arrives from Montreal a week in advance of the holiday. With three children and their mates, eight grandchildren and other extended family members attending the seders, preparing the festive meals is no small feat. The shopping itself is a two-day expedition.

Given the expansion of the family, my mother now uses four large chickens to make her delectable soup and she's learned to quadruple the matzah ball recipe to avoid all-out war for those last remaining kneidelach.

We all watch carefully as the soup is doled out to make sure that nobody gets more than anybody else. And while every last golden drop and kneidel is accounted for, there are never any takers for the main ingredient of the soup – the boiled chicken. It just sits there on the table like the wallflower at a dance, while the other platters of meat are eagerly devoured by grownups and children alike.

My late father considered boiled chicken and ketchup a great delicacy, but this was a taste never acquired by my siblings and me, nor by our children. So at the end of the seders, there are always four left-over chickens that never get eaten, no matter how much my mother prods.

This year, I'm determined to make use of these leftovers and so I've asked two expert cooks for ideas.

Caterer and chicken maven Lynn Mendelson, author of Chicken! Chicken! Chicken! and More Chicken! (Whitecap Books, 2000) says boiled chicken can be substituted for many recipes that call for cooked chicken. And while Mendelson is familiar with hundreds of exotic chicken recipes, she's a longtime boiled chicken devotee.

"I like it plain. One of my favourite memories is Friday nights snacking on my grandmother's boiled chicken right out of the strainer," she recalls. "It always tasted better standing up when we were doing the dishes."

Another source of ideas is from lawyer Linda Kamerman, the mining and lands commissioner of Ontario. During the week she presides over judicial hearings, but on weekends she's an accomplished gourmet cook who can handily whip up dinner for eight in a jiffy. Kamerman poaches extra chicken breasts in her chicken soup and removes them well before the soup is done. The poached chicken can then be used with a variety of sauces, she says.

LINDA KAMERMAN'S POACHED CHICKEN IN SOUP

1 whole chicken quartered, with breasts deboned
6 boneless chicken breasts
3-4 carrots
1 onion
2 stocks of celery
2-3 sprigs of parsley
salt and pepper to taste
1 bay leaf
10 peppercorns
pinch of thyme leaf

Cover all the ingredients with water. Bring liquid to a boil. Lower heat to medium. Skim off the foam. Keep liquid at a low boil to prevent soup from getting sour and continue cooking for another 20 to 30 minutes (depending on the size of the chicken breasts) before removing them from the broth. Let the soup cook another 2 hours at the same heat. Skim out fat and foam. The soup makes 4-6 servings.

Let the chicken cool and serve at room temperature with avocado mayonnaise.

AVOCADO MAYONNAISE

¼ cup Passover mayonnaise
¼ cup sweet onion, finely chopped
4 tbsp. cilantro, finely chopped
2 medium avocados
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tomato peeled, seeded and chopped

Puree all the ingredients except the tomato in a food processor. Process, but allow some texture. Add tomatoes and pour over poached chicken breasts.

TARRAGON CHICKEN SALAD

This has been adapted for Passover from Lynn Mendelson's book Chicken! Chicken! Chicken! and More Chicken! Whitecap Books, 2000.

2 large chicken breasts cut in bite size pieces
2 cups of seeded julienne red pepper
2 cups of seeded julienne green pepper
2 cups of broccoli, lightly steamed
1 cup of celery, diced
1 bunch of green onion rinsed and chopped

Mix chicken, peppers, broccoli, onion and celery in a bowl and toss with tarragon dressing. Makes 3 to 4 servings.

TARRAGON DRESSING

½ cup safflower oil
¼ cup freshly squeezed lemon juice
4 cloves of garlic crushed
1 tsp. minced ginger
1 tbsp. dried tarragon leaves
salt and pepper to taste

Whisk all the ingredients in a bowl and pour half the dressing over the salad. You can store the leftover dressing in the fridge for up to a week.

Substitutions to help you use year-round recipes at Pesach

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Most year-round recipes can be converted for use during Passover.

I've added a few substitutions and basic recipes to last year's list. If you have any other substitutions you would like to share, please contact me at ztlog@aol.com.

- 1 oz. baking chocolate (unsweetened chocolate) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1 tbsp. oil or melted margarine
- 16 oz. semisweet chocolate = 6 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1/4 cup oil and 7 tbsp. granulated sugar
- 14 oz. sweet chocolate (German-type) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 2 2/3 tbsp. oil and 4 1/2 tbsp. granulated sugar
- 1 cup confectioners' sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar minus 1 tbsp. sugar plus 1 tbsp. potato starch pulsed in a food processor or blender
- 1 cup sour milk or buttermilk for non-dairy baking = 1 tbsp. lemon juice in a 1 cup measure, then fill to 1 cup with Passover non-dairy creamer. Stir and steep 5 minutes
- for butter in baking or cooking, use pareve Passover margarine in equal amounts. Use a bit less salt.

- 1 cup honey = 1 1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/4 cup water
- 1 cup corn syrup = 1 1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/3 cup water, boiled until syrupy
- 1 cup vanilla sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar with 1 split vanilla bean left for at least 24 hours in a tightly covered jar
- 1 cup flour = 5/8 cup matzah cake meal or potato starch, or a combination sifted together
- 1 tbsp. flour = 1/2 tbsp. potato starch
- 1 cup corn starch = 7/8 cup potato starch
- 1 cup graham cracker crumbs = 1 cup ground cookies or soup nuts plus 1 tsp. cinnamon
- 1 cup bread crumbs = 1 cup matzah meal
- 1 cup matzah meal = 3 matzot ground in a food processor
- 1 cup matzah cake meal = 1 cup plus 2 tbsp. matzah meal finely ground in a blender or food processor and sifted
- 3 crumbled matzot = 2 cups matzah farfel
- 1 cup (8 oz.) cream cheese = 1 cup cottage cheese pureed with 1/2 stick butter or margarine
- gribenes = 2 caramelized onions. Saute 2 sliced onions in 2 tbsp. oil and 2 tbsp. sugar. Cook until the onions are soft. Puree the onions once they are golden.
- 1 cup milk (for baking) = 1 cup water plus 2 tbsp. margarine, or 1/2 cup fruit juice plus 1/2 cup water
- 1 1/4 cups sweetened condensed milk = 1 cup instant nonfat dry milk, 2/3 cup sugar, 1/3 cup boiling water and 3 tbsp. margarine. Blend all the ingredients until smooth. To thicken, let set in the refrigerator for 24 hours.
- 1 cup wine = 13 tbsp. water, 3 tbsp. lemon juice and 1 tbsp. sugar. Mix together and let set for 10 minutes.
- eggs: Passover egg substitutes don't work quite as well as the chametz egg substitutes. For kugels, matzah balls, fried matzah and some cakes the recipes will probably be OK. However, if you want to avoid them you can add one extra egg white and 1/2 tsp. vegetable oil for each yolk eliminated when baking. Use only egg whites as the dipping to coat and fry meats.

PASSOVER MACARONI AND CHEESE

3 large eggs
3 1/2 cups matzah farfel (or 6 broken-up matzot)
1 cup milk
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1/2 cup shredded cheddar cheese
1 pt. sour cream
1/2 cup butter (may use less if desired.)
Parmesan cheese

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 2-qt. casserole with butter. In a bowl, beat 2 of the eggs well and pour them over the farfel. In another bowl, beat the remaining egg and stir in the milk, salt and pepper. In the casserole, layer half the farfel, half the cheese, half the sour cream (in spoonfuls) and half the butter. Repeat the procedure and pour the milk mixture over the top. Lightly sprinkle the Parmesan over the top. Cover with foil and bake 30 minutes. Remove foil and bake another 10-15 minutes, until brown. Serves 6-8.

PASSOVER WHITE SAUCE

1 tbsp. oil
1 clove garlic, optional
1 oz. potato flour
1 1/2 cups pareve or real chicken stock
salt and pepper
2 egg yolks, lightly beaten

In a skillet, heat the oil and fry the garlic until it's clear, then remove the garlic. In a bowl, mix the potato flour with the stock and season to taste. With a whisk, blend in the yolks and add the mixture to the pan. Cook over low heat, whisking very gently until the mixture thickens. Stir constantly.

LEMON PUDDING FOR PESACH

4 eggs
5 1/2 cups sugar
3 tbsp. potato starch
6 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 cups water

In a 1 1/2-quart saucepan or the top of a double boiler, beat the eggs well. In a small bowl, combine the sugar and potato starch and gradually whisk them into the beaten eggs. Stir in the lemon juice and water. Then, over low heat or simmering water in the bottom of the double boiler, cook pudding mixture slowly, stirring constantly until the mixture is thickened and bubbles begin to appear. Remove from heat. Pour or spoon into a dessert cup or Pesach pie shell. Set the pudding aside to cool slightly before serving or refrigerate until ready to serve.

Shuls planning to increase security

The Holy Blossom Temple has also increased its security "throughout the day and right around the clock," said Michael Larkin, facilities manager at the midtown synagogue.

"We do have a school here and we have a lot to protect."

Larkin said the facility has employed a private security company, while in addition, "I've noticed the [Toronto] police with a huge presence [on] our property." Police cruisers visit the area often and as a result, "It makes everybody feel safer."

Up the street at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, police have also made their presence felt, said Marilyn Somers, the shul's executive director. Police cars can be seen in the area at all hours.

"We have stepped up our security" by implementing night patrols, increased lighting around the building and by ensuring someone is on the premises during evening events, she added.

Shaarei Shomayim already levies a $50 security charge on member families and Somers expects that fee to go up to account for the added costs.

At the Holy Blossom, Larkin agreed that "the costs will go back to the membership."

United Synagogue Day School's (USDS) Bayview branch, meanwhile, sent a letter home to parents saying it too has improved security measures by increasing external lighting, hiring additional security personnel and by benefiting from increased police patrols.

Brian Keshen, executive-director of the Miles Nadal Bloor Jewish Community Centre, said the centre's administrators have consulted with Canadian Jewish Congress and police on security measures and have warned staff to be alert to suspicious activities.

Len Rudner, Congress' director of community relations, said Congress co-ordinates security measures throughout the community. It continues to urge organizations to review their security measures to keep up with the new circumstances.

Recent incidents "certainly act as a wake up call. It gives us the opportunity to open our security files, see what we're doing and consider what we could do better," he said.

Opposition urges Sharon to resign due to legal problems

By BARUCH KRA and GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Meretz MK Yossi Sarid and others called on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to resign Monday, saying the prime minister could not manage the country while at the same time fighting to clear his name.

The prime minister responded, "I am functioning as I should."

The exchange, made during an appearance by the prime minister at a meeting of the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee, came the day after state prosecutor Edna Arbel submitted to Attorney General Menachem Mazuz a draft indictment against the prime minister and his son Gilad Sharon in what is being called the Greek Island affair.

Mazuz is expected to take about a month to decide whether to press charges against the prime minister.

According to the indictment, property developer David Appel allegedly paid Gilad Sharon hundreds of thousands of dollars in the late 1990s to support the establishment of a resort on the Greek Islands. Investigators allege Ariel Sharon, who was foreign minister at the time, may have used his influence to help Appel's business dealings at a time when the back-room Likud kingmaker helped Sharon in the race for the Likud leadership.

Appel has been charged with hiring Gilad Sharon and paying him thousands of dollars to act as an adviser, even though Gilad had no training or special knowledge.

According to the draft indictment submitted by Arbel, Ariel Sharon accepted a bribe from Appel, via his son Gilad, and committed crimes of fraud and breach of trust.

The draft indictment alleges Sharon received bribes from Appel in two ways – assistance in the Likud primaries in 1999 and hundreds of thousands of dollars deposited in the bank account of the Sharons' Negev ranch as a result of the alleged agreement Appel had with Gilad Sharon.

Sharon's pay-off allegedly came in two forms: assistance to Appel in promoting the Greek Island project and in the "Ginaton deal," in which the prime minister allegedly agreed to promote Appel's real estate interests in the area of Lod.

"We all know that when we have a personal problem, it distresses and distracts us and we have a hard time functioning," Sarid said at this week's meeting. "So how can the prime minister function when the most serious accusation that can be made against a public official is hanging over him?"

Ha'aretz learned that at the time of Ariel Sharon's alleged involvement in the affair, he told Appel, "The island is in our hands."

The comment, which appears to indicate that Ariel Sharon was involved in the efforts to promote the Greek Island project, is a key piece of evidence that helped convince the state prosecutor to submit the draft indictment Sunday against the prime minister and his son.

The comment is now part of the body of evidence based on wire tappings and concrete evidence provided by Israel Lands Administration officials.

The remark was uttered in the same conversation in which Appel said to him: "Your son is going to earn a lot of money." The fact that both sentences were part of the same conversation, even though they were not uttered close to one another, is what has made this one of the pieces of evidence that convinced the prosecutors in charge of the case to submit the indictment to Mazuz.

Miryam Rosenthal, a former senior attorney at the State Prosecution, told Army Radio on Monday that Sharon's remark was "almost equivalent to an admission of guilt." However, Rosenthal attacked the state prosecution and said it was inappropriate to leak central evidence in the case to the media before Sharon's attorneys had a chance to review them.

While the indictment against Appel, who was charged with bribery, mentions the comments by the real estate entrepreneur about Gilad Sharon, the charge sheet does not include Ariel Sharon's response, and it was not clear whether the prime minister had even responded to Appel's comments.

But Ha'aretz learned that Sharon apparently gave his response at another stage in the conversation, reportedly in contradiction to the prime minister's claim that he was not involved in promoting the Greek Island project.

The state prosecution understands the comment as implied agreement that Sharon provided, or was going to provide, Appel with a quid pro quo. When Sharon was asked about the comment during the police investigation, he claimed he could not remember the exact context in which it was made, and raised the possibility that it had been made jokingly.

The state prosecution, however, has not accepted Sharon's explanation, insisting that the comment cannot be dismissed as an innocent one.

In addition to Arbel, eight other lawyers in the prosecution who dealt with the case directly or indirectly agreed that Sharon should be indicted.

Fatah confession sheds light on Arafat terror connection

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

A confession by a member of Fatah's armed branch in Nablus has shed new light on the extent of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's involvement in terror. The terror suspect told Shin Bet security service interrogators that money he received from Arafat was used to purchase weapons, and to carry out shooting attacks in the West Bank.

Raaf Mansur, from the Nablus area, was detained by Israel Defence Forces soldiers last February. Mansur headed a wing of Fatah's military branch, the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades. His cell was responsible for attacks in the Nablus and Jenin areas.

Letters confiscated by Israeli security forces from Mansur's home included pleas sent to Arafat for money to fund armed activities. Mansur told interrogators that his appeals to Arafat resulted in a monthly NIS 7,500 payment to him. The allocations continued up to the time of Mansur's arrest.

Mansur explained that the money was delivered via Abed al-Fatah Hameil, who serves as a financial adviser to the PA chairman. Mansur and Hameil met several times in Nablus. Mansur presented a list of his cell members and, after reviewing the names, Arafat's assistant delivered the funds.

Hameil would confirm the militants belonged to Fatah and that they were dealing with "military activity." In a few instances, Hameil helped find work for Mansur's men in the PA apparatus.

Mansur confessed to involvement in shooting attacks in the West Bank (he claimed nobody was injured in them) and to sending his men to throw Molotov cocktails at IDF vehicles and settlers on roads east of Nablus. Arafat's money, he explained, was used to finance the purchase of firearms for terror cells and to cover expenses incurred in the armed activity.

An indictment against Mansur is soon to be filed in a military court.

JEWISH VICTIMS OF NAZI PERSECUTION FROM HUNGARY AND WESTERN EUROPE:

The Claims Conference announces:

1. Certain additional labour battalions inside Hungary have recently been recognized as similar to concentration camps from March 1944. If you were incarcerated in a Hungarian labour battalion you might now be eligible for the Article 2 Fund.

2. If you were persecuted as a Jew by the Nazis and were previously excluded from compensation, because at the time of persecution and at the time when global agreements were made in various countries, you were a citizen of one of these countries, you might now be able to obtain monthly assistance from the Article 2 Fund of the Claims Conference, if you meet the following criteria:

* You were a citizen of one of the following countries at the time of persecution and in the year stated: Austria is an exception (only citizenship before 13 March 1938), Belgium (1960), Denmark (1959), France (1960), Great Britain (1964), Holland (1960), Italy (1961), Luxembourg (1959), Norway (1959), Sweden (1964), Switzerland (1961) and

* You have not yet received compensation for loss of freedom or damage to health caused by Nazi persecution (apart from payments from German industry or the Federal Foundation, the Austrian Reconciliation Foundation, the Swiss Humanitarian Fund or the Swiss Bank Settlement) and

* You meet the Article 2 Fund criteria (including that the applicant lives in financial need in accordance with the prescribed income limits)

3. In addition, if you were persecuted as a Jew by the Nazis and were a Greek citizen at the time of persecution and in 1960 you might be able to obtain monthly assistance from the Article 2 Fund of the Claims Conference, if you meet the criteria of the fund.

4. If you were a citizen of one of the above countries either at the time of persecution or at the time of the global agreement and do not receive a pension for Nazi persecution but believe you meet the Article 2 Fund Criteria you should also apply immediately.

To obtain payments as soon as possible, you should apply immediately.

Rantisi: Bush the enemy of God and Islam

BY YOAV STERN,
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The new Hamas leader in the Gaza Strip, Abdel Aziz Rantisi, on Sunday declared U.S. President George W. Bush the enemy of God and Islam, and said that God's war against the United States and Israel was ongoing.

Rantisi also accused Arab leaders of weakness, after the Arab League decided to postpone a two-day summit that was set to begin this week.

In a speech at Gaza's Islamic University, Rantisi said he was not surprised that the United States had vetoed a United Nations Security Council resolution condemning Israel's assassination last week of Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin.

"We knew that Bush is the enemy of God, the enemy of Islam and Muslims. America declared war against God. Sharon declared war against God and God declared war against America, Bush and Sharon," Rantisi said.

"The war of God continues against them and I can see the victory coming up from the land of Palestine by the hand of Hamas."

Senior Hamas leader Mussa Abu Marzuk, commented last week in Damascus on the possibility of a Hamas strike on American targets, saying that "currently the United States is not a target, but in the future, only God knows. Thus far we have not targeted the United States despite its hostility toward Palestinians."

Hamas political leader Khaled Mashal also affirmed last week that Hamas activities were limited to Israel and the territories.

Immediately after the Israeli missile strike that killed Yassin, Rantisi and other Hamas leaders threatened to retaliate against the United States, Israel's staunchest ally.

But a few days later, Rantisi backed down from the threat, saying Hamas would only be active in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and Israel.

Rantisi also suggested the Arab world is letting down the Palestinians.

"I want to tell the Arab leaders, you will be asked by God... about the blood of Sheikh Ahmed Yassin," he said.

Controversial French lawyer will defend Saddam

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — A French lawyer known for defending terrorists said yesterday he will defend Saddam Hussein.

Jacques Verges told France-Inter radio he had received a letter from Saddam's family requesting that he defend the former Iraqi leader in court. The letter read: "In my capacity as nephew of President Saddam Hussein, I commission you officially by this letter to assure the defence of my uncle," Verges said. He did not name the person who sent the letter.

U.S. officials have said they will bring Saddam to trial for crimes against the Iraqi people, but the location of any trial and its format and date have not been decided.

Verges is famous for defending, among others, terrorist Carlos the Jackal, whose real name is Ilich Ramirez, and the "Butcher of Lyons," Nazi Gestapo chief Klaus Barbie.

Last month, Khieu Samphan, a former head of state for the Khmer Rouge, said he had picked Verges to defend him at a proposed genocide trial for surviving leaders of the group that ruled Cambodia in the 1970s.

The man who led U.S. forces to Saddam's underground hiding place in Iraq was one of the deposed president's closest bodyguards, according to the BBC program Panorama.

It found Mohammed Ibrahim Omar al-Musslit betrayed Saddam shortly after he himself had been arrested and interrogated in December. Saddam had a $25 million bounty on his head but, according to the BBC, the bodyguard will not receive it as he had not given the information willingly.

Musslit was one of the people in a car with Saddam when he fled Baghdad after the fall of the city last April, the BBC said on its website ahead of tonight's Panorama broadcast.

It said Musslit led troops to their prize hours after being arrested. He was flown to Tikrit, Saddam's home town, where U.S. officials interrogated him and made him point out where the deposed leader was hiding.

Washington has never said who tipped off troops to Saddam's secret bunker and there was no independent confirmation of the BBC report.

Hamas at its limit?

Defence experts have concluded in the last two days that despite the intention of Hamas and other organizations to exact revenge for Israel's assassination of Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, there would be no dramatic change in the number or intensity of terror attacks. A Shin Bet representative suggested that Hamas has reached the limit of its capabilities at this point, meaning it already undertakes the largest number of attacks it can.

More security for Rabbis

Security was beefed up around Israel's chief rabbis after intelligence was received that they could be targeted by Palestinian terrorists. The chief Ashkenazi rabbi, Yona Metzger, and his Sephardi counterpart, Shlomo Amar, were assigned bodyguards and had their travels to Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza curtailed last week. The Shin Bet believes Palestinians could try to assassinate them to avenge the killing of Hamas founder Sheik Ahmed Yassin. Also under extra surveillance are rabbis Ovadia Yosef and Yitzhak Kadouri, the spiritual mentors of the Shas party.

Successor to Yassin named

Abdel Aziz Rantisi was named to replace Sheik Ahmed Yassin as leader of Hamas. "We will fight them everywhere. We will hit them everywhere. We will chase them everywhere. We will teach them lessons in confrontation," Rantisi said. The 57-year-old physician went into hiding after appearing at a Gaza rally where he became Hamas leader.

Settlements frozen?

Israel has reportedly frozen new settlement construction. Noting that no building tenders had been issued for West Bank and Gaza settlements since the beginning of the year, Israel's daily Ma'ariv quoted government sources who said that settlement expansion was being halted. The Prime Minister's Office issued a denial.

Settlements to be removed?

Six West Bank settlements are reportedly slated for removal under Israel's plan to disengage from the Palestinians. Ha'aretz reported that the Jewish settlements of Mevo Dotan and Hermesh had been added to the roster proposed this week in Washington, D.C., by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's chief of staff, Dov Weisglass.

Lebanese rocket crew hit

Israeli helicopter gunships killed two members of a three-person rocket crew in Lebanon before they could fire over the border. The airstrike followed hours of shelling between Israeli and Hezbollah gunners. According to Israeli security sources, the three-man rocket crew, believed to be Palestinian, was about to fire Katyusha rockets into Kibbutz Menara.

The end of the Palestinian option

By EPHRAIM INBAR

Commentary

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's proposal for a unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip defies the conventional wisdom that envisions a negotiated two-state solution.

Although a sizable majority of Israelis favour partition of the country, they are also well aware that the Palestinians are incapable of establishing a political entity that would live in peace alongside a Jewish state. This explains the widespread support for unilateral steps.

Moreover, it is now much clearer that a two-state settlement is a dubious arrangement, as a result of the inability of the Palestinian national movement to establish and properly administer a state.

A sick society led by a pathological national movement is living alongside the State of Israel. It is a society that produces suicide bombers who have been idolized in its kindergartens and schools.

Declarations issued by Yasser Arafat on the occasion of Fatah Day, and pronouncements voiced by other nationalistic figures in the Fatah camp, sing the praises of the shahids (martyrs) and their clinging to the ethos of the right of return. Fatah officials are even increasing their level of co-operation with the Islamic organizations in committing acts of terror against Israel.

The Islamic factions, which enjoy the support of one-third of the Palestinian people, rule out the notion of coexistence with a Jewish state. Official Palestinian incitement against Jews will inevitably transform their state into an irredentist state, that is, a state that is not content with its boundaries and intends to use force to expand those boundaries.

There is no reason to assume that if poverty were replaced by plenty, Palestinian desires would decrease. Attacks by Palestinian terrorists at the border-crossing points from the Gaza Strip and in the adjacent industrial parks demonstrate that the economic factor is secondary to the political factor on the Palestinian agenda.

It is also doubtful that the corrupt economic system established by Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat would be capable of leading an economic regime that would bring benefit to many Palestinians. The widespread aid the PA received from foreign sources did not by and large trickle down to the masses.

Similarly, it is difficult to imagine that the Palestinians will achieve the high economic growth rates required to keep up with their high birth rates. In essence, they are fated to live in even worse poverty in the not-distant future. The impoverishment of Palestinian society, in combination with the abysmal hatred for the State of Israel, will guarantee the continued existence of an exceedingly hostile community.

The contention that statehood would bring in its wake responsible behaviour is another prevalent misconception. The Palestinians have already proven their inability to establish a state. When they were given the opportunity in 1993 to establish self-rule, the Palestinians set up a corrupt, lawless, authoritarian regime whose biggest failure was in the area that is most essential to the establishment of a modern state: they did not establish a monopoly on the use of force. The existence of numerous armed militias defiantly challenges central authority and preserves the torn Palestinian community.

Even if Israel had the best intentions, and even if it showed great territorial munificence, there is nothing it can do to effect the establishment of a Palestinian state in the foreseeable future. Unfortunately, Israel is left with only one option: to take unilateral steps to minimize the damage from living next to an especially youthful and poor population that is brainwashed with hatred for its Jewish neighbours and that has relatively easy access to weapons.

Israelis have to get used to the idea that a peaceful solution is not on the horizon, that the only possibility is to take interim steps to manage the conflict. The plan for unilateral withdrawal, which includes numerous risks, signals an important shift in Israel's foreign policy of negotiating a withdrawal with the Palestinians.

In 1993, the late Yitzhak Rabin was persuaded to reach agreement with the PLO. After the failure of the Oslo accords and with more than 1,000 victims of Palestinian terror, Israel in 2004 has come to accept an insight that has been embraced by many of the best and brightest of the Israeli political establishment for a long time – there is no Palestinian partner.

In more than 75 years, the Palestinian national movement has not proved it can create a responsible political leadership, nor will it apparently succeed at this task in the foreseeable future. Efforts must therefore be made to find other partners in the region and to protect Israel from the punishment of the Palestinians.

Canadian joins first foreign affairs seminar in Israel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Torontonian Alice Koldertsova was here recently as the Canadian representative of the first-ever Ministry of Foreign Affairs diplomatic seminar for Birthright Israel alumni from 11 different countries.

The ministry's Diaspora division seminar, which was held in Israel from March 14 to 26, included meetings with Israeli politicians, public figures, academics and diplomats, who lectured on such topics as foreign policy and security, Israeli society and Israel's relations with Jewish communities around the world.

The goal of the event was to expose a new generation of Jewish leaders to the Israeli agenda and to further bolster their ties to the State of Israel.

For 23-year-old Koldertsova, a graduate of York University's Schulich School of Business who came to Israel for the first time on Birthright in January, the seminar was an invaluable experience.

"My Birthright trip was both emotionally and socially, a very interesting exploration of my own Jewish identity. It was a good introduction," she said.

"But I felt that a lot of the political and international relations-related questions I had didn't get answered because of the short time frame of the previous trip. So when I got an e-mail from Birthright saying that there was another opportunity to come back, I really wanted to return to learn more. It has definitely been worth it."

Last Thursday, Jewish youth representing the United States, England, Argentina, Ukraine, Brazil, Bulgaria, Germany, Russia, Uruguay, Hungary and Canada gathered at Jerusalem's Crown Plaza Hotel to meet with Gideon Meir, deputy director of foreign relations at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, for a session on Israel's image in the media.

Meir said the news media distort the context of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict by referring to it as a "cycle of violence" and by accusing the Israeli army of using excessive force.

"This conflict is not an intifadah," said Meir. "An intifadah is a popular uprising. What we are fighting is a war. It's a war between two peoples over a piece of land. That is what the war is about. Today, the very legitimacy of the Jewish state in this region is being questioned, and the war we are fighting is one for the continued existence of Israel."

Meir also addressed the media's criticism of Israel's methods of self-defence, including its use of checkpoints, targeted killings of terrorist leaders and the construction of the security fence.

"But Israel has a right to self-defence," said Meir, who said 947 Israelis have been killed by terrorists since Sept. 28, 2000.

"It's one thing to hear the numbers," said Koldertsova. "It's another thing to speak to a real person who has been affected by terrorism."

The night before the lecture, she met a shop owner on Ben Yehuda Street who had fought in all of Israel's wars and whose store was once destroyed by a suicide bomber.

She said between the lectures and the exposure to Israelis, she learned enough on the trip "to form an opinion on important issues.

"There are so many misconceptions about Israel in Canada," she said. "For example, that the so-called wall is actually a security fence. These myths really do need to be dispelled.

"I am not necessarily interested in pro-Israel advocacy. But I am interested in educating people on certain issues about which they have no awareness by watching CNN or any other major media sources," she said.

"The world perceives Israel in such a dramatically different way than it actually is."

The biggest perpetrators of biased and inaccurate reporting, Meir said, tend to be Palestinian, European and Canadian journalists.

"Ninety-five per cent of what is being aired and reported on from the Palestinian territories is totally controlled by the Palestinian Authority, through the intimidation of journalists," he said.

"The issue is not whether Israel deserves to be criticized or not. I don't want the media organizations to serve as Israel's PR machine. I want them to be accurate. I want them to be a mirror that reflects what is actually happening here.

"Go to the media organizations, when you see that they are not reporting the truth," Meir said. "The more activity there will be on the part of organized Jewish communities, wherever they may be, the better it is for the future of the Jewish state."

Koldertsova said she plans to contact the Israeli embassy to find out how she can help Israel when she returns to Toronto.

"I am at a stage in my life where I have a choice of what I want to do and where I want to make a difference and clarifying Israel's image for Canadians is definitely a worthwhile cause."

Israel welcomes U.S. veto of UN resolution on Yassin killing

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Government sources in Jerusalem welcomed the United States decision last Thursday to veto a United Nations Security Council resolution that called for a condemnation of Israel for the killing of Hamas spiritual leader Ahmed Yassin, Israel Radio reported last week.

Yassin was assassinated last Monday in an Israeli helicopter missile strike outside a mosque in Gaza.

Eleven nations, including France, Spain, Russia and China supported the resolution. Three nations – Britain, Germany and Romania – abstained, while the United States used its veto power to turn the resolution back.

The killing has been criticized around the world as sparking an escalation of Middle East violence.

Israel's ambassador to the UN, Dan Gillerman said, "The Security Council... would have committed an unforgivable act of hypocrisy had it come to the defence of a man whose life's work was the eradication of peace, a man who was nothing less than a mass murderer."

Algeria, the only Arab nation on the council, introduced a draft resolution last Wednesday condemning "the most recent extrajudicial execution committed by Israel."

The measure also condemned "all attacks against any civilians as well as all acts of violence and destruction" in an effort to get European votes.

Russia, a veto-wielding member of the Security Council, wanted the resolution to pass unanimously, a top diplomat was quoted as saying last Thursday.

"We think this resolution has a sufficiently balanced character and appeal for it to reflect the positions of all Security Council members," Interfax news agency quoted Deputy Foreign Minister Yuri Fedotov as saying.

Before the vote, the United States said it was troubled by the assassination that has echoed throughout the Islamic world, but added it opposed the draft resolution because it does not refer to Hamas as a group responsible for suicide bombings against Israeli civilians.

"If the Security Council is going to pronounce itself on this question, it must recognize the reality that Hamas has been responsible for numerous, extensive and very recent terrorist activities," U.S. Ambassador John Negroponte said.

On a visit to UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan last Wednesday, Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom called Yassin the "godfather of the suicide bombers."

He told reporters the United Nations could play a key role in Middle East peace efforts and discourage attacks on Israeli civilians by holding a special session against "the phenomenon of terrorism."

Shalom said that "would be a clear sharp voice that would come from this building against terrorism, against extremism and against racism."

Last Wednesday, the UN Commission on Human Rights blasted Israel's killing Yassin. The 53-member commission, which meets for six weeks each year in Geneva, voted 31-2 to condemn Israel. The United States and Australia opposed while 18 countries, including European countries, abstained.

"We see a bothersome and dangerous appeasement of the international community toward Arab and Muslim terrorism, and this may have dire consequences against the international community itself," said Arye Mekel, Israel's deputy permanent representative to the United Nations.

Jewish genetic diseases focus of Weizmann Institute program

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Genetic diseases that affect members of the Jewish community will be the subject of a program sponsored by the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, in conjunction with the Robinson Family Institute of Jewish Learning, Hospital for Sick Children (HSC), and National Council of Jewish Women of Canada.

The program, "Jewish Genetic Diseases – Who's at risk?" will be held April 29, 7:30 p.m., in the Galaxy Ballroom of the Ontario Science Centre. A dessert reception will follow. Admission is free, but Weizmann Canada prefers that attendees pre-register.

Anthony Futerman, from the Weizmann department of biological chemistry; Jon Clarke, director of the genetic metabolic diseases program at Hospital for Sick children; Annette Feigenbaum, from the division of clinical and metabolic genetics at HSC; and Don Mahuran, senior scientist at the HSC Research Institute will discuss Tay-Sachs disease, Gaucher's disease and some other genetic disorders.

Tay-Sachs is a fatal genetic disorder in which a fatty substance, ganglioside GM2, accumulates in the nerve cells in the brain. Although the child appears normal for the first few months, he or she gradually becomes blind, deaf, unable to swallow and paralyzed. Death usually occurs by age five. There is no treatment or cure.

In Gaucher's disease, another fatty substance, glucocerisbroside, accumulates in the spleen, liver, lungs, bone marrow and sometimes the brain. It can appear at any stage of life and can affect the blood, skeleton, liver, kidneys and brain function.

Both diseases, and the others the panel will discuss, are caused by recessive genes. Generally speaking, the conditions will only appear if both parents carry those genes.

Tay-Sachs, Gaucher's to be discussed

However, the panel will also discuss cases where these diseases appear although there is no known history in the family.

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, spiritual leader of Chabad@Flamingo, will moderate.

Sheri Federman, director of programs and operations for the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, said Futerman is doing cutting edge research into Tay-Sachs disease. While he is in toronto, Federman said, he plans to meet with researchers at Hospital for Sick children.

Futerman's work is being funded by a donation from the estate of Hamiltonian Louis Ugar, whose daughter, Arlene Sarah, died of Tay-Sachs in 1953, at the age of three.

The estate has also funded a laboratory at Weizmann for research into these diseases. The lab is in honour of Lou, Belle and Arlene Sarah Ugar.

The genetic diseases program is also being supported by the Ugar estate, as well as the Robinson Family Institute of Jewish Learning and outside donors.

Hero tells story of World War II's 'hidden children'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

During World War II, many Jewish children were hidden with Christian families in order to save them from almost certain death in the concentration camps.

While they must have missed their parents, their families, their homes and their regular routines, many managed to have very good experiences.

Like Izaak, in Martha Attema's book Hero (Orca Book Publishers, 2003).

Izaak lived in Amsterdam, in Holland. He and his mother were hiding in an attic, being shielded by a kind friend. His father and sister were hiding somewhere else. When the Nazis became too threatening, Izaak's mother decided to send him to a farm in Friesland, in the northern part of the country.

You won't be surprised to hear that Izaak was not happy about this – after all, he was only eight years old. In fact, he declared several times that he wouldn't go at all, even when his mother told him that he would have children to play with, that he could play outside, go to school and have lots to eat.

He was not happy either that he would have to change his name to Jan, even if it was just temporary.

Finally, he realized that he had no choice, and packed his clothes, taking his favorite toys, a metal wagon and a metal horse.

A young woman, Els, who specialized in smuggling children into Friesland, picked Izaak up, and, in a wild ride, took him to the farm.

The family he was with were also hiding a little girl, Annie, and an older boy, Gabe. Everyone thought that they were young relatives, who had come to help out on the farm.

Izaak (or Jan, as he was called), enjoyed himself there. He played with other children on the farm, roamed around, ate good meals, and went to school, which he hadn't been able to do before. Best of all, in his mind, was that the family had three horses – two mares (that means female horses) and Hero, a big black stallion.

It was Izaak's job to take care of Hero. In return, if the Germans came to look for Jews who were hidden on the farm, he could hide in Hero's food trough, under the hay.

The Germans were always anxious to get horses to help them pull wagons and move supplies and personnel. One time when they came to the farm, instead of hiding, Izaak rode away on Hero and hid with him behind a dike, to keep him safe.

When everyone thought that the war was over, German soldiers came by anyway and took the two mares. They tried to take Hero, but Gabe, inspired by Izaak, rode him away.

The book ends mostly happily: the horses are brought back to the farm, all the Jewish children are safe, and Izaak's mother comes to get him. We never find out what happened to his father and sister.

For a long time, many hidden children, as they are called, didn't tell their stories. They often felt guilty for having things easier than many others. They also often felt guilty for being happy, if they were, when so many were suffering.

By the way, Hero is based on a true story. Attema's great uncle had a horse that was stolen by the Germans. A young boy from the farm went with the horse and eventually managed to bring him home.

HAIL

This story of hail, the seventh of the Ten Plagues, is based on Exodus, Ch. 9, and the Midrash.

"Oh mighty Pharaoh! Moshe and Aharon [Moses and Aaron] are here to see you!"

Pharaoh was silent for a moment. It would be useless to try to stop Moshe and Aharon from coming in. They had ways of getting past his guards and security lions. He sighed. "Let them in."

The two brothers entered the vast throne room, and approached. Moshe began speaking, but his thick stuttering obscured his words.

Pharaoh waited uneasily. Soon, Aharon would translate what his brother was saying. And Pharaoh knew from past experience that it would be something he didn't want to hear. They'll ask that their nation, the Jews, be freed from the brutal slavery they've been subjected to for the past 210 years. Then I'll refuse, and they'll threaten me and my country with some devastating catastrophe. And so far, their predictions have come true, six times out of six.

Moshe finished speaking, and Aharon stepped forward. "So says God the Lord of the Jews: Send out my people and let them serve me. And if you don't, tomorrow there will be an intense hailstorm, worse than any storm Egypt has ever seen. Bring indoors whatever you want to keep safe, because anything left outside will be destroyed."

The two elderly brothers backed out of the throne room and left.

Pharaoh shifted uncomfortably. We can't free the Jews. We need them. But what about the hail? We can bring everything indoors. But what about the crops growing in the fields? The wheat, the vegetables, the trees. A hailstorm will mean famine! We can't have that either! His mind churned frantically. I guess... maybe... Moshe and Aharon are wrong. Yeah, they guessed lucky until now. But that doesn't mean we have to listen to them...

Pharaoh looked around at the courtiers muttering to each other and roared, "Silence! You want to be weak? You want to just give in to these slaves?"

He couldn't believe what he was saying. But as he went on, it became easier. "Those two liars are turning you all into a bunch of cowards! Don't you know it never hails here? Hah, it hasn't even rained here since the days of my grandfather. The whole thing's a scam! You want to be a coward? Then bring your animals inside. Fine. I'm leaving everything in the fields. I'm not going to let two Jews run my life."

* * * *

"Daddy, why is it so dark today?"

Pharaoh looked up at the dense thunderheads gathering above, and then down at his daughter. "It's nothing. It's...just cloudy today."

"My kitten's acting weird. She's scared of something."

"There's nothing to be afraid of. Go outside and play."

Pharaoh paced back and forth anxiously. Nothing's going to happen. It's all a lie. We're safe. We'll have our slaves forever.

"Daddy! She's gone crazy! She's outside running around in—"

Her words were cut off by a tremendous thunderclap. Pharaoh looked outside in shock. From the ashen sky, gigantic chunks of ice were falling everywhere. Fire! The hailstones were streaked with flames! Pharaoh watched, stunned, as they tore into the ground, erupting in a spray of fire and ice.

The thunder roared around him as he ran to the doorway, attempting to look through the deluge of descending hailstones and heavy rain. Horrified, he saw his servants running around hysterically trying to save the herds of animals in the fields. It was a hopeless attempt. The animals were collapsing right and left from the fiery onslaught, and the people trying to save them weren't doing much better. Trees cracked and toppled, and Pharaoh knew the wheat crop was also suffering the same fate.

"Daddy! My kitty's still outside!"

"What are you doing?" screamed Pharaoh, lunging for his daughter, but it was too late. He watched helplessly as she tore down the path to the garden, missiles of fire and ice exploding all around her.

"Moshe! Aharon!"

"Yes?"

"Yes?"

Moshe and Aharon were standing just outside the doorway. The plummeting hailstones swerved to avoid them.

"I'm sorry! I'm wrong! God is right, and we're all wrong! We'll let you go! Just stop the hail!"

"As you wish," replied the brothers, and they turned to leave. Pharaoh knew that Moshe and Aharon would wait until they left the city to pray that the plague would end. Pharaoh lowered his head and cried. He knew his daughter must be dead.

"Daddy! I got her!"

Pharaoh looked up. She was still alive. She was running through the hailstorm, holding a struggling kitten. She was nearing the door when a huge hailstone exploded right next to her, and she clutched at her leg and crumpled to the ground.

Pharaoh dashed outside to his fallen daughter, but as he did so he saw a giant rock of ice plunging directly at her. His heart stopped beating... and the hail stopped falling. The balls of burning ice vanished. So did the rain. The thunder, which seconds before had resounded with deafening crashes, had gone silent.

He picked up his daughter. "You okay?" She nodded.

"Pharaoh?" It was Moshe and Aharon.

A mindless rage erupted inside of him.

"Get out of my sight!" he bellowed. "I will never let the Jews go free! Do you hear me? Never!"

Still trembling he turned and walked through the shattered stalks of wheat to the palace, thinking that at least, nothing worse could happen... or could it?

Canada is an Al Qaeda target, Post reporter says in new book

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There's a passage in Stewart Bell's recent book on terrorism that should send a shiver down the spine of any reader, particularly after the deadly Madrid train bombing.

"Canada is itself a terror target," Bell writes. "We must not forget that in the eyes of Al Qaeda, Canada is the enemy, as [Osama] bin Laden confirmed in one of his tape-recorded messages."

Two hundred passengers were killed in the multiple bomb attacks on Spanish commuter trains last month, an attack apparently prompted by Spain's military involvement in the occupation of Iraq.

Author Stewart Bell

Canada, for its part, has some 900 troops on patrol in Afghanistan, once home base for Al Qaeda but now occupied by the forces of several Western nations.

Even before that, "We were named in [November] 2002 as a country that deserves attack." Spain had been named by Bin Laden as being on Al Qaeda's hit list and Al Qaeda's track record is one of following through on its threats, Bell warned in an interview with The CJN.

Given that its personnel are "believers of Bin Laden's philosophy, they view Bin Laden's words on tape as a command."

Bell, author of Cold Terror, How Canada Nurtures and Exports Terrorism Around the World (John Wiley & Sons Canada Ltd), believes Canadians are blithely unaware of the danger. They consider Canada a sort of international do-gooder that is immune from attack. Canadian political leaders have consistently fed that attitude, denying there is a problem and even going so far as to actively support terrorists and their organizations.

Cold Terror recounts a disturbing array of short-sighted policy decisions, from CIDA funding Islamic charities that supported terrorism, to senior political leaders attending meetings of terror-supporting domestic organizations, as then finance minister Paul Martin did at a fundraiser for a Tamil Tiger front group in 2000.

And of course, Bell notes, there was the intervention of former prime minister Jean Chrétien with the government of Pakistan to win the release of Al Qaeda operative Ahmed Khadr; Chrétien 's lame explanation as to why he shook the hand of Sheik Hassam Nasrallah, the head of Hezbollah, during a Francophonie meeting in Lebanon; and the obstinate refusal by Foreign Minister Bill Graham to list Hezbollah as a terrorist organization, characterizing it instead as a sort of benevolent welfare agency.

Canadians are complacent about domestic terrorist organizations because "the public is so often told there is no problem," Bell writes.

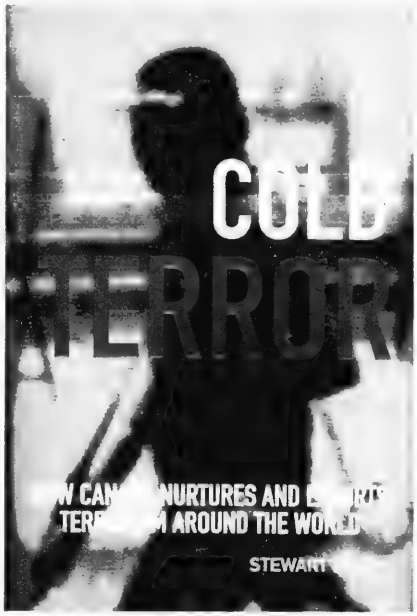
Friendly states, including Sri Lanka and Israel, collect information about Canadian terrorists and though they have a high regard for Canadian intelligence agencies, they are "frustrated with Canada's inability to stop terrorist support and fundraising, recruitment, passport forgery and plotting."

Groups such as Al Qaeda raise money in Canada and obtain travel documents, but their deadly attacks take place outside our borders. Canadian terrorists, Bell said, are responsible for much death and pain around the world.

Bell, who writes on security issues for the National Post, examines the earliest terrorist incidents in Canada, including the 1982 assassination attempt of a Turkish diplomat by Armenian radicals, the growth of the Tamil Tigers movement, and the influx of Sikh and Muslim radicals.

Attesting to the limp Canadian response even to domestic terrorism was the treatment meted out to Haig Gharakhanian, the 17-year-old Armenian who scouted out Turkish targets prior to the shooting of Kani Gungor, a Turkish commercial attaché.

Gharakhanian, who was involved in insurance fraud to fund the assassins, was sentenced to two years less a day and was paroled after nine months. He received a Canadian government business loan, married a Canadian and successfully fought a deportation order. In September 2003, he was awaiting the decision of his application for Canadian citizenship. Gungor, meanwhile, was paralyzed in the attack and lives his life in a wheelchair.



Perhaps the most well-known Islamic radical was Ahmed Ressam, the Algerian-born terrorist who was arrested crossing the U.S. border on the way to a millennium attack on the Los Angeles airport. Ressam was an Afghanistan-trained operative who committed petty crimes in Montreal while he hatched the Los Angeles plot. During one of his brainstorming sessions, he and his confederates considered bombing Jewish targets in Montreal.

Bell said Canada's lackadaisical attitude to domestic terrorists was explained to him by a senior official of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade. Speaking on background, the official said that "after 9/11 the priority was not counter-terrorism but keeping the border with the United States open, not slowing trade. Part of that was a PR strategy to not admit we had a problem. We did not want to inflame the Americans to put increased security at the border."

Moreover, "a lot of politicians, and quite senior ones, are lobbied by organizations that complain about even the mildest counter-terror steps. Some threatened [law]suits if [the government] brought in measures against tax breaks for charities that funded terror." There were also complaints that counter-terror measures would have negative repercussions on ethnic communities.

"They have the ear of politicians," Bell said.

He said this attitude is "just wrong. Canada has to have counter-terror measures that protect people who want to be Canadians and not fight the wars of their homelands.

"I don't think Canadians want their country to be a safe haven [for terrorists]," he said.

Referring to the deaths of Canadians in terrorist attacks in Afghanistan and Bali, Bell said, "we're at war, really. We don't quite realize it as Canadians. There's a certain population in the world with a certain mindset that has declared war on Canada and the West."

The Jewish community faces an additional danger, he said, "but it's not just a Jewish issue. There should be broader Canadian outrage on this. It's sad that the Jewish community is almost alone in lobbying the Canadian government to take a tougher stand. I hope eventually the rest of Canadian society will join them."

Director looks back at Duddy Kravitz

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the late 1950s, when Canadian film director Ted Kotcheff was a young man, he shared an apartment in London, England, with a struggling, but up-and-coming Montreal Jewish novelist named Mordecai Richler.

One day, shortly after Richler's third novel, A Choice of Enemies, was published, he asked his Bulgarian roommate for his opinion on his newest manuscript, The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz.

"I thought it was one of the finest Canadian novels I had ever read," recalled Kotcheff, the executive producer of the TV series Law and Order, in an interview. "It really captured my imagination."

Hoping to turn it into a film, Kotcheff bought the movie rights for the grand sum of $1.

But almost 15 years would elapse before Kotcheff could finally fulfil his goal.

Shot in 10 weeks in Quebec during the autumn of 1973, The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, starring a then-unknown Richard Dreyfuss, became one of Canada's first international box office hits. The Toronto International Film Festival Group has recently re-released it in limited runs in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

"I didn't think it would be that successful," Kotcheff said. "I can predict failure, but success is more problematic."

A Torontonian who broke into the entertainment industry as a CBC stagehand, he acknowledged that Duddy has been immensely profitable.

"I thought it had a good chance of being successful. Duddy is an iconic figure, a perpetually interesting character with a deep appeal."

For years, he and Richler had discussed the possibility of adapting Duddy to the screen. But when the time came to raise money for the project, John Kemeny, the Hungarian-born producer, ran into resistance.

Some potential investors feared that Duddy, a grasping, ambitious hustler, might place Montreal's Jewish community in an unfavourable light.

"It was touch and go till the last moment," recalled Kotcheff, who has had a busy career as a scriptwriter as well as a director.

Kemeny raised all but $100,000 of the $900,000 the movie required. But when he and Kotcheff approached CBC for one final infusion of funds, they were rebuffed.

Asked why CBC demurred, Kotcheff launched into a tirade against the tax-funded national broadcaster.

"Because they're a bunch of idiots and chickens--ts!" he said, his voice growing increasingly rancorous and bitter.

In the end, Global TV came to the rescue, and in an ironic upshot, CBC paid Global more for the TV rights than it was originally asked to contribute.

As Richler was loath to write the film script, Kotcheff and Lionel Chetwyn, a young, inexperienced scriptwriter produced the screenplay.

"It wasn't quite right," said Kotcheff, who co-wrote the script for the acclaimed British movie, Life at the Top, with Richler. "Mordecai came in and wrote a great script."

Casting Duddy was not easy. "I saw a lot of actors in Canada, but I felt they wouldn't be able to engage a viewer's attention for two hours and carry the film," Kotcheff said.

Lyn Stalmaster, a New York casting agent who had worked for Kotcheff in Billy Two Hats, a western filmed in Israel, suggested Dreyfuss, then only 24.

An audition was scheduled in Los Angeles. Dreyfuss blew them away.

"His reading was electric," Kotcheff remembered. "He had the drive and emotional power."

After snagging the role, Dreyfuss got one of the lead parts in the low-budget classic, American Graffiti, which launched his Hollywood career.

To this day, Kotcheff is amazed that a film of Duddy's calibre was shot on such an incredibly tight budget. "Even in 1973, $900,000 was not a lot."

Ted Kotcheff

A decade or so later, Kotcheff directed Joshua Then And Now, inspired by another Richler novel. To his regret, Joshua did not fare as well at the box office.

In the late 1990s, Kotcheff and Richler began collaborating on a screenplay based on Barney's Version, published in 1997. The author's sudden death abruptly ended their plans, but Kotcheff is hopeful that the book will eventually see the light of a day as a film.

Division of pensions in cases of marital dissolution

Part Two of Two

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

In the March 18 issue, we examined the current state of pension division in Canada and the implications of often contradictory directives, policies and legislation. If you are an employee of a federally-regulated pension-issuing body such as the R.C.M.P., the House of Commons and Senate, or certain other federal government departments, you have the good fortune to bypass this quagmire.

Under the federal Pension Benefits Division Act, the non-pension-holding spouse receives her own pension based on a formula either contained in a separation agreement or in a Court order. If the agreement or Court order fails to specify a formula, then the Minister administering the Act bases the division on the number of years the spouses were married or cohabiting. The other spouse then gets her own pension plan. She is not tied to her former partner's plan in any way. In other words, the legislation for certain federal employees provides the "clean break" with which the Supreme Court was so concerned in Best.

"Clean break" principle based on length of marriage

To conclude, in the best tradition of Monty Python, we are currently left with the following inconsistent state of Ontario law:

1. Ontario spouses who agree to divide the pension Plan holder's pension or death benefit entitlements may do so in a domestic contract. It will be enforced by a Court even if the plan refuses to pay a former spouse the money under the formula stipulated in the contract.
2. However, if the other spouse refuses to agree in writing to wait until the pension holder retires or dies, and insists on receiving her half of its current future value now, then the Supreme Court will not likely permit any lower Court to force the non-pension holder to wait. This is true even though the Court clearly has the power to make such an order under Ontario's pension legislation.
3. If you or your spouse are one of the comparative few who are covered under the federal Pension Benefit Divisions Act, due to this Act's "clean break" principle that provides for an independent pension to the other spouse, a Court will likely order such a division if the other spouse fails to agree.

Accordingly, matrimonial lawyers are relieved when they have such federally regulated clients and simply send a letter to the Minister to effect such a division. Moreover, they have the Minister do the calculations because they know it will be based on some neutral formula fashioned around the number of years the parties were cohabiting or married.

Many people of both sexes, such as teachers, fireman and Ontario or municipal employees, have "defined" pensions. When they separate from their spouse, they are often forced to valuate the future value of pension or pre-pension death entitlements and pay out half their benefit well before they actually retire. They may also be obliged to give up their homes (or equity in their homes) or other assets in return shortly after separation. This often leaves them with a significant shortfall of immediate and sorely needed cash.

Imagine a hypothetical case of a municipal employee with the care of two children who is obliged to pay out half of the current future value of her pension entitlement from the sale proceeds of her home. In such a case, she could then be left with insufficient savings to purchase a new home for herself and her children, even though she could be many years away from retirement. By contrast, the federal Pension Benefits Division Act makes sense. The Act creates a separate plan for the pension holder's spouse without having to create the hardship of interfering with the pension holder's use of other monies for often pressing current expenses.

Current pension legislation still leaves many at risk

The other problem with assessing the future value of pension entitlements, and forcing spouses to pay out half their portions now, is the hassle and legal expense involved. With every such pension, actuaries are retained to calculate this figure on an "after tax" basis using different presumptions as to when the pension holder will "likely" retire. Litigation sometimes abounds over such issues as:

(a) when the person will likely retire;

(b) what tax rates to use; and

(c) the 'method' of valuation employed.

In cases of extreme hardship, the pension holder may argue that he should be allowed to pay out his share of the pension over a period of up to 10 years (which is permitted under Ontario's Family Law Act), and this presents yet another issue to fight over.

We need legislative change in Ontario. Several family law lawyers have lobbied for such change from the Province for many years. It's so simple and requires little money from the Ontario government — just a sense of Justice. For "defined" pensions, the Legislature should be adopting the federal Pension Benefits Division Act for all Ontario employees.

On behalf of myself, my family and the firm of Beard Winter LLP, I wish you a Happy and Healthy Passover.

Dublin celebrates centenary of Ulysses hero's walk

BY NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

DUBLIN — The most famous stroll around Dublin occurred 100 years ago this June, when a character called Leopold Bloom began his day-long meanderings in James Joyce's Ulysses.

A century later, visitors to Dublin still discover a remarkably pedestrian-friendly city, where folks are friendly and the police are unarmed.

The best time to enjoy Dublin's invigorating cityscape is anytime but high summer, when throngs of people make strolling city streets a bit of a challenge. I visited during the off-season, and found the prices reasonable, the weather pleasant, and the people even pleasanter.

On pedestrian-only Grafton Street, street performers are justly famed for their quality and variety: a red-haired girl plays the Irish harp, a puppeteer from China performs to tapes from her homeland, two rockers on electric guitar belt out Pink Floyd – and that's just along the first few blocks.

Two women sell bright bouquets of flowers from the back of a van close to a Dublin landmark: Bewley's Coffee and Tea, an emporium that has its own museum on site. The trendy shops make an afternoon's entertainment of "just looking."

As befits a city immortalized by its famous literary son, James Joyce, there seems to be an unusually high number of bookshops.

The whole of Ireland abounds in festivals so it's nearly impossible for visitors to miss one during their stay. I catch the end of the Dublin Theatre Festival and its sibling, the Fringe Festival, before heading over to Wexford for their annual opera festival, just missing Cork's film festival and Galway's food festival.

I spend my nights watching plays and my days exploring. Early one day, I head to the newly gentrified Temple Bar. This once run-down neighbourhood – "You wouldn't go there in the daytime," a friendly Dubliner tells me – now offers a multitude of not-to-be-missed restaurants, clubs and watering holes.

On my way to a Fringe Festival production, I duck into the Dublin Writer's Museum, a shrine to the city's famous authors and poets housed in the former home of the Jameson family of Irish whisky fame.

When Joyce created his masterpiece, he focused on Leopold Bloom, whose walk around Dublin mimicked the role of the wandering Greek, Ulysses. At that time, the city's Jewish population was much larger than it is today.

Following a large exodus after World War II, the Jewish community now numbers roughly 1,400 in the south and 400 in the north. Yet Ireland was for long a hospitable home for Jews, electing many a Jewish lord mayor in both Cork and Dublin.

Many visitors today, especially on Bloomsday – June 16 – follow in the footsteps of Joyce's Bloom, who is, after all, a fictional character – and incidentally, a convert to Christianity.

Many also visit the Irish Jewish Museum, located in a former synagogue, just around the corner from the house where George Bernard Shaw was born.

I choose to follow both paths. Sunday morning, a cab takes me out to the museum in the old synagogue on Walworth Road. Opened by Dublin-born Chaim Herzog in 1985, it contains collections of memorabilia, including some from Herzog's own family, as well as a well-stocked, original kitchen, prepared for a Sabbath meal in the early 1900s.

For my Joyce odyssey, I take the bus out to Sandymount to an old Martello Tower high above the sea. Now the James Joyce Museum, the tower is home to a famous scene in Ulysses, in the very room where Joyce himself once lived with an eccentric friend. Nearby, the town of Dalkey makes a fine destination on its own; its village-like atmosphere draws current stars in the Dublin cultural firmament, including residents such as Nobel Prize-winning poet Seamus Heaney and rock star Bono.

Both excursions are worthwhile, but nothing outdoes just meandering around Dublin. On my last night, I make my way to the Samuel Beckett Theatre for a performance of a surprise hit: a reworking of the Giselle story. Walking to the theatre through the campus of Trinity College – home to the ancient Book of Kells – I pass students' black bicycles leaning against the college fences, just as they have done for over a hundred years. Tonight's performance blends old and new: dance, myth, brutal realism. The talented cast hails from all over the new Europe, of which Ireland is a proud member.

"Dublin is a 'buzzy' town," someone says to me, meaning it's a place where people still get excited about the latest in the arts. Judging by what I've seen, Dublin deserves every bit of its buzz.

WRITER-ILLUSTRATOR RICHARD UNGAR INSPIRED BY PERETZ, CHAGALL, VISHNIAC

Set in the mythological Jewish town of Chelm, Toronto writer-illustrator-Richard Ungar's recent children's book Rachel's Gift tells a warm-hearted tale about how one family hopes to lure Elijah the Prophet to their seder table by making an amazing matzah ball soup, and how everyone in the family except Rachel is too busy in the kitchen to notice when Elijah actually arrives.

Ungar, a corporate lawyer who sketches and writes in the evenings after his children go to sleep, acknowledges that his wonderful painting and story-telling abilities have been deeply influenced by generations of Jewish folklore, art and literature.

"One of my great reference sources for illustrations is Roman Vishniac's photographs of European Jews before the war," he said. "I absorb these photos in my mind and I do sketches based on them. Some of the details eventually meld into my own illustrations."

Another important influence on his work is the art of Marc Chagall, just as the tales of I.L. Peretz are a major inspiration for his stories, he said. He reads Jewish folklore on a regular basis.

"My favourite place for this is the Jewish Public Library on Bathurst Street. It's a treasure trove of stories and a great source for finding Jewish folk tales. It's a wonderful place. I'll go there for a few hours on a Sunday and just read."

A Montreal native who came to Toronto in 1985, Ungar won a Young Readers award from the Association of Jewish Libraries for Rachel's Gift, which is published by Tundra Books. A new book, Rachel's Library, is due for publication in the fall.

Ungar, who sometimes reads to schoolchildren, said it isn't royalties that motivate him. "The remuneration is really the satisfaction that I see when I do a storytelling," he said. "It's the joy on the kids' faces because they're into the story."

More about his books and paintings is available on his website, www.geocities.com/ungart2001

Documentary Explores Community Rifts: The Canadian public affairs TV station ichannel airs a two-hour special, Rift in the Jewish Community, this week. Hosted by Bill Cameron, the show features Y.I.D. Yehudeem In The Diaspora, a documentary by young Toronto filmmakers Igal Hecht and Ron Furman that explores "the uneasy relationship between Diaspora and Israeli Jews living in Toronto during the peak of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict."

Shot on location in Israel, Toronto and Ottawa, the documentary is being shown in three parts, along with studio conversations with the filmmakers, Israeli professor Robert Wistrich and Dr. David Goldberg, director of research and education for the Canada-Israel Committee, who comments that Israel-bashing has become the international norm.

When the documentary premiered last year at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, it received only a lukewarm critical reception. But judge for yourself. Rift in the Jewish Community airs on ichannel on April 4, 8 p.m.

Literary Notes: Key Porter Books of Toronto recently produced The Oy of Cooking: A Jewish Grandmother's Legacy of Food and Memories. It's written by Susie Weinthal, a Brooklyn-born Toronto resident who is a former executive of Cadillac Fairview and, of course, a grandmother many times over… Tova Mirvis's new novel, The Outside World, has been called "a hilarious comedy of manners about two Orthodox Jewish families brought together by the marriage of their children." If it's anything like her stunning debut The Ladies Auxiliary, it's bound to be a bestseller. It's due from Knopf in April… Also forthcoming this month is The Best of Sondra Gotlieb, more fun from the epicurean essayist only a year after her last book appeared… Torontonian Bev Katz Rosenbaum, a freelance writer-editor, wife and mother, has penned a title for Harlequin, a company she used to work for. Wanted: An Interesting Life comes out this month as part of Harlequin's "Sex and the City" line of light, sexy, breezy books for 21- to 34-year-old readers.

Bloomsday Festivities: Fans of Ulysses, James Joyce's epic novel of ordinary life, are planning a fundraising Klezmer Ceilidh in advance of a Bloomsday Centenary Festival planned for June 14 to 16 to mark the 100th anniversary of the fictional Leopold Bloom's weekend romp through Dublin.

The evening of "spectacular Yiddish-Irish entertainment" is to include lots of "siamsa and simchah" ("fun" in Gaelic and Yiddish). Performers include Brian Katz, Kevin Kenney, Samantha Kennedy, Anne Lederman, Jonathan Lynn, Theresa Tova and Martin Van de Ven.

The Klezmer Ceilidh is planned for 8 p.m. on Thursday, April 1, (and not the incorrect date that organizers had previously supplied to this column).

PAL, 110 The Esplanade (east of Church St.) Tickets are $50 and include entertainment, food and refreshments. A limited number of $25 tickets also available. Tickets available at the door or call 416-365-7877 for reservations.

Local violinist to reunite with Israeli classmates

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Three musicians who studied together at Tel Aviv University's Samuel Rubin Academy of Music more than 30 years ago, are being reunited.

Violinists Moshe Hammer and Gil Sharon and violist Ron Ephrat met in a chamber music class and played in ensembles together at the school in the late 1960s, when it was known as the Tel Aviv Academy.

The three musicians perform at Glenn Gould Studio on April 18, along with cellists Alex Hülshoff and Hector Vasquez, in a concert that features a duo by Handel, a trio by Beethoven and Schubert's Quintet in C.

Hammer, Sharon and Ephrat made friends as 15-year-olds studying at the academy because of their common interest in the violin, Hammer says. Ephrat switched to viola later.

Hammer lost touch with his pals after they moved to Holland, where Sharon is now the concertmaster of the Maastricht Orchestra and Ephrat is the principal violist of the Rotterdam Symphony Orchestra. Hammer has been living in Toronto since 1970 and plays with orchestras and at festivals across Canada, in the United States and Europe.

Ten years ago, Hammer toured The Netherlands and reconnected with his friends. Now, the three musicians make music together globally, in Holland and Toronto, as The Amati String Trio.

Hammer has a special affection for the days that he played with Sharon and Ephrat at the Tel Aviv Academy and the good times and fun they shared. He says that they often reminisce about their lives as teenagers in Tel Aviv.

The three of them have a strong bond and so Ephrat has a tendency to lapse into Hebrew at rehearsals these days, to the puzzlement of other musicians present who don't understand the language.

"In the middle of rehearsal, he'll start explaining things in Hebrew. The three of us understand what he's talking about, but everybody else looks sheepishly at everybody else, not understanding what is happening," Hammer says. "Me, of course, at the end, I have to translate what Ron said."

Violinist Moshe Hammer

Toronto in 1985. The ensemble was forced to cancel its regular Toronto season two years ago because of financial constraints.

Along with maintaining a performance schedule in North America and Europe, Hammer is a prolific recording artist, with 11 recordings to his credit on amazon.ca.

Hammer says, for him, performance is about communicating with his audiences. After he plays, people sometimes tell him that they've been transported by the music.

Music, he says, goes directly to the place where we feel things." I don't know if the heart is where we feel things but it is a good symbol."

Moshe Hammer, Gil Sharon, Ron Ephrat and Alex Hülshoff, members of The Amati String Trio, and Hector Vasquez play at Glenn Gould Studio on April 18. For tickets, $30, and $25 for students and seniors, call 416-205-5555.

Moshe Hammer is a prolific recording artist

Their Glenn Gould Studio concert features one of the great masterpieces of chamber music, Schubert's Quintet in C. The slow movement of the work is one of the most beautiful slow movements ever written, Hammer says.a

"Mozart wrote well over 100 slow movements and this ranks with Mozart. Mozart, when he wrote music, he was tapping into the centre of the universe and to me, Schubert is up there, with Mozart, and Bach and Beethoven."

Hammer is one of the founding members and the music director of the critically acclaimed Amadeus Ensemble, formed in

The Reinhartzes: Yiddishists and social activists

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In their homey apartment filled with books, family photos and travel souvenirs, it's almost incongruous to think of Henia and Nochem Reinhartz as "the famous s--t-disturbers from Toronto," the phrase their friend Irena Kohn, a doctoral candidate at the University of Toronto, used to describe them in a congratulatory e-mail in December.

At the time, the energetic septuagenarians had just learned about the successful outcome of an e-mail campaign they had led – sparked by a family trip to Poland – urging Lodz city officials to include Yiddish on commemorative plaques for the 60th anniversary of the Lodz ghetto liquidation taking place this summer.

Says Kohn, who is writing her thesis on the Lodz ghetto, "I think [Henia and Nochem] are quite amazing. They're so active in their community, and so sharp, so intelligent. They're very warmhearted, generous people, very committed to social justice."

Nochem, the quieter partner, prefers a behind-the-scenes role. A 79-year-old retired typesetter, he provides the technical expertise for most of their joint projects, including designing and printing the programs for the Yiddishland Café, a five-times-yearly event featuring Yiddish-language arts performances, based at the Jewish and Yiddish cultural organization Workmen's Circle.

Nochem joined the interview for this article at the insistence of his wife, a retired educator who used to teach Yiddish at Bialik Hebrew Day School and the University of Toronto. "You'll have to open your mouth," Henia told him in mock exasperation.

A genial man with a wry sense of humour, Nochem "is not a big talker," said Henia, 77. "He's a doer.

"I'm a talker, but I'm a doer too."

Together, the Reinhartzes seem to balance each other, feeding off one another's ideas and completing each other's sentences.

The café got off the ground in 1996, after initial funding in the form of a Continuity grant from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (now UJA Federation of Greater Toronto) forced them and their small committee to think about what they wanted to bring to the Yiddish- and non-Yiddish-speaking public, said Henia. They have also received funding from the Toronto Arts Council.

The first event was a sellout, attracting more than 200 people. They now have a mailing list of 220.

"It's a labour of love," Henia said. "What we had in mind was to promote Yiddish as a beautiful language of literature, songs and music." Each evening has a theme expressed in hand-picked songs, poetry and prose. Their most recent event this past Sunday was titled "Old Wine in New Bottles," with the Klezmer band Beyond the Pale and Montreal singer Bronna Levy.

Henia works with the performers at her kitchen table – adorned the day of the interview with an embroidered tablecloth from Australia – to help them understand and correctly pronounce the material they will be using.

Among their other projects, the Reinhartzes recently translated the memoirs of Arnold Mostowicz, a Lodz ghetto physician. The book is scheduled for publication in England this summer, to coincide with the Lodz ghetto commemoration. It will be "a very important addition to Holocaust literature," said Henia.

Now, a second book translation is in the works. The Legend of Blind Max, also by Mostowicz, is historical fiction, with elements of love, murder and betrayal, said Nochem.

As a child in Lodz, Henia attended a Yiddish-language Bundist elementary school. She spent most of her teenage years in the Lodz ghetto before being deported to Auschwitz. Her working class parents always wanted her and her sister (the Yiddish writer Chava Rosenfarb) to pursue a higher education, she said., and Henia fulfilled that goal as an adult, earning a BA in Psychology from York University and a master's degree in Education from OISE on a part-time basis.

Nochem also pursued university studies as an adult, completing a BA in sociology part time at York and a second one in political science from the University of London, where he took classes as a correspondence student.

The only child of two teachers, Nochem was born in Lodz but grew up in Vilnius, which was then part of Poland. He spent the war years in Siberia, where he and his father were deported after Vilnius was occupied by the Russians.

In Siberia, Nochem worked in a metal factory, acquiring skills that he has put to use more creatively in recent years, fashioning lamps of materials like copper, Plexiglass and wood that grace various spots in the Reinhartz home.

After the war, Nochem and his father returned to Poland and, with the help of the Red Cross, located his mother in Tel Aviv. The family decided to reunite in Paris, where Nochem worked as a typesetter for the Yiddish publication Unser Stimme (Our Voice). His plans to study chemistry had become "unrealistic," he said.

Henia, who attended high school for a year before the war broke out, knew from the time she was a teenager that she wanted to be a teacher. The goal was "like a candy" to her, a reward that she promised herself if she were to survive.

In Sasel, one of three concentration camps endured, she, her mother and her sister "kind of adopted" Henia's former Latin teacher, who used to tell them about her travels to Paris and London. "I made myself a promise that if I survive, I'm going to live in Paris," said Henia.

After the war, she did just that, training, on scholarship, as a Yiddish teacher. She had smuggled herself into France from Brussels, where she spent her first free day riding an escalator up and down in a department store. "There was a great hunger for experiencing life, for living."

Henia and Nochem's memory of their first meeting, when he sat behind her at a Paris lecture sponsored by the Bundist movement, is as vivid today as her long red hair was at that time.

"All of a sudden, somebody pulled my hair!" she recalls. "And here was this young man laughing, and I got terribly angry at him – and this is how this whole thing started!"

Her first reaction – "How dare he!" – was mitigated over time, as they socialized with mutual friends. Later they attended concerts and the theatre together. "We would sit at the very top," said Henia. "We were terribly poor, not a franc to our souls."

In 1949, Nochem followed his parents to Toronto, where they had been invited to teach at the Workmen's Circle School. About a year later, Henia joined her mother and sister in Montreal. The couple married at Toronto's City Hall in March 1952.

When their children – Adele, now dean of graduate studies and research at Wilfrid Laurier University, and Abe, a family physician – were growing up, Henia was open with them about her Holocaust experiences, at what she felt was an age-appropriate level. She introduced the subject naturally when Adele asked questions about a family photo that included Henia's father, who did not survive the war.

Several years ago, she wrote a booklet for her grandchildren about her childhood and wartime experiences. "I wanted them to know my story," she said. Nochem typeset the memoir and printed copies for each of their six grandchildren.

The secret to their 52-year partnership? "Common interests," said Henia.

"Not to get bored," chimed in Nochem. Also, he added, a common background is very important.

"That doesn't mean we never quarrel," interjected Henia.

"But," specified Nochem, "they're creative quarrels."

Or Chaim Knights surprise opponents at New York tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As high school basketball tournaments go, Yeshiva University's annual Red Sarachek High School Basketball Tournament is one of the most plush. Not only are visiting teams accorded first-class treatment, but out-of-towners are treated to five nights at the Hilton Hotel, with tours of New York City thrown in.

It's not unusual to take a bus to the prestigious tourney for Jewish schools – named for the legendary coach of Yeshiva U's men's team– but for the boys from Toronto's Yeshivat Or Chaim, flying down was part of the package, though they had to raise the money for that themselves.

Given the first-rate conditions, a second-rate performance could not be countenanced, even if the host Americans may have felt that Canadians can't play basketball the way they can.

So the Or Chaim Knights turned a few heads in New York and became instant heroes back home when they finished second in the competition's Tier II event.

Starting the March 18-22 tournament ranked 17th out of 18 teams, Or Chaim had to battle for every little bit of respect – and for a spot in the tournament's middle tier. They earned a berth by winning their first game and went on to a 3-1 record, finishing the tourney ranked 10th. Their leap up the tournament ladder was greater than that of any other team and may earn them an invitation back to next winter's event.

Knights co-captain David Elmaleh said that while next year's participation is still up in the air, this year's squad surprised plenty of spectators with its gritty performance and march to the Tier II final. The Knights won their first three games before losing to Ida Crown Aces, a team from Chicago, 55-47.

The final was a see-saw affair, with the lead changing hands several times. In the fourth quarter, however, the Americans began to pull away while the Knights just couldn't make their shots fall, Elmaleh said.

The Knights opened the tournament with a 60-31 thrashing of Eshkol, a team from Baltimore. They followed that with a 43-23 victory over Hillel of Miami and then advanced to the final with a 33-32 nailbiter over Yeshiva High School Lions of Atlanta.

That game went down to the wire, Elmaleh said. The Knights were trailing by four points with 22 seconds remaining when they sank a basket to narrow the margin to two. The Knights took a foul when Hillel grabbed possession and were relieved when Hillel's foul shooter missed both his shots. With only 2.5 seconds left on the clock, the Knights in-bounded the ball to Elmaleh, who was stuffed taking his shot. Fortunately, the ball bounced to Baruch Jakubovic, the team's big man at six-foot-five, who drained a three-pointer for the win at the buzzer.

Or Chaim Knights finished second in Tier II of the prestigious Red Sarachek tournament.

It was an exciting moment, one enjoyed not only by the Knights, but by the numerous fans who came down from Toronto for the game and by Or Chaim alumni currently studying at Yeshiva U, Elmaleh said.

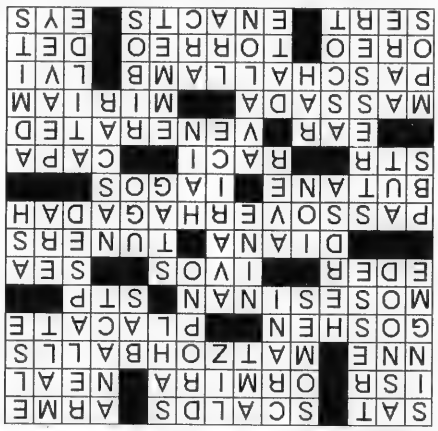
To get to the Tier II final, the Knights played the same disciplined defensive style as they had all year. Coach Michael Blatchford trains them to pressure their opponents around the court, to run the ball when they can and to make good decisions once they're in possession. The team is not particularly potent offensively, but they try to find a balance between effective outside shooting and driving to the net, Elmaleh said.

Going to the tournament, the Knights were confident, though not cocky. Once in New York, they felt their American counterparts didn't quite take them seriously, Elmaleh said.

"We felt they didn't really respect us because we were from Canada. But we showed them on the court. Our coach always told us to keep it between the lines."

Despite the championship loss, "we were very, very pleased with our results. Our school, our community, everyone" [is pleased], he added.

FLIP OVER FOR ANSWERS TO CROSSWORD.



Four questions beats Final Four on Passover

By ERIC FINGERHAUT
Washington Jewish Week

WASHINGTON, D.C. — As I filled out my NCAA tournament pick last week, and made the annual selection of my beloved Duke Blue Devils as the winner, I noticed the date for this year's championship game.

If the Dukies make the finals, I won't be watching the game at a sports bar or hanging out with my fellow Duke alums. No, I'll be with my family singing Dayeinu and dining on gefilte fish and matzah ball soup. This year, the best Monday of the year for college basketball fans is also the first night of Passover.

The intersection this year between Passover and "March Madness" is not unprecedented. Indeed, it has happened pretty regularly over the past 15 years. Back in 1991, when I was a student in Durham, N.C., one of the most memorable games in tournament history, Duke's semifinal upset of undefeated, defending champion UNLV, occurred on the second night of Passover.

I did not attend a seder that night. No one ever went to a seder on the second night in college. It was difficult enough putting together one holiday meal.

But I munched on Passover brownies while watching the game and avoided beer while celebrating the win (and Duke's championship game victory two days later).

Three years later, when Grant Hill and Duke faced Glenn Robinson and Purdue, the 6 p.m. tipoff coincided with the start of the seder.

It may not be halachically permissible, but I watched the tape when the seder was finished, and enjoyed the game just as much as I would have if I had watched it live.

And back in 1993, when Duke's archrival North Carolina played Michigan in the championship game on the first night of Passover, I saw only a few minutes of the game, although those moments did include Chris Webber's famous time-out call that came when Michigan was out of timeouts.

A couple years ago, I recall some New York politicians urging Major League Baseball to change the date of a playoff game because it fell on Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur.

How silly, I thought. Not only does never playing the World Series on Yom Kippur deprive Jewish fathers of sharing with their young sons the most convincing argument ever on the importance of Yom Kippur – that Sandy Koufax refused to pitch a game because it fell on the Day of Atonement – it also skews our priorities.

Following sports provides us with a fun diversion from the daily drudgery of our lives. It gives fans something to talk and argue about. But some things are more important, such as carrying on Jewish traditions that have existed for thousands of years.

Passover was celebrated long before there was a Final Four, and it is observed in places where they have never heard of the NCAA tournament or office pools. And it will continue to be celebrated for years to come, whether there is an NCAA tournament or not.

So on April 5, I will be excited for the game. But I'll be more excited to be with my family, once again hearing the Four Questions and eating some matzah and bitter herbs.

Playing in New York

All work and no play makes the life of a volunteer with the AVODAH Jewish Service Corps in New York City not much fun. That's why we try to take advantage of all the city has to offer. We may work nine to five at our respective non-profit organizations, doing difficult, front-line anti-poverty work, but we also know how to relax and have fun every chance we get.

By ELISHEVA GOULD

Last month, we had countless options for celebrating Purim: some of my housemates went to a Chabad service in Manhattan, some stayed in Brooklyn and went to shuls of their choice, and some chose to explore the many Megillah readings and parties being held throughout the city. I decided to attend the Saturday night reading of Megillat Esther at a traditional egalitarian minyan called Hadar. The service was held in the large basement of a church on the Upper West Side, and men and women took turns reading the chapters. Hundreds of Jewish students, young professionals and new families sat together, booing Haman and celebrating the holiday.

After the reading, I joined several friends and headed down to the Lower East Side to hear a chassidic reggae artist named Matisyahu perform at a sold-out concert. It was the most exciting Purim experience I've had outside of Jerusalem.

As we continue our work, each of us is finding different shuls at which we like to daven and restaurants that we like and can afford. We are taking yoga classes and attending films and educational programs at Jewish community centres and other organizations. And we are taking advantage of the occasional reasonably priced Broadway and off-Broadway show and museums where you can pay what you can, as well as New York's many thrilling free events and attractions. The city has a cutting-edge cultural scene and there is something for everyone here.

My housemate, Ali, is a talented magician who has been performing sleight-of-hand card tricks and entertaining audiences for years. For her birthday, most of us plan to join her to see the famous Monday Night Magic show at the SoHo Playhouse, where she's made new friends and professional connections.

My friends and I went ice-skating one night last month at Wollman Rink in Central Park, with the city's tall midtown buildings as our backdrop and light snow drifting down. When spring finally comes, I'll go rollerblading through Central Park and Brooklyn's Prospect Park, ride the Staten Island Ferry to see great views of the Manhattan skyline, and walk through Brooklyn's centuries-old Green-Wood Cemetery, which rivals Mount Pleasant as a peaceful and fascinating tourist attraction.

Most AVODAH volunteers are going home for Pesach, but there is no shortage of meaningful Passover events both before and after the holiday. New York City is an exciting place to be young and Jewish. Then again, I have to admit I can't wait to fly home and share the seders with my beloved bubbie, Rose Schwartz, and the rest of my immediate and extended Toronto family.

As a busy volunteer in New York, I split my free time between visiting and keeping in touch with my family and friends in Toronto, hanging out with my housemates and my old and new friends here, and exploring the city's endless entertainment opportunities.

Next month, I'll tell you about the educational programming that AVODAH volunteers are responsible for. May you all have a wonderful Pesach holiday.

"Liberty means responsibility. That is why most men dread it."
George Bernard Shaw

We cannot simply say that Pesach is about freedom and liberty, because our slavery in Egypt is used as an object lesson throughout the Torah after the Exodus from Egypt. How many times does the Torah remind us that we were once slaves, and that this fact should humble us before certain laws of compassion? If Pesach were only about freedom, we would be commanded to forget our past and start our new lives tabula rasa, without regard to our enslavement.

Another complexity of the Pesach message is that the holiday is bound up in legal restrictions: what we can eat, what we can't eat, what we must eat, how much and when we must eat it, etc. If the holiday were simply about casting off the yoke of slavery, it would be a celebration of total licence, not a holy day filled with rules. One of the reasons Pesach starts our cycle of holidays is to stress the mature notion that true freedom comes with responsibility, that human obligations precede human rights, and that autonomy is only meaningful in a normative system.

Children (and immature adults) think of liberty as licence, but experience and deep knowledge teach us that Pesach and Shavuot go together. They were bound together by our tradition precisely because the Exodus alone could not forge a people. Sinai was needed to teach the responsibility that goes with freedom.

It is no accident that immediately after the ten commandments are pronounced in Yitro, we hear the detailed laws in Mishpatim about keeping a Hebrew slave. We were just slaves ourselves a few pages back. When did we contemplate the idea of owning our own slaves? The text is teaching us that even our slave fantasies are possible if we learn the deep responsibility that comes with such power.

Now that none of us are slaves and none of us own slaves, we must find the way to teach our children the complex message of Pesach by proving Shaw wrong. We do not dread the mix of freedom and responsibility – we celebrate it.

EIGHTH ANNUAL PASSOVER LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

To Our Readers

Passover comes this year at an unusually solemn time for Canadian Jews, and especially for those in Toronto.

With recent incidents of vandalism of homes and Jewish sites and clashes on campus, it has never been more important to promote the freedom that this festival is all about: the freedom to live without fear of persecution, the freedom to speak freely without fear of reprisal, the freedom to dream.

Amidst all the anxiety we have had to deal with this year, it is time to sit back, reflect and celebrate our history and heritage with renewed vigour. That heritage, of course, includes modern-day Israel with all its lively, and sometimes disturbing, contradictions. So included along with the poems and stories in our eighth annual Passover literary supplement is an essay about a book that tells the story of Tunisian women in their native land and in Israel, as well as photos depicting various aspects of Israeli life.

Thank you to all the writers who submitted their work. It is because we received many worthy submissions – some of which we were unfortunately not able to publish – that the quality of the supplement is as high as it's ever been.

During these early days of spring, as we celebrate the Festival of Spring, let's dream of a new beginning for Jews throughout the world. Chag samayach.

The Chanukah Gift

By Joan Alexander

Last night was the Chanukah party.

In the morning, Danny's mother called to say that Danny needed to stay near me. That's what his therapist said. After all, I'm his teacher. "He gets strength and security from your presence," she told me.

"Open spaces like the gym leave him without a container for his feelings. He carved a hole in the bus seat last week," she said. "Next time, he could carve a hole in me. Try."

It was late November, a general lessening of light. JFK conspiracy theories on the radio. I had been drinking my coffee. Was it a drastic oversimplification or could I blame TV and magazines for why I never felt at home in my body?

I had been thinking a Jewish girl like me used to be called zaftig, and there was nothing wrong with having hips and breasts and thighs. I was thinking of Ruth Handler, the daughter of Polish Jewish immigrants, who invented the Barbie doll. Hardly anyone ever calls me Barbie, even though my name is Barbara.

In Hawaii, I had heard that obesity was tolerated. If you go into a restaurant, the waiter will bring you two chairs. Maybe not on Maui, but on some of the other islands.

I had started telling myself jokes. Like, do you know what happens if a fat person stops eating? He starves. Ha ha. And, do you know why men don't get mad cow disease? Because they're pigs, ha ha. Ha, ha.

The teasing from the boys was the worst. You have a pretty face came later from my girlfriends and always from my mother. Around the house I was known as shayna punim.

I was worrying where I would be when the Prozac wore off because I'd gained 20 extra pounds on Prozac. I was thinking all I want is to be loved by that special someone. I was saying to myself I'd rather be a thin cow than a fat cow in Pharoah's dream.

At the school, Danny was waiting for me and he said, "Let me tell you a joke."

"OK, but hurry up. You have to help me get ready for the Chanukah party."

Danny told a joke about a boy named Trouble and his brother, Shutup. Trouble got lost, so Shutup went to look for him. A policeman asked, "What's your name?" So Shutup said, "Shutup." The policeman said, "Are you looking for trouble?" And Shutup said, "How did you know?"

A great punchline. A good joke.

Sometimes I think I'll quit therapy and become an alcoholic.

I went over the story of Chanukah with the kids. I wanted to make sure they got it right. And a king rose up and called himself Antiochus Epiphanes, which means the visible god. But the people called him Antiochus "Epimanes" because he was a madman. He prohibited the Jews from Sabbath observance: he even put a statue of Jupiter (which bore his likeness) on the altar in the Holy Temple. And the pig, the animal most abhorred by the Jews, was brought in to be sacrificed.

The kids sang: "See Me. Light Me. Watch Me. Bless Me" to the tune of Listening to You from Tommy. The parents loved it. Simon the storyteller did something with puppets. The mothers passed out dreidels and chocolate money. The music began. I was standing by the food tables when Simon came over and said, "I'm having one more latke. Did you have a taste?"

"I've had several," I said.

The band was playing the horah. Simon took my hand and we were running, one foot in front, one foot behind, kick right, kick left, run, clap, run. My breasts were flopping. I threw back my head.

"It's a party in the gym," I called to Simon above the music.

"It's Vest Side Story," Simon called back.

Later we had a few more latkes and some tabouleh, which was very good. He told me he was going to Cuba. "Havana Gila," he laughed. "Get it?"

He's funny, I thought. I like a man with a sense of humour, and his looks aren't bad either. He's older than I am and he's been married, but so what?

No one was listening to the rabbi. He was up there on stage looking a little humiliated. "Chanukah is not only a children's story," he said. "Antiochus, Haman, Chmielnicki, Hitler, Ferdinand, Stalin, Saddam Hussein! There was always a madman out to assail us. For what reason? Parents can you quiet your children? Maybe if you take away the dreidels, just until I'm finished.

A Kiss in the Dark

"Year after year we're singing the same songs. Year after year we're lighting the candles. Yes, there was a military victory, but only one jar of oil was found in the Temple. The oil should have lasted eight days, but how many days did it burn?"

"Eight days!" yelled the children.

"Not by force, but by spirit," said the rabbi. "Sh, sh, sh. So why do we celebrate Chanukah?"

"Because we get presents," shouted Rebecca Weinberg, a beautiful child, extremely intelligent.

Simon was telling me about his ex-wife, an installation artist. "In her last exhibit, she covered an entire room in a block print of ashes, in what she called a swastika/sauvistica motif. It covered all four walls."

"What's a sauvistica?" I asked.

"An inverted swastica. Supposedly the sauvistika was a life symbol before the Nazis got hold of it. Ash is carbon. A basic life compound. The whole space was filled. It was heavy. Oppressive."

"I bet," I said. "I see."

"Thanks for listening to this," Simon said. "I've been very pent up. My wife's the daughter of survivors. Of course I understood her work intellectually. But I used to leave the gallery dreaming of water lilies. When I bought a mango shake at Juice for Life, I felt guilty. She called me a coward."

I said, "It sounds like you miss her very much."

Suddenly the room, the entire gym, went completely black. Pandemonium!

"Where are the lights?" someone shouted. "Turn on the lights! Does anyone know where the lights are in this room?"

"Who has a match?" yelled another. "Get a flashlight!"

The children squealed.

Rebecca hissed, "Danny! Danny," his mother called. "Danny, where are you? Daniel!"

Then I was touched on my shoulders. Someone pulled me forward. I was kissed very gently, very lightly, very sweet. Immediately, I felt a ripple of sensation that I hadn't felt in many years.

When the lights went on, I was standing alone. Danny's mother had him by the elbow and was roughly leading him from the gym. Simon was by the stage. He didn't look at me.

"Light the Chanukah lichtlach, for God's sake," said Natie Silver's grandfather. "For God's sake, light the menorahs."

You can say what you want. A life of irony.

The firetruck burns. You can say he kissed me in the dark. A kiss is still a wonderful thing. Chekhov wrote about a kiss and so did Turgenev. You can say Simon had no right to do it, and I would agree, the evil patriarchy, blah, blah, blah. But for a brief moment, my soul lifted up.

Memories

By Mona Lynn Charendoff

Cyril J. Ross, The Seder, oil on board, 1963

My earliest memories of being with our whole family during the holidays go as far back as 1962. Just for the record, there's a photo of me and two of my cousins sitting on the laps of our bubbie and zaide. We are wearing long nightgowns and handmade hats to match. If memory serves me, my oldest cousin, Ian, is holding a Kiddush cup full of wine, his eyes at half mast, yet unwilling to go to sleep for fear of missing all the songs my parents, his parents, and all the great aunts would sing late into the night.

Those memories have remained deep inside me for more than 30 years, and yet sometimes, it's as though it were only yesterday that we were all together. Often, we'll sit and look at old photos and run our fingers every so lightly over the faces of those long gone, yet there's always a feeling of love when we hold them. And before long, the stories begin about this one and that one, my bubbie's egg plate, the bowl she used when she made her bubelach, and so on.

I have always made the holidays in my home. It's tiny, yet when everyone is gathered around the tables we push together, that warmth returns. To me, there is no greater pleasure than to see my children, my parents, my brother and his family and my sister all sitting there, yelling to each other over plates of pickles and coleslaw, matzah and chopped liver and numerous bottles of grape juice for all the younger kids.

Being a vegetarian on any Yom Tov is always a challenge, what with the chicken soup and kneidlach, the chopped liver, the briskets and turkeys and so on. But last year, I had a little "talk" with my late Bubbie, may she always rest in peace but always be at our table, and asked her to guide me through the preparation of her once-loved and never forgotten liver pudding. Many years ago, as a child, I waited with much anticipation for that moment when my aunt would bring her version of Bubbie's pudding to the crowded table. You know, if I sit here for more than two seconds, I can actually taste it! Oy, the tahm…

Now, at 45, I have my own family, a 14-year-old and a 10-year-old, both girls, and God willing, they too will continue the traditions when they are grown and have families of their own. If I'm really lucky, they'll stand at the counter with me and ask which bowl was their bubbie Fanny's, and which cups and saucers belonged to grandma Yetta. "Is this gravy boat daddy's bubbie Mendel's?" and "Which dish was Auntie Sadie's?"

But I'll continue watching the one thing that embraces my heart more than anyone could ever imagine. Long after everyone's gone home, I sit there and watch the candles burn until the last flicker goes out, and as the room begins to fill with darkness, I say my private "I love yous" to the people long gone who spent Yom Tov with us at the table with their children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Broken Promises

By Lainie Cohen

It wasn't like I was planning to hide. They just didn't notice me when I came upstairs for something to drink. My aunts were talking and I knew not to interrupt grownups, so at first I just stood in the hallway. Aunt Lily sat upright in the wooden chair with the needlepoint seat, her back to me. Beside her, Aunt Sarah sounded ghostly from the depths of the blue-velvet wing chair.

"Such a shame," she said. Her words drew me closer. The noise from my cousins and two younger brothers playing in the basement muffled my footsteps.

"Well, it's for the best, I think," Aunt Lily said. "Maurice said the baby was so tiny. Probably would have been sickly all his life."

"But without circumcision, he can't even have a proper funeral. And there's no shivah. How will Leona take it?"

"She has three other children to think about. Seems to me, she's been spared a huge burden. It's for the best, I tell you."

When I leapt out from behind Aunt Sarah's chair, she gasped.

"If the baby died, I'm glad it was a boy," I said.

Shaking her finger, Aunt Lily scolded me like one of her misbehaving students. "What a wicked thing to say."

I turned and raced down the stairs, ignoring the drink I wanted. My heart pounded as fast as if I'd just run all the way home from school to escape the bully who pushed girls into snow banks. Bursting with the news, all I could say was, "It's not fair! I wanted a sister."

Just the other month I found a surprise in our house – a new clothes cupboard built in the corner of our front room. I loved that room, empty except for the grass-green carpet that felt like the lawn outside, but without the tickly feeling when you lie on it. Mommy said it was going to be my new room when the baby was born. I wouldn't have to share one with Peter anymore.

"I bet it's a girl," I said, hugging Mommy's big belly. "I really want a sister."

"A girl would be nice, but boys are nice too."

"We already have two boys. Don't need any more."

When Daddy arrived at Aunt Sarah's to take us home, brown pouches hung under his eyes and his face was all scratchy when I hugged him. We three kids sat in the back of the car, not squabbling. I wondered if God knew I didn't want another brother.

Mommy had to stay in the hospital for another three weeks and when she came home, my new cupboard was gone. Later, my parents ordered a teak dining room set and we started eating our Shabbat meals there instead of in the kitchen.

Grownups aren't always right. Aunt Lily said, "It was all for the best," but I still had to share a room with Peter.

Bridging a Gap

By Lee Dickman

The rabbi dropped in unannounced. His mobile caravan found Gerry and me, the only two Jews in a field company of South African engineers, high in the snows of the Apennines one mid-December afternoon during World War II.

It was not the first chaplains' visit we'd had – over the months, every so often we'd been gathered together to attend a Christian service, inevitably followed by the programmed "common touch," when the chaplain would later, without badges of rank, join us for a meal that suddenly included tasty additional items that we hadn't seen in months.

When we were in Egypt, we weren't very far from our roots. There, I visited the remains of the site of Pithom, the treasure city built by the Jewish slaves, and, reputedly, the place the Exodus began. It was near the present-day city of Ismailia, with its "Sweetwater Canal" and the smell, and the meagre, pitiful markings of this mud-baked enclosure were unimpressive in the extreme. In Cairo, I joined a guided tour of the synagogues. Again, I felt no meaningful association. The sites were ill-kept and unremarkable. Even the 10th-century Ben Ezrah synagogue, a squat, rectangular building sadly in need of repair, raised no deep feelings, despite its long history.

Lee Dickman, 1940

It was only when I was invited, through Smuts House, the South African military social centre, to sit at the seder table in a Jewish Egyptian home that my feelings stirred. The Haggadah was different, the Sephardi pronunciation strange to my ears, but the story was the same, and the whole service achingly familiar. My host, a librarian, was a mine of information, and from him I learned the real history of the Jewish presence in Egypt. The Ben Ezrah synagogue came alive in his words: here Maimonides worshipped, here Solomon Schechter opened the underground genizah, where ancient documents bearing the name of God were ritually and respectfully buried, including originals penned by the hand of Joseph Caro and Judah Halevi. There was even a cry from the past, a plea by a rabbi for escape from the advancing Crusaders. The host spoke of throwing a doll into the Nile on Sham el Nissin, a rite stemming from pharaonic days (at that time a live girl was thrown into the river) while his wife laughingly told us we were spared the eating of the "fikisch," the sun-dried salted fish, that normally accompanied this festival. "Too many cases of food-poisoning," she explained.

In Italy, however, reminders of our Jewish heritage were few and far between. Southern Italy and Sicily had been under Spanish rule during the time of Isabella, and the expulsion of Jews under her edict applied equally in those places as it did in Spain itself. Only in some small towns did we find reminders of a Jewish presence dating back to the 14th century in streets still called "Via di sinagoga" or areas called "Judacca."

As we clawed our way north in an Italy ripped apart by war, we were greeted by bewildered rural people in village after village. In the valleys, more often than not, a river divided these small communities, and the retreating army had destroyed the only bridge. We gained considerable satisfaction when our Bailey bridge closed the gap and, after our tanks rumbled over, we saw the outstretched arms of reunited people streaming across in hesitant, restored joy.

We were in winter billets when the rabbi arrived, and in the mess tent that evening, Mac asked us if there would be a service the next day – everyone would relish a break from the repetitive cleaning and maintenance of equipment that inevitably occupied our days in the relative inactivity of the winter months.

Gerry and I were surprised that it was Mac who asked. He was a tall, stringy fellow-NCO, and our greatest tormentor. He always found the cruel, racist remark that brought a sally of laughter from his little cohort of sycophants – the first to taunt us with stereotyped comments, the last to let an awkward situation die. Gerry and I had long before decided that we would only talk about our religion and about who we were to those who wanted to listen, and that we would ignore bigots like Mac – far better to conduct ourselves as good people than to become involved in rancorous argument. The incidents had grown far less frequent, and, in fact, almost jocular, although the occasional episode still hurt.

"No minyan, no service," we explained that night. "Our faith requires a minimum of 10 men for a service, but we will meet with the rabbi tonight in his caravan."

"Why 10?" asked another man, genuinely interested.

"Minyan comes from a Hebrew root word meaning to number or to count," I said. "If we rely on the biblical version, we see from the story of Abraham and Sodom in Genesis that Abraham begs God to save the city. He says: "If there are 50 righteous people, will You save the city?" and God says, "Yes." But Abraham can't find 50 righteous people in Sodom. He then asks, "If there are 40 and five?, 40?, 30?" to all of which God says "Yes," and Abraham keeps lowering the number, until he reaches 10.

"If there are 10 righteous people; will You save the city?" and God says "Yes." Abraham stops. Even he knows that if there aren't 10 righteous people in a community, it cannot be saved."

"A more practical reason," I continued, "appears to be that since the Jews were a scattered, nomadic community, the need to find 10 adult Jews obliged individual tribes to seek out kindred souls on important occasions and so maintain contact."

While I was explaining this, I noticed that Mac sat very quietly, concentrating.

Later that evening, as we sat with the rabbi, we were interrupted by a knock on the door. Outside in the snow stood Mac, with a bunch of his buddies behind him.

"We are not Jewish, but we are seven adult men," he said. "Would you accept us to make up your minyan?"

The rabbi gladly ushered them in. It was the eve of Chanukah, and, in a warm communion, the age-old oft-repeated story of the miraculous rededication of the defiled Temple in Jerusalem was told once more to a rapt audience.

The Jewel Box

By Marlene Eisner

Susan strolled down Decarie Boulevard. Much had changed in the 25 years since she had been home. Still, the roar of the expressway was the same; perhaps even louder now than in 1976, when fewer families had more than one car. Some of the storefronts were the same, too: the Laurentian Bank, and Snowdon Deli, the Jewish Delicatessen down near the corner at Isabella.

But the majestic movie house grandly named Snowdon Theatre, although still boasting its Art Deco marquee, was now a gymnastics school run by the city. Gone too were Pumpernick's, the late-night strawberry cheesecake and coffee place frequented by the locals, and Levine Brothers bakery, whose rich, steamy aromas of fresh-baked challah, cheese bagels and Danish rings were forever lost to the stink of urban expansion.

As she reached halfway down the long block, Susan stopped in front of a Russian bookstore. She gazed into the large, plate-glass window at the books and newspapers, paraphernalia from a place where more than 30,000 of its natives had immigrated to Montreal, many of them claiming a Jewish heritage. Idly, she fingered the gold chain around her neck. Its smooth, cool texture brought her back to another time when she had stood exactly as she was standing now. But back then, she had been staring into the window of a small store called the Jewel Box.

It was 1974. Her hair was very long, dark brown curls cascading down her back. The fashion was low-cut, bell-bottom jeans and tight little T-shirts, styles that Susan embraced along with the times. In the pocket of her jeans was stuffed a roll of bills; ones, fives and tens adding up to a grand sum of $35, a fortune in those days. It had taken her months to save for her mother's 50th birthday. She had spent the last few weeks looking for a present but had come up empty.

It was May 28, a day before the big event. Desperate, she had wandered the streets of Snowdon, checking and rechecking in all the stores in the hope of finding the perfect gift. After a whole afternoon of searching, she had ended up in front of the Jewel Box, a tiny little square of a store she had passed dozens of times without a glance. How could she possibly afford jewelry? Plus, the owner of the place scared her, a tall, thin, serious-looking man who never smiled.

But the late-day sun glinting off the treasures in the window had drawn her attention. Although the display was sparse in its contents – a few rings, an ornate silver seder plate, silver candle sticks and some watches – a thin gold necklace stretched lazily on its black velvet bed had caught her eye.

Susan gazed into the dim interior of the store. Hardly a light was on, but she could see where he stood, the man, as still as stone in the far corner, gazing right back at her. How could she possibly go in? She was certain he would send her back out again. She was a long-haired teenager in ratty jeans, the kind of kid so many adults judged before even saying hello. But the lure of the necklace pushed her hand to the doorknob. She stepped out of the light and into the gloomy interior of the store.

It was about the size of her bedroom at home, a small square box. The wall to the left of her was covered with faded pink and gold-striped wallpaper. To her right, a long, glass display case ran the length of the store and then curved to the left. The case was filled with jewelry, as well as various pieces of Judaica – ancient-looking menorahs, spice boxes and silver seder cups. On the wall behind the counter was a large mirror, giving the illusion of more space. At the far end of the store where the owner stood, a rich, burgundy curtain covered an opening that led to another room, and to the right of that, where the counter continued, was a cash register and a telephone.

"Yes, young lady, may I help you?"

The man's voice was soft, barely over a whisper. He spoke with a thick Yiddish accent. Susan, not sure she heard correctly, instinctively answered back in Yiddish.

"Can you help me? Yes. The gold necklace in the window, how much is it?"

A smile, a very small smile, tickled the old man's lips.

"Do redst Yiddish?"

"Ya, ich red Yiddish."

A Story of Love

"What's your name?" he asked, walking past her to the display window. He took a key from the depths of his pants pocket, a small, gold key, and fit it into the window's lock. Sliding back the pane of glass, he reached in and lifted the necklace off the black satin.

"Saura Rifka," answered Susan, giving the Yiddish translations of her first and middle names.

"I am Mr. Samuels," said the man, walking back to her, the necklace dangling gently between his fingers. He had a long, solemn-looking face, with a prominent nose on which sat thick black glasses.

"So, why do you want this necklace?" he asked.

"I need to know the price," said Susan, her eyes hypnotized by the gentle swaying of the gold.

"Price, schmice," said Mr. Samuels, giving her a dismissive wave. "Some things have no price. Who is the necklace for?"

Susan felt the heat of the sun through the window. Why didn't he just tell her the price so she could know if she could afford it?

"My mother. It's for my mother's 50th birthday," she said, impatiently.

The old man nodded.

"Ah yes, such a beautiful necklace for a mother."

He paused for a moment, as if thinking, and then said,

"Listen Saura Rifka, I will tell you a story. A story about love, yes? Then you will buy the necklace."

Susan groaned inwardly. Just what she needed. A story. About love. She didn't have time for this.

"Well, I…"

"Ich vais nisht, it's nothing, I know, you're in a rush. But it will just take a few minutes. Listen."

Susan shifted her weight from one leg to the other. The gold necklace swayed like a dancing woman in the man's fingers. She waited for him to start.

"Once, a long time ago, I was a young boy, around your age. I lived in a town in Poland, the name is not important now, you know? It was a small town, with not so many people, and we all knew from each other. There I loved a young girl. Her name was Rochel. She was 14 and had beautiful long hair, reddish brown and curly like yours. She loved me too, and soon we knew we would get married.

"But then the war broke out. We went to Warsaw and were in the ghetto. Things were bad. I was sent to Russia. My Rochella, she escaped the ghetto with her sister and her sister's husband, but I never saw her. In Russia, I worked hard labour, always thinking about my beautiful Rochel.

"And then it was over, the war. What was I to do? Where could I go? I wandered around collecting things, you know, some of value that had been left behind, or hidden, and I sold them. The Policia, they threw me in jail, and then they let me out, but I continued what I was doing. I had to eat, no?

"One day, a man comes to me. 'Are you Shimshon Samuels?' he asks. What do I say? I do not know this man and maybe he has in his mind to do me some harm. So I do not answer, but he does not give up. He says, 'There is a young woman who has travelled far to find you. She paid me to ask if it is really you, so, I ask you again, 'Are you Shimshon Samuels?'"

The old man paused. The gold from the necklace shimmered in a ray of light from the window.

"What did you say?" asked Susan.

"What could I say? I said, 'Yes, I am Shimshon Samuels.' And he brings to me my Rochella. Could I believe my eyes? My beauty, so skinny, just bones she was, her beautiful brown hair short and thin, snow white from the years of hiding on farms and fields, freezing in the cold. Could I believe she was not dead like so many others? How could it be that such a girl could ride the train from Poland to Russia with no money in her pockets to follow a story she heard that I was alive? What devil was playing this trick on me, I thought?

"But it was so. Yes, Saura Rifka, it was my little Rochel, right there with me. No one else was left, you see, yet we were together. Everyone was lost: my mother, her mother, dead. But we had each other, you see Saura Rifka? Like a gift. So, we travelled to Germany, to a displacement camp, and we got married. We had a little boy. And then we came here and we had another boy and then a girl."

The Perfect Gift – On Special

Mr. Samuels stopped. Somewhere during the story he had switched from Yiddish to his broken English.

"And then what," asked Susan, the gold necklace forgotten.

Mr. Samuels spread his arms and looked around.

"And then I opened the Jewel Box…," he said, his sentence interrupted by the rattling of the doorknob. A short, stocky, balding man in white linen pants, a white dress shirt and a light blue tie pushed open the door, letting in a flood of sunlight.

"Shimshon, vus maschte?" bellowed the man in Yiddish.

"Hershel, fermacht der teer," said Mr. Samuels, his hand shielding his eyes from the sun's glare.

Susan watched the two men, and knew immediately that they were old friends. She wondered if they had known each other in Poland.

"Hershel, I want you to meet my new friend, Saura Rifka. Saura, this is my friend, Mr. Levine."

Susan gave a shy smile and shook Mr. Levine's hand.

"Such a pretty maydella," cried Mr. Levine, his loud voice reverberating against the walls.

"Saura wants to buy this gold necklace for her mother. She wants to know the price," said Mr. Samuels softly.

"Ah yes, the price," said Mr. Levine, nodding.

"That's a tricky thing. But a gift for a mother…"

The two men stood looking at each other, Mr. Samuels on one side of the counter, the gold necklace still hanging from his fingers, and Mr. Levine standing closely beside Susan. And then Mr. Samuels said, "So nu? How much do you have to spend, Saura?"

Susan lowered her eyes, embarrassed.

"Thirty-five," she mumbled, the excitement of the story replaced by the certainty that she would leave empty handed.

"Nu shoine, that's good, no? The necklace, it's on special, yes? For you, $30."

Fifteen minutes later, Susan was back in the sunshine, the gold necklace nestled safely in a blue box in the pocket of her jeans. She had never gone back to the Jewel Box or seen Mr. Samuels again, but she had always remembered his story and his kindness.

Two years later, her family moved to Toronto. In her second year of university, Susan's mother was diagnosed with ovarian cancer. After she died, Susan found the necklace in the blue box at the back of her mother's drawer.

Now, as she walked down Decarie, she felt it on her neck, its cool metal like gentle fingers on her flesh.

Road to the Beloved

By Ruth Bernard

Even amid congregation in prayer I cannot find you
So fickle is my attention.
Words read slowly my Hebrew not fluent
I fall behind as others race through the Amidah
I am taken up with the struggle form now a prison; I cannot reach the sacred sphere.

Then I see a man at furthest corner chapel.
Wrapped in Tallit, face hidden in the holy shawl.
A vertical rod absorbed in the ancient prayer gripped by closeness to God's awesome presence.
The world stops for that instant for the devoted seeker and I become the witness to this merging.

In the sleepless night that follows thrashing on my bed in lonely battle suddenly I see him, the man stretched to heaven.
The vision a reality of now beckons me from my cot
I utter words of gratitude and love to the Beloved and ask for blessings for the man sincere in prayer innocent of knowledge of his part in my finding You, My God, in my restless hours.

Parents chime, "We're here" and we buzz them up.
The rooms are shiny apples, the table
a bounty of wedding gifts.
They munch between naches-nods
then the moms slot into the galley kitchen.
"I'll wash, your mum'll dry," mother-in-law directs.
I toss scraps into the trash. Dishes done she winks, "Hal needs his sleep," rustles the trio to the door.
In a huddle they're gone,
with a knock they're back.
"My ring, I took it off."
She runs into the kitchen, out again.
"Left it in a napkin."
I groan, Hal leaps.
In the basement he wades through debris, mines for diamonds. He comes up empty.
She shrugs,
says, "Insurance" and kisses cheeks good night.

Silken bolts anchor you, keep you from flight. Too much earth, too little air for feathers curled along your spine,

The Gift of Shannon

We bend through the wooded path, fingers entwined. Shannon leads.

She points out the age of tree stumps, takes me on a tour of her room –

bunk beds, books stacked on the floor, dresser speckled with butterfly clips.

I sit (as told) on her bed and her hands flit over my hair weaving a crown:

pastel butterflies. Then dinner.
Shannon blows my lasagna, admonishes me, "Drink milk," puts watermelon on my plate and cherries plucked from her tart. Aladdin ends.

She skips to her room, emerges solemn in patterned pajamas. After a kiss she takes wonder to sleep.

How to Make Aunt Lily's Very Berry Cake

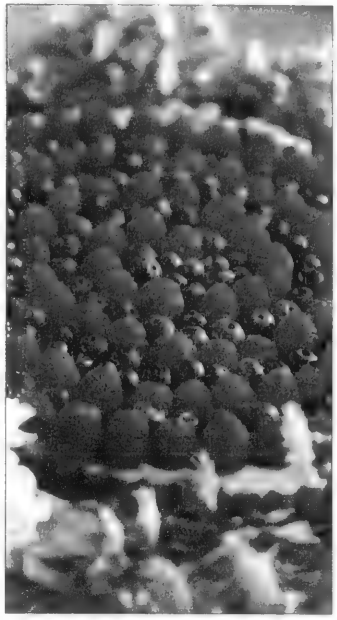
In our 2002 Passover literary supplement, we published the story Confessions of a Failed Kreplach Maker by April Shour Laufer. The following story is part 2 of her "true confessions."

By April Shour Laufer

I hope that I have been forgiven for not ever making Bubbie Annie's kreplach. I had thought that if I watched Bubbie Annie prepare them, I would learn the secret of how to do it. Bubbie Annie's kreplach are light, perfectly sculpted dumplings filled with either beef or chicken and adored by her children, grandchildren, nieces and nephews.

When she invited me to come and watch her make these tasty delights, I was looking forward to getting the recipe. I had no idea that by the time I arrived at our agreed upon time of 11 a.m., she would have already spent five hours getting things ready. When I walked into her kitchen, the meat was all prepared and set aside in a bowl, she was carefully kneading the dough and there was a huge pot of boiling water on the stove. She had made 150 of them already.

It wasn't for lack of pen and paper that I never got the recipe quite right. Zaidie Sam had happily given me both. My mistake was that I asked too many questions. What I really should have done is just watched. Instead, I bothered Bubbie Annie with how much of this and how much of that. Bubbie Annie's recipe included ½ glass of water, and three handfuls of flour. It seemed logical to me at the time to ask her exactly how much ½ glass of water or three handfuls of flour actually measured? I watched as she stopped her cooking and spent a nervous 10 minutes trying to find a measuring cup so she could take the glass of water, pour it into the measuring cup and tell me it was almost an eight-ounce measuring cup. As I watched her perspire, I didn't dare ask how much three handfuls of flour actually measured. It was no wonder that by the time I left, I had pieces of paper with scribbles and arrows that defied transcribing and Annie was exhausted from my cross-examination.



Aunt Lily's very berry cake

After about two months, Zaidie Sam stopped teasing me about when he would get to taste my kreplach. When the next yom tov came, Bubbie Annie very kindly made me 50 lovingly prepared, delicious, chicken kreplach without any questions. I accepted all of Bubbie Annie's dishes. I didn't ask for recipes. I didn't ask anything. I smiled and said thank you. I gave Bubbie Annie a kiss on the cheek.

Bubbie Annie always prepares for yom tov at least a month in advance, so I thought I would do the same this year. I decided to get reacquainted with some of my cookbooks and maybe make a few cakes for Rosh Hashanah. I wasn't even going to attempt to make honey cakes since my girlfriend makes simply fabulous honey cakes and always includes me in her baking schedule. Nor was I thinking of the ones that Aunt Chofsha makes, those absolutely gorgeous chiffon cakes that stand as tall as the CN tower. No, I would make those simple ones, the ones with one or two eggs that you put in a nine-by-nine pan, or maybe, for variety, I would use a loaf pan.

And so I began experimenting. I took out my favourite cookbook, wiped away some of the grease marks and unstuck a few of the pages. I had, once upon a time, checked off the recipes that I liked. I changed them a little and made sure that each cake was pareve. I experimented with toppings and mixed and matched different ingredients to sprinkle over the batter. I made 12.

One night when we were invited for dinner, I presented one my cakes to Bubbie Annie and Zaidie Sam. "This is good," Zaidie Sam intoned. Bubbie Annie only let him have a little piece because he had to be careful because of his sugar.

"But it's not too sweet," he pleaded.

"I did cut back on the amount of sugar," though I acknowledged the topping of brown sugar, cinnamon and nuts was probably not on his scheduled diet. Bubbie Annie took a second piece, and to Aunt Chofsha, who also happened to be there, she started to speculate how she might change the recipe and try a different topping.

'But What About the Berries?'

It seemed to me I was finally on the right track. My cake was a success, but more importantly, I knew what Bubbie Annie was talking about! I knew how to rearrange and change and interchange ingredients. In Hebrew there is an expression, na'ase v'nishma, which means you do the thing and then you understand. It was clear to me that if I wanted to learn how to make Bubbie Annie's kreplach, I would simply have to do it and then I would learn how. But I also knew that a six- to eight-hour marathon of making kreplach was not in the cards.

I would like to state in my defence that I was on a bit of a high. I had experimented with making my simple one-egg cakes and been mostly successful. I had impressed Bubbie Annie and Zaidie Sam with my effort: it was certainly good enough to eat. (That was huge. Bubbie Annie and Zaidie Sam were not exactly slouches in the pastry department either.)

However, just because I had one success, I know I shouldn't have let it go to my head. When we invited Aunt Lily for dinner a few weeks later and she brought her famous "very berry cake," I had no intention of asking her if I could come over and watch her make it. Instead, I called her up.

"Auntie Lily, hi it's Judy." I almost never call her up. It's usually Jeff, my husband, her nephew, who calls.

"Who?" she asked. Aunt Lily is a bit hard of hearing. I tried to make my voice louder without actually yelling.

"It's Judy," I tried again. "You know, Jeff and Judy."

"I'm sorry," she replied a bit mournfully. "Who is it?"

This was a familiar routine for me. A month ago, I called up my 93-year-old grandfather in Montreal and tried to say hi, but he hung up on me because he didn't recognize my voice. I think I have a high pitch or something. Anyway, he told me he doesn't talk to strangers.

"It's Judy," I said, trying to lower the pitch of my voice.

"Oh, Judy, how are you? I'm sorry I can't hear so well today."

"That's okay," I replied a few decibels louder than I normally speak.

"Everyone loved your cake so much I was wondering if I could get the recipe from you." I was sitting in front of the computer, my fingers at the ready.

"You liked my cake?" she asked.

"Yes," I replied. "Can I get the recipe?"

"Sure," she said. "Just one minute."

I assumed that she was going to look it up in her recipe file but it occurred to me that she had probably just switched the phone to her better ear because she continued with barely a pause.

"I'll speak slowly," she said, "so you can write it down."

"Okay," I replied a little nervously. What if she was going to recite the recipe from memory? Would she know how much of each ingredient? No matter that I had made my 12 cakes I still had to use my recipe book before I attempted anything. Should I have asked her to write it out for me?

I was determined that I would not make this difficult for her. With a small niggling sense of uncertainty and an inward sigh, I said, "I'm ready."

"Do you have a piece of paper?" she asked.

"I'm ready," I repeated, my hands poised above my computer keyboard.

I don't know what I expected. I did experience a little tremor when she told me that I needed three large spoons of fruit juice. Fruit juice? Three large spoons? I didn't ask what kind of juice. I didn't ask if she meant a tablespoon. I dutifully typed, "3 large spoons of fruit juice."

The rest of the recipe proceeded uneventfully. But after she finished, it occurred to me that she hadn't said what order the ingredients should be mixed, and there was no mention of berries.

"Auntie Lily," I said, keeping my voice loud and hoping it didn't sound like a complaint, "what about the berries?"

"Oh yes," she said. "You add the berries on top."

I was sure that there were both blueberries and cranberries that performed this most delightful explosion in my mouth when I took a bite of her cake. I hesitated a little. For a moment I was caught between wanting the recipe and worrying that I might stress her with too many questions. I opted for wanting the recipe and asked, "Don't you use cranberries?"

"Blackberries, blueberries, cranberries. Any berries will do," she said.

She didn't sound too stressed. I thought it went okay.

"Thank you so much," I said keeping my voice as loud as I could.

"You're welcome. Enjoy." And she hung up the phone.

I looked at what I had typed. I did some rearranging and ordering of the ingredients, guessed that a big spoon meant a tablespoon, that maybe she added a cup of berries, and I found I had a recipe for "Auntie Lily's very berry cake."

I went to the kitchen to try it.

An hour and a half later I took it out of the oven.

It didn't look at all like Aunt Lily's cake. Aunt Lily's cake had this lattice-like look to it with the berries just peeking out from underneath the top of the cake. My berries were definitely sitting on top of the cake and some of my frozen cranberries had exploded. Jeff and I studied the cake for several long minutes. As we watched, some of the berries sank into the cake leaving behind holes.

Sutton Group Admiral's sales force continues spectacular growth

In the past two years, this "little company that grew" has seen its sales force swell by more than 40%, to over 160 salespeople and counting! Now in its 12th year, the firm continues to be a magnet for top agents looking to increase their bottom line. With maximum opportunity and minimum hassle, it's not hard to see why.

Murray Goldkind

Toronto real estate Brokers Sol & Murray Goldkind now spend much of their time interviewing these prospective new team members.

"What an agent really wants most is to affiliate with the right company and sell as much real estate as they can with the fewest headaches possible. Every top agent we talk to is interested in one thing: making more money. But they also want their independence," says Murray.

According to the Goldkinds, top agents are now looking for service-oriented environments without the rigid structure of yesteryear — exactly the kind of productive atmosphere the Goldkinds see themselves providing.

Many agents like the idea of being productive without having to be in the office every day. When they are in the office, agents with Sutton Group Admiral all have access to the latest computer facilities, and enjoy full use of the latest in personal marketing and career management software. Sutton Group

"Fee for services" concept

Admiral uses a "fee-for-service" concept, which lets agents pick and choose the services they want. In this way there are never any hidden costs passed on to an agent, nor are agents ever penalized by waste generated by others. In other words, each agent, acting as his or her own businessperson, enjoys the benefit of controlling their income and their expenses. "In the old days, top agents concentrated nearly exclusively on their income, but today the smart agents are looking just as strongly at their bottom line," says Murray.

The Sutton Group Admiral advantage offers a serious real estate agent the best of all worlds. More money in their pocket, freedom to operate at their own level, flexibility in business planning, and access to tools and services. Says Sol, "timing isn't everything, it's just 98%, and as timing goes we are comfortable that we have the concept agents are looking for both now and in the future."

Sol Goldkind

The agents and brokers of Sutton Group Admiral Realty wish you a very Happy, Healthy, and Peaceful Passover

Persimmons

By Donia Blumenfeld Clenman

I loved you
ere I knew you.
The riches of Araby,
the enchantment of Eden.
Magic in a sinuous, lilting sound.

Then I found you in Israel abundant on grocery shelves, sprawled in supermarket bins.
Rising suns, harvest moons, too casual, too prolific for magic.

I tried to dissolve the shelves, separate you from onions and cabbages,
invoke mythologies,
rose-apple of the First Garden.
Carefully I bit into your ripeness, moist, meaty, mellow –
a rich meal, a feast of sun's condensed nectar.

Unlike old clime apples and pears you do not deceive with your brazen wrapping.
I marvel at your honesty –
even your outstretched glows and I cup it – a golden chalice.

But wedged into my mind, persistent,
were onions and leeks,
carrots and cabbages –
colliding illusions.
Till wise with distance
I placed you on a Canadian table, and gazing into your Carmel heart heard the returning footsteps of sweet mythologies.

'It Doesn't Look At All Like Her Cake'

"It doesn't look at all like Auntie Lily's cake," I moaned.

"It probably tastes okay," Jeff said helpfully as he cut himself a piece and then put it down on the table because it was still too hot. In the course of a week, the cake had gratefully disappeared, and Jeff insisted that though it might not look like his aunt's, it still tasted good. I accepted his comments with some skepticism and a little frustration because my cake was at best a weak variation of Aunt Lily's cake.

I thought about calling up Aunt Lily to ask what I had done wrong, but I wasn't sure what I would I say: "What do you mean you just throw the berries on the top?" Or "What is the exact measurement of your large spoon?"

When Aunt Lily visited again a few weeks later, she brought her wonderful frozen lemon cake. For the briefest moment as I put the cake in the freezer, I thought it would be nice to have Aunt Lily's frozen lemon cake recipe, but as I closed the freezer door I made a decision.

I would not ask Aunt Lily for the recipe. I would have to find my own signature cake, the thing that everyone would say oh I'd love to have Judy's recipe for... But I figure I have to put in at least another 20 years in the kitchen to discover what that might be.

Passover Greetings

The Incident

By David Reich

In Poland, in the spring of 1941, something happened that did not change history and had no significant consequences.

The story is simple.

A peasant had one cow and four pigs. The livestock, and what he could raise on a hectare of muddy soil, was enough to sustain him. It had been enough even when he had a wife and two sons. But his wife died, and his older son left to seek a cleaner and less backbreaking future in a city, while the younger son disappeared into the army. There had been no word from him since the Wehrmacht poured over the frontier, its bombers and tanks decimating the proud cavalry and the jauntily dressed, but ill-armed, infantry.

The peasant's village, close to the German border, had been razed by incendiary bombs and quickly overrun, but his plot of land was remote from that small hamlet. The stable, housing his animals and two rooms for himself, was untouched. Life went on, undisturbed, unchanged.

Germans were not strangers to him. His proximity to the border allowed him to sell them cabbages, potatoes and onions. They despised him, but could bring themselves to pay his low prices. Although uneducated, the peasant spoke sufficient German, Ukrainian and local dialects useful for survival – even a little Yiddish to Jewish peddlers who visited his plot with their wagon every season. They sold necessities – cloth, leather, utensils – that he could fashion to his needs.

These peddlers were strange to him, with their untrimmed beards, covered heads and black gabardine cloaks alive with dangling fringes. The men rocked back and forth as they uttered prayers at dawn and sunset, blessing their God before and after eating, drinking or washing.

"They must be very holy," the peasant thought. "Someone must be listening to their mystical jargon."

The few times he attended church he had heard they had crucified the Saviour. It bewildered him. He could not visualize these peaceable folk driving spikes through human limbs, and he paid it no mind. They were honest and respectful, unlike the local tradesmen who disdained him as an illiterate serf.

It was evening. He lit his oil lamp and inspected the stable, verifying that he had enough swill, fodder, and water for the night. He crossed the straw covered floor to enter his rooms. A thin leg protruded from under a bale of hay, skin tightly stretched over a pipestem of bone, the foot wrapped in torn cloth. He reached for a rake and quickly exposed two emaciated children. They shivered in the flickering light of his lamp.

He spoke slowly, as one used to talking to animals.

"Who are you? What are you doing here? Where are you from?"

The children hesitated. One spoke. "We are refugees." He named a town many kilometres away.

"You can't be more than eight years old. What are you be running from?"

"We are twins. Twelve years of age. Our family was taken from our village in a cattle car. We were separated from our parents."

"Where are your parents?"

The twins looked at each other. One pointed skyward. "They were sent to a special barracks to be cleansed. But we heard stories from others, and knew they were gone forever."

"Why did the same not happen to you?"

"We were taken to a doctor. He asked if we were twins. 'Yes,' we answered. He looked pleased. 'Twins are scarce,' he said. 'Our hospital needs them for research for the good of our race, for mankind. You will stay with me.' We were locked in a room. Nurses examined us, asked questions, gave us pills. We didn't swallow them. It was hot. A window was left open. We slipped out. A laundry truck was parked nearby, and we hid under a load of sheets stained with blood, medication and excrement. We were driven through the camp gates, and jumped off the truck when it slowed. We have been three weeks walking and hiding. We must not be seen. It will mean death."

"Why?" The peasant had never been informed of higher principles that govern the world.

"We are Jews. Escaped Jews are killed on the spot. Anyone who helps them is killed."

The peasant looked at their starved bodies. "Can you work?"

"We can do anything."

"Then stay with me. There are potatoes, cabbages, and onions enough for all. Even an apple tree behind the stable. As you see, I am poor, with little to offer. But I will teach you to grow my crops – you will teach me to read. No one need know you are here."

The twins looked at each other. They had no place to go, nothing to return to. Death lurked outside. Besides, the peasant seemed decent and kind, and the stable was warm. "We will stay, gladly. Thank you."

There Was No Warning

Before their arrival, the peasant was not used to chatter. Cows and pigs listened well, but contributed little to conversation. Now the stable became alive with the music of children's voices. Evenings they sat around the table, sipping warm milk, chewing homemade bread, exchanging stories from their past, and hopes for their future.

The peasant told them, "I once had a wife and sons, but God saw fit to take them from me. There was laughter in the house, joy in the work. Until you came, I didn't notice how empty it had become. Your bad luck has brought life back to me."

Months went by. The children glowed in the sun, filled out with the farm's simple but ample nourishment. They milked the cow, fed the pigs, cleaned the slop. They played, brought flowers to decorate the table, cleaned the two rooms down to bare wood and swept the dirt floor smooth. They made a home. Life was good, except for the awful memory of smoke belching from barrack chimneys.

The cold winter gave way to a warm, wet spring. No threats materialized, but the twins and the peasant remained aware of danger. When the rare traveller was seen on the muddy road that passed by the farm, the children hid in the fields or the forest. Sometimes army trucks, even tanks, rolled by, but no attention was paid to their hovel. It looked like what it was – a ramshackle home for a peasant, a cow, and four pigs. What aroused suspicion was never known – perhaps the sight of two dark-haired children working in a cabbage patch, or leading a cow to a field, or carrying wood from the forest.

There was no warning. One cloud-darkened dawn, a squad of motorcycles arrived at the door, driven by helmeted soldiers in black uniforms with lightning bolts emblazoned on their sleeves. The captain gave an order.

"Corporal, go inside. See if vermin are hiding there."

The corporal had just joined the battalion, and this was his first action. His uniform was freshly creased, his leather holster newly polished.

He had worked his father's farm, loved the dark, moist soil at seeding, the thick, heavy crops at harvesting. He especially loved the animals. He could never bring himself to kill one – it was like shedding his own blood.

Passover Greetings

'They Are Mine. My Children'

Those were hard times in Germany. Inflation had wiped out savings, markets were closed, riots disrupted the government. All was chaos. The corporal fell under the spell of his country's new leader. The Fuehrer's fevered oratory blasted through the farmhouse kitchen radio, and his literature littered the sitting room.

As a teenager, he had attended National Socialist rallies, and was awed by the massed flags with crooked crosses and the fanaticism of National Socialists who flourished them. He joined in their stiff-armed salutes and rhythmic chants of dedication, almost worship. He explained his country's crisis to his parents. The Fatherland was exploited by Jews, dominated by decadent western countries and threatened by Bolsheviks. These enemies had to be dealt with. Vast lands to the east inhabited by Slavs contained labour and resources necessary for Aryan living space. It was very clear. Even a simple farmer should understand that.

His aging father, a veteran of the Great War, a victim of jingoistic eloquence, had marched enthusiastically to the trenches in 1914 and trudged home disillusioned after four years of pointless slaughter.

> Now he approached the stable. He would confront the enemy who threatened the Reich.

Now he oscillated slowly in his rocker, "We shall see, we shall see," he muttered.

At 18, the lad enlisted in the SS. At a ceremony attended by the Fuehrer himself, he swore a sacred oath of unconditional obedience to the Fatherland, and to its leaders. He was soon promoted to corporal because of proficiency with weapons, mastery of the motorcycle and enthusiastic endorsement of Aryan superiority. The world lay open before him.

Now he approached the stable. He would confront the enemy who threatened the Reich.

He rapped sharply on the door. It was opened by a peasant whose stooped shoulders, earned by a lifetime of bending over a plow or shovel, reminded him of his father.

The corporal questioned. "Who are you, and who are these children?"

The peasant gave his name. "This is my land. It was my father's, and his before him. And these are my children." Yet the peasant's flaxen hair and blue eyes contrasted sharply with the black hair and brown eyes of the children.

"Show me your arms."

The children, pale with fright, extended their arms. Blue tattooed numbers stood out. The corporal turned to the peasant.

"Listen to me. Before I was a soldier, I was a farmer. I understand what it is to work the land. It's a poor living. Crops fail, animals sicken. Workers leave and cannot be replaced at harvest. And if people arrive who are able, it is easy to not ask questions, to not know who they are. But we both know. They are escapees – enemies of our Folk. They cannot be saved. You can. I ask you again. Who are these children?"

"They are mine. My children."

"Please. You leave me no choice. I beg you, think again. Save yourself. Otherwise, I can do nothing." He was pleading.

"They are mine. Mine."

The corporal sighed, called out. "Captain! We have illegals here."

The three were brought outside. On command, they lined up. The captain was very pleased. "We can report that the missing prisoners and a traitorous confederate have been found and dealt with. Escaping Reich justice is not acceptable. Corporal, execute them!"

The corporal didn't move. The command was repeated. "Execute them! Remember your oath of obedience. Your sacred oath."

The corporal slowly drew his machine gun. Above, a rift appeared in the clouds, and a ray of orange sunlight lit the yard.

"Fire!"

In seconds, three bullet-torn bodies lay on the ground, bathed in the rising sun. The mud steamed with morning dew.

The captain beamed. "Corporal, you are a true son of the SS. You have carried out your duty without flinching. You will be promoted – you will soon command your own unit. You will carry out these unpleasant but essential tasks for the Fatherland in many such future actions. Yes, this is a great responsibility, and you have proven what you are made of. You will forever remember this glorious moment."

The corporal looked down at the enemy – a peasant and two children bleeding in the mud. He considered what he was made of, and the glorious moment that he, who could never kill an animal, would forever remember – murdering a peasant with children he would not abandon. What had he done? What more would he be called on to do? He had sworn an oath. Of obedience. But to what? He shivered, then drew his pistol from his newly polished leather holster.

He set it against his temple. Orange rays from the horizon glinted on the barrel. He fired and fell into the mud. Mist rose about him. The sun shone more brightly. It would be a hot day.

The peasant's name is not known – he lived, endured, loved and died. His passing was not noticed. The children's names disappeared when the doctor's hospital records were destroyed to avoid incrimination. The SS expunged the corporal's name from the regiment's roster, and the episode was suppressed.

The incident was closed.

Pesach en Provence

By Gina Roitman

In 1989, I was in a business meeting with some francophones in Montreal. As the meeting wrapped up, someone made a comment that could be taken as unkind to anglophones. This was at the peak of the debate about Quebec sovereignty. Everyone laughed, and then they remembered me. All eyes turned my way. The man who had made the comment shrugged his shoulders and said he was sorry, that he had meant no offence. I assured him none was taken, but he continued, saying that I couldn't possibly understand what it is like to be afraid that your language will be lost to your children and that your culture will one day disappear. In fact, I said, I understood perfectly. My mother tongue was Yiddish and it was already practically a dead language. More to the point, as my parents were Holocaust survivors, I had been raised with the values and mores of a culture that was gone before I was born, leaving me nostalgic and hungering for something I never had. What I couldn't say was that wherever I am, part of me is longing for a home somewhere else.

In the Alpes-Martimes, the mountain range lurking behind the Riviera, I rent a cozy and uncluttered apartment from a Danish couple I have never met. I have been coming to Grasse since 1997, at first because I have a second cousin living here, but now mostly because it is a place where, with a cliff wall rising at my back and a panoramic view plunging to the sea, I can effectively empty myself to make room for the stories I want to write. I come in spring when the air is redolent with thyme, jasmine and wisteria, Grasse being world-famous for its perfumes.

My mother wears Evening in Paris, but only on special occasions like Pesach. The midnight blue bottle is the one bright spot on her otherwise drab dresser.

The idea of making a Passover seder first comes to me soon after I arrive in Grasse. I am going through the kitchen cupboards, taking inventory, when I suddenly come across a box of matzah. Two years earlier, I left a half empty box. I know it's not the same package, but I wonder whether the Danish couple discovered it and somehow grew fond of the tasteless, constipating crackers because of me.

I am not thinking about a real seder – that would be impossible – just something to help me through the holiday period, to keep me connected to Montreal despite all the trouble I have gone to in removing myself from there. So I will plan a faux seder. But for whom? My cousin and her husband will be visiting their children in California. Undaunted, I invite my friend Julie, a woman raised by nuns in a Montreal convent and the widow of a real Cossack. The irony is not lost on me. I imagine my mother's distress over sharing a seder with her enemy. My life is like that, a constant sliding back in time along some slippery groove carved out long before I got here.

What I know of seders does not come so much from religious teachings as it does from the force of family dynamics, the tailoring of the event to various players. That is what remains of this holiday for me. For me, family has always ebbed and flowed, perhaps as a consequence of being the daughter of survivors. Before I was even born, World War II had consumed most of my extended family, leaving my brother and me suffering from a deficit of relatives. The few we did have were far-flung, vaguely familiar faces in photographs that arrived in a letter once a year. This deficit was never more obvious than during the holidays, especially Passover. It was just the four of us – five if you count the ghost of the Prophet Elijah.

The kitchen table is moved into the living room because you don't eat dinner in the kitchen on yontif. We are all dressed in our finest and, despite the lack of company, the table is set with linen, china and a silver candelabrum.

"Bennick," my mother says to my father who is revelling in the Passover rituals, "do we have to do the whole Haggadah? The children are hungry."

Because it is a holiday and my mother is exhausted from the effort of preparation, my father is able to negotiate for the recounting of one more story. This is the part he is good at, reading out loud to us the story of how we came out of bondage.

My mother was a woman of enormous energy. A week before Passover, there was a frenzy of activity as she scrubbed the kitchen cupboards to make way for the Passover things. The frenzy always caused my mother to become even more highly strung than usual, more likely to snap at my father or brother or me. I remember offering to help her once, but she took it as an opportunity to remind me what a talent I had for breaking things. Not that we had anything precious – no heirlooms salvaged from previous generations, no treasured pieces passed on with interesting family histories. Our Passover dishes were purchased second-hand in a refugee camp in Germany. And like our family, the set was incomplete.

When I am 12, I return home from a friend's house to see my mother preparing to store the chametz in our apartment locker.

"Bella's mother says we are supposed to throw out the chametz," I say innocently.

"Bella's mother never buried a child who died from hunger," my mother replies, sharply. "Bella's mother was born here in Canada and never had a hungry day in her life. It's a sin against God to throw away food," she says in that tone that suggests the discussion is over.

This is how our family is bound together, as if by the barbed wire from the fences of Auschwitz, a name more familiar to me than Toronto. Toronto is the far side of the moon, while Auschwitz is right outside our door.

Some innovation is required for my faux seder. To make matzah meal, I crush the boxed matzah in the coffee grinder and get the Manischewitz recipe for matzah balls on the Internet. I think about my mother as I make charoset using Canada apples grown in France, although I've never seen them at home. I guess if we did grow them in Canada, they'd be called something else, like French fries are just frites in France. In Grasse, I am a Canada apple, but I'm not so sure what I am back in Montreal.

"Bring me the copper pesedikeh plate," my mother calls from the kitchen. "I will give you a job, if you want to help." I am to grate apples for the charoset while my mother cracks and empties walnuts shells. "You are doing Baileh's job. I always cracked the nuts, Malka mixed it all together with the honey; Ruchmeh would be helping der Mameh and Shaindel would be singing." With a few words, my mother conjures up the one-room shtiebl in Chrzanow where she lived with her parents and four sisters before the war.

During the holidays, I am much-loved in my family for my turkey and matzah ball soup. It's a recipe my mother gave me while she was in the hospital with the cancer that would kill her at the age of 63. I make it every holiday for family gatherings – the family, for the most part, being the one I married into. At 20, I acquired a pair of sister-in-laws, brother-in-laws, numerous nieces and nephews, and three sets of aunts and uncles, and a bonanza of first cousins. When I left the marriage, I kept my dowry of relatives and my position as the best maker of matzah ball soup.

The seders were invariably held at my brother- and sister-in-law's house, because, being wealthy, they had the room. The table, set for as many as 14 people, all of them immediate family, filled me with happy anticipation. But not having children of my own, the only thing I brought to the evening was the soup. These seders were family gatherings, but without any of the decipherable traditions from my childhood: only a few grudging prayers, laboriously squeaked out by my brother-in-law once the grandfathers had died. I missed my father's storytelling, although I had complained about it bitterly as a young girl. As much as I treasured the coming together of family, these seders, stripped of ceremony, were often laced with a bittersweet loneliness.

For my faux seder in Provence, I roast a whole chicken stuffed with vegetables and smothered in garlic, a recipe I also find on the Internet. It's too much food and though Julie asks for seconds, I can see I'll have enough for at least three more meals. Too much food is a Passover tradition, I tell her. My mother would lade the table as if all her sisters were coming to dine. It's as if, having survived hunger, she had to find ways to reassure herself that we had more than we needed. As a result, I have inherited an abhorrence of half-filled fridges and sparse meals. I wonder if it's because I am Jewish or because I was raised with a refugee's mentality, or both.

At supper, Julie will ask me if I consider myself a Canadian or a Jew, and I tell her that my nationality is Canadian but my soul is Jewish. That satisfies her, but leaves me uneasy, because I have not really answered the question.

"When we're gone," my mother repeats like a daily prayer, "you and Marvin will only have each other. You are the only ones left of all our family. Remember that. Remember."

In my sleep, sodden with too much food and rosé, I discern a jangling sound. With a start, I identify it as the telephone. I run down the darkened hall.

"Hello?"

It's Nancy, my brother's wife calling from Toronto where it is only a quarter to six. They're waiting for their seder guests to arrive and I am instantly nostalgic, regretful of being here and not there, in that foreign land called Toronto where Marvin, Nancy and the boys shower me with love when I visit.

Nancy, so full of the same kind of energy my mother had, but without the angst and anguish, gives me a rundown of her menu. My mother would have loved her (although I am convinced she would have nagged Nancy into converting to Judaism). Now Nancy speaks of having prepared the charoset and having the hard-boiled eggs standing by with the pitcher of salted water – "the salted tears of the Israelites," she reminds me, jokingly. I had forgotten about that.

Nancy is a wonder, with her love of puns and loopy lyrics to popular songs that she makes up, and her ability to invent new traditions when she cannot draw on the old. One seder when the boys were young, she held a matzah board to her face and created Matzah Man. She sang it to the tune of the Village People's Macho Man. It became a tradition for a while.

I crawl back into my narrow Provençal bed, groggy with half-formed thoughts and the weight of too much food and drink. Throughout the day, my mother had been shadowing me as I washed the floors of the apartment and prepared the faux seder. She is back now, hovering on the edge of my consciousness, intruding on my attempts to retrieve sleep. I wonder what she's trying to tell me. What I was thinking to have made so much food? Why had I found it so important to cook all day for just Julie and me? I could easily have done something simple. But then, I think while drifting off, it would not have been a Passover seder. It would have just been a friend coming over for dinner. Where's the memory in that?

Holocaust Poem

Everything beautiful and bitter has already fluttered from more steady hands than mine Pain has been exorcised sorrow has been hosed down memories have been polished to preserve those ugly preserves.

Barb wire has pricked pages tattoos have been imprinted on little boys' skulls like circus stamps

What can a spoiled 24-year-old say that you don't already know?
These ears haven't tasted
a Zaidie's murmured nightmares
These eyes haven't documented caked blood on dry lips
And Holocaust Education Week came and went again and I didn't go to a single event
I don't think I know the Holocaust
Perhaps I never will, I never can but it's underneath my skin, like dreams I barely remember and sometimes it floats away like dreams I begin to forget.

You could call this a Holocaust poem
I call it the first steps of an infant reborn.

How Jewish Are You?

The question balloons, larger than life
Shul-walk-miles can't be counted, mitzvot are too scattered to be listed, inner prayer is not a quantifiable statistic.
From the hook of the question mark lies insidious bait designed to one-up a man's ship

Faith was always layered, but it never had levels
so pointless
so pointing.

How Jewish are you?

Stack your matzah
Catalogue your gold-lettered kippot
Trace Israel-warmed skin.

Don't answer the question.
It doesn't deserve one.

Along Bathurst

At the crown, soft soil
hugs real open space and one-lane darkness
By the face, concrete stretches coarse limps birthing high schools, bad pubs
Down to the shoulders, creeping into 416 like whispers trickling into dreams falafel grey and gas-station red
At the torso, fresh-off-the-boat housing, synagogue clusters huddle
beside community hubs, gym squeaks
Now the stomach, where cappucino hugs schnitzel
donut sweet and chassidic salty
By the thighs, polished fences brighten boundaries
Dogs outnumber black hats, asphalt hills pose as mini-roller coasters
Down to shins, long bones of skeletal culture
Cigarette smoke dances with smog
Homes tease children; the anti-road hockey landscape
Finally, at the feet, world aroma taps streetcar glass
Distorted riffs grip high-heeled tipsies as art decorates alleys, hills become valleys and the street slips into the cover of night.

Mottel the Shlemiel

By Stan Weisberg

"What is a fool?" Funk & Wagnalls, a dictionary I bought cheap, defines it as "a person lacking understanding, judgment or common sense." Or "one who has been duped or imposed upon."

But in whose opinion, I ask you?

This is the story of Mottel, whom almost the entire Jewish population of Podzencheen called not Mottel the Woodcutter, but Mottel the Shlemiel, or Mottel the fool. Podzencheen was a large town in Polish Russia. That is, it was in Russia but its people spoke Polish and hated their Russian landlords. But that is another story.

Mottel was a cousin of my late grandfather, Nuchum the Furrier, may he rest in peace. (Actually, Mottel and everyone else in this story are also "the late" Mottel. This is because this story takes place way back before the Great War of 1914 to 1918.)

Defining who is a shlemiel has one major problem: Those who call others shlemiels may be shlemiels themselves. At least someone who is labelled a thief is usually so labelled by a jury of people who are not thieves themselves – except perhaps for their lawyers. Have you ever asked yourself? "Why are lawyers, politicians and convicted felons not allowed to do jury duty?" Everyone else is forced to do so. The reason is obvious to me.

Why was Mottel called Mottel the Shlemiel? Well, it started when he married his wife Roiseh, Yosel the bookbinder's daughter. You see, the townsfolk could not understand why a strikingly handsome man like Mottel would marry such a plain-looking girl like Roiseh. She even had a wart on her chin. Mottel could have had any young woman in town, especially Marsha, Simcha the grain merchant's beautiful daughter. Simcha was the richest man in town and would have given a huge dowry. Marsha made no secret of her interest in Mottel, but he politely ignored her and chose Roiseh instead.

What Mottel knew was that Roiseh had taught herself to read and write not only Hebrew and Yiddish but Polish as well. Jewish girls in Russia in those days did not go to school. They were taught how to be good wives and mothers at home. They rarely learned to read even enough Hebrew to follow the services in the synagogue. Why, the townsfolk asked themselves, would a man pick a wife who knew more languages than him and was possibly smarter than he was?

So, Mottel was called a fool because he chose a plain girl with a small dowry and a wart on her chin who could read three languages instead of a pretty empty-headed rich girl who could not read at all. That Roiseh had a sweet disposition and was always cheerful did not matter to Mottel's peers. They would have chosen the beautiful, rich Marsha, and many of the town's young bachelors lay awake nights dreaming of her big bosom and her bigger dowry.

Mottel was considered strange for another reason. He did not stay behind after morning prayers to shmooze with the other men. Instead, he hurried home to spend that time, before going to work, with his wife. They could understand this behaviour in a newlywed rushing home to his bride. However, long after the honeymoon, Mottel still rushed home, oddly preferring his Roiseh's company to that of his friends and cronies.

Normally, calling someone a shlemiel over his choice in a mate would have slowly died off. Besides, many of the men who were calling Mottel a fool were jealous. They were the young men who were falling all over each other trying to get Marsha's attention and all that went with it. You could not call a man a fool forever because you disagreed with him about who he chose to spend his life with.

But shortly after Mottel and his bride moved into their new house, he began to act in another foolish manner. Technically, the house was not new. It had belonged to Haskell the blondeh, Simcha the tailor's son. Haskell married Chana, Louis the shuster's daughter. Haskell and Chana had packed up themselves and their two young children, Lillie and Moishe, and headed off to America. Before they left, they sold their house to Mottel.

Anyhow, the house was new to Mottel and Roiseh, who was thrilled to have any sort of home of her own. The most striking feature of this house was not the house itself. It was built just like all the other houses in town. But it came with a huge backyard and a large barn – not just a stable, but a real barn.

He Collected Junk

Mottel began to bring home, from his wood cutting, odd bits of junk. They were mostly broken pieces of metal and old pots and pans. You see, dear reader, in the olden days in most Russian towns and villages, there was no garbage collection as we have today. Table scraps were fed to the goats or pigs. Whatever they could not eat went into the compost pile and whatever could not be composted was burned in the wood stove in winter and in a bonfire in summer. Whatever could not be fed, composted or burned – usually metal of some kind – was piled in a corner of the yard and left to slowly rust away. These piles of junk were considered a nuisance, taking up useful space in the garden.

From time to time, when the pile grew too big, a horse and wagon were hired to take the junk away. It was usually taken into the forest and dumped into a ravine. Mottel, on the other hand, would offer to take junk away at a lower price. This was not the foolish part. That he did not dump the junk in the forest but into his own backyard and barn were considered to be the actions of someone not altogether there, if you know what I mean.

The townsfolk readily gave Mottel their old junk. Not, however, without some snickering behind his back. "What will he do with all of that junk? He even plays with it, putting it into separate piles. How could a wife stand to have such a mess in her garden?"

Roiseh ignored the comments of her neighbours and even her friends. She was a loving wife to Mottel and gave him three strong sons and a beautiful daughter over the next 10 years. The piles of junk continued to grow, but Mottel had a large piece of land and there was always room for more. The townsfolk soon accepted Mottel's strange behaviour and even forgot why he was called Mottel the Shlemiel.

In 1914, a terrible thing happened. War broke out in Europe. The young Jewish men of Podzencheen were terrified that they would be forced into the army. This was not out of cowardice, but out of obligation. Does not the good book say, "Thou shalt not kill?" My uncle Israel told my mother that he and his fellow Jewish soldiers aimed their rifles over the heads of the enemy to avoid the sin of killing not only another human being but also perhaps a fellow Jew, and God forbid, even possibly a relative similarly forced into the army on the other side.

Of course, one could always refuse to put on the uniform. For this act of honesty, one was usually shot. So, being practical, the young men put on the hated uniform and shot over the enemy's heads. It was much easier to play the general's game. You did not see him up there shooting and getting shot at, did you?

Whoops – back to our story about Mottel the Shlemiel. As soon as war was declared, Mottel disappeared. He returned four days later so tired that he hired a wagon to take him home from the train, which was normally a short walk. This did not go unnoticed by the town yentas, who already had crooked noses over Mottel having slipped away from them four days earlier. They hardly gave him time to take his boots off and have a cup of tea before they headed to his door to request deliveries of wood.

Normally, even the town's nosiest busybody, Benta, Elia the pharmacist's wife, also known as Benta the Yenta, would have discreetly waited a few minutes. But she led the charge.

She had to. The laughter and singing from Mottel and Roiseh's house could be heard all over town. It started as soon as Mottel burst through his front door shouting, "Roiseleh, Roiseleh!" The noise was like a giant magnet. It drew Benta the Yenta to it as fast as her fat little legs could carry her. Her cronies followed behind like a strange gaggle of geese, their skirts flapping in the wind, like feathered wings, and with the excited cackle of chickens at dinner time.

The door was ajar and what greeted the nosy neighbours was a sight they would retell forever. There was Mottel, wildly dancing Roiseh around the kitchen shouting, "We're rich, we're rich!" and "Canada, here we come!"

When Mottel finally fell exhausted into a chair, he told everyone where he had been for four days. He had travelled all the way to Warsaw, where he visited all the foundries that produced iron and other metals. Mottel knew that because of the war, the demand for scrap metal would greatly increase and would eventually make it possible for him to sell his piles and piles of scrap metal to these foundries. If fortunate, he could sell it all at a large profit, which he had done. He had arranged for a bank loan to hire a fleet of trucks to carry his piles of "junk" to the foundries in Warsaw. A price per kilogram had already been agreed upon.

After paying for the trucks, selling the scrap metal and selling their house, they would have enough money to go to Canada, and there would even be enough money left over to buy a business once they got there. Did not Mottel's cousin Moishe have a grocery store in Toronto? Had he not been after Mottel for years to come to Canada and to go into partnership with him?

Two months later, Mottel and his family left for Sweden. From there they embarked on a steamship to Canada.

Mottel was never again referred to as Mottel the Shlemiel.

Stanley Weisberg lives in St. Catharines, Ont. Mottel the Shlemiel is part of a soon-to-be-published collection of humourous short stories titled Shlemiels, Shlemazels, Dairymaids and Gypsies.

Passover Greetings

For Tammy, in loving memory, Dec. 27, 1963-Oct. 9, 2003

By Marina Mashaal

Somewhere on your way to Him,
the wind must have blown
snowflakes through your eyes.
It broke you in pieces,
like a silver cookie,
and sprinkled you in sparks
across the sky.
The music and the art of all you like played.

The sky was a blanket of fallen peace.
The world over my head stretched to empty and yet filled like a canvas of you, your smile a flash
from afar.

Above my eyes,
the light was strong.
The pine needles moved as they glistened.
The autumn leaves burst into full colour.
I heard your roses
dip into the earth
as a bird called out its song.

I never knew beauty or sweet or the grace of fresh flowers or God with mercy of a date-palm but because of you and that God sometimes may need a fist filled with stars.

Marina Mashaal's poetry and short stories have been published in American and Canadian literary magazines. She lives in Montreal.

Intimate Portraits

By Na'ama Sheffi

When I finished reading Esther Schely-Newman's Our Lives are but Stories, a book that tells the about the lives of Israeli women of Tunisian background and the stories they told, I was filled with envy. Her ability, as a folklore anthropologist, to expose her cultural roots through the use of professional tools, is something most of us lack.

When we read a book like this one, which deals directly with a way of life that was part of a collective past to which the author belongs, we are aware not only of the content itself, but also of a personal sense of having missed the opportunity to become familiar with our own roots. Possibly one reason this research astonishes me is that the professional tools at my disposal are those of a historian studying western culture and not those of an anthropologist studying North African culture.

Much has been written in the past few decades about collective memory and the varying ways in which the same narrative can be represented. In most cases, research on the narrative – at least, among historians like myself – focuses on stories included in official contexts such as textbooks, newspapers or state or consular documents.

Throughout the 20th century, we have witnessed the granting of scholarly legitimization to the use of increasingly more sources, including personal conversations such as the ones in Schely-Newman's book. But even if research presenting the past from the perspective of women is now more accepted, studies describing the past through personal stories recounted directly by women are not yet a common phenomenon.

Esther Schely-Newman's fascinating book focuses on the almost personal and yet very collective stories of a group of Tunisian-born women who immigrated to Israel in the 1940s and 1950s. Relying on dozens of interviews, the book concentrates on the stories of four women.

Fortuna, born in 1917 and the author's mother, was born in Sfax, Tunisia's second largest city. She grew up with an aunt and uncle who had no children and, at age 24, married Noru, a Tunisian Jew with French citizenship. She moved to Israel in 1949, settling in Gilat, a moshav (co-operative agricultural community) in the southern part of the country.

Galia, who arrived in Gilat that same year, was born in 1924 in Gabes, not far from the island of Djerba. That region was penetrated by French colonialism at a later period and to a lesser degree than other parts of Tunisia. After her mother died, Galia grew up in the spacious home of her grandparents, who arranged for her marriage, at age 14, to an orphaned cousin.

Bia, Fortuna and Galia's neighbour in the moshav since 1955, was born in 1932 in the largest coastal city of Sousse, which was an important crossroads. As a young girl, she was forced to work to help support her family and to build up her dowry.

Odette, born in 1925 in the capital, Tunis, also helped her family financially. When she immigrated to Israel in 1955, she chose to reside in Aminadav, a moshav near Jerusalem, as part of her effort to realize the Zionist ideal of settling the Holy Land.

All the women interviewed for this book, and not just the four principal "protagonists," helped form a collective biography stretching from childhood to the very revealing chapter at the end, "Everyone's Grandmother." The place of girls and women in Tunisian-Jewish society is the backbone of the biographies.

From the start, Schely-Newman explains that the birth of a female is less joyous than the birth of a male – for economic reasons: The son will support his parents in the future, whereas his sister will deplete the family budget through the dowry that will have to be paid when she weds.

With an opening like that, it should come as no surprise that the lives of the daughters – and these were women who were raised during the second quarter of the 20th century – were not simple. As young girls, they grew up under the constant vigilance of women who taught them how to look after the house, but who concealed from them the facts of life. When they entered puberty and were astonished to discover bloodstains on their underwear, they were initially told that, from now on, they must never let a man touch them. They were given no explanation for this, and only later were informed that the blood was a clear sign of their fertility. When they were teenagers, it was made very clear that a woman's fortune and fate hinged on finding a husband, in most cases, through a match arranged by the family.

Although their subsequent way of life resembled that of previous generations of Tunisian Jewish women – as housewives and mothers – these women did manage, in the context of their life roles, to channel their domestic energy into other areas as well, such as the decision to immigrate to Israel; the internalization of a western orientation as expressed in encouraging their children, including their daughters, to study and pursue a career; and even the creation of a complex balance of power with their husbands, who allowed them a certain measure of independence.

Nonetheless, when these women in their later years describe their lives, they dare to talk frankly about the defects in their conjugal relationships, about husbands who, in their youth, tyrannize their wives and who, in their old age, become subservient to them.

Ostensibly, this book could be read as a collection of popular gossip stories or as a collection of folk legends. We are all intrigued by stories, some of which are nothing but folk legends, such as the one about the woman who shot her husband, thinking he was a prowler roaming outside their home (this story is repeated in various contexts, with the action taking place in different places, but never in the narrator's place of residence). Or the story about the young boy who becomes sick and whose illness exposes his mother's weakening religious faith; or about the woman who, only in old age, confesses to her having been in love with a man who was much higher than she was on the social ladder (in the end, she marries an ardent suitor who does not interest her at all).

Schely-Newman skillfully handles this difficult raw material: She places the "juicy" stories within a scholarly context. Her research is based on the study of a variety of areas: analyses from the social field, interpretation of modern gender roles, explanations that touch on the intergenerational gap between narrator and listener, differences between life in Tunisia and in Israel, transition to a modern lifestyle and, of course, the unique language of Tunisian Jews, which combines Arabic, French and the language of liturgy in its original Tunisian form, together with the Hebrew of daily life in Israel, which the women acquired following their arrival here.

What remain open, despite Schely-Newman's impressive scholarly integrity, are several questions relating to the manner in which anthropologists should position themselves vis-à-vis the subjects of their research. It is only natural for anthropologists to become involved to a lesser or greater degree, during the course of their research, in the community they are studying. However, in this particular instance, the question of personal involvement takes on even greater importance, because the researcher is the daughter of one of the first women interviewed and was also the neighbour, during her childhood, of two of the other women.

Granted, as we can judge from the excerpts from the conversations in Our Lives are but Stories, it is clear that only a member of their own community could have reached such a profound level of understanding of the narrators – and not just from the standpoint of their complex language. (The quotes in English faithfully reflect the original in which the narrative was recounted, and at times, one sentence is the product of a blend of languages.)

This issue carries even greater weight at the contextual level. Schely-Newman, who grew up in the Tunisian Jewish community in Israel, experienced first-hand – even if only as a small child – the social absorption processes and the substantive changes to which the women she interviewed were exposed. As a member of that community, she was regarded by her interviewees as "one of us." In this research study, which extended over many years, they spoke frankly about the most effective ways of hunting a husband (when she was still unmarried) and explained to her how a woman could make herself attractive in her husband's eyes after childbirth (when she interviewed them while pregnant).

It is doubtful whether she would have been exposed to the story about the fate a husband would bring her, or the fable about the vagina as thick honey that opens flexibly when necessary and returns to its original shape afterward, had she not been perceived as someone whose personal life was intertwined with that of the interviewees' own community.

Although it is obvious that, without this communal involvement, any anthropologist would have found it difficult to probe such deep strata of the lives of the interviewees, we can still not ignore a substantive ethical problem. Where is the demarcation line separating a research study from personal life during the interview itself, and how is that line maintained in the research study? Since the most extreme personal exposure is provided by Odette, the only one among the four principal interviewees who did not know Schely-Newman as a child, the position of the participating anthropologist could be interpreted in two different ways.

According to the first and less flattering approach, the subject to whom the interviewer was less committed was the one who could be more openly exposed and whose words could be presented without any embellishments. According to the second approach, fairness allowed the interviewer not to favour those she knew and to choose the stories on the basis of their strength and substance, and the most impressive story in this context was provided by someone whom she did not know.

The degree of the researcher's commitment to the subjects of her study is not related only to the private context of this particular anthropologist. Throughout the book, it is obvious that the women reached the point where they could be completely frank with her. However, if we could attribute the personal exposure of their ignorance of the sexual world to the playful willingness of grandmothers, it is amazing to discover the extent of their openness in intimate stories – some of which are only alluded to – that are told about their love lives.

The climax of these revelations is reached in the final chapter where they are ostensibly talking about things as elderly women, as people who continue to willingly cook and babysit for their families although they are actually recounting the earlier stages in their lives. Here, even though Schely-Newman explains that, in order to arrive at these details, she had to express the readiness to expose herself (even if only partially), we must still ask ourselves to what extent anthropologists are committed to their profession and to what extent they are committed to the subjects of their research.

Perhaps the ability to present things in such a frank manner is partially attributable to the fact that the book was published in English. Thus, the academic commitment to publishing research in the lingua franca of academia also provided the opening for greater precision, in the knowledge that the women themselves and those in their immediate surroundings would not be adversely affected by the study's publication. Nevertheless, since we are members of a society that prides itself on its transformation from a melting-pot to a multicultural society, it would have been a good idea to enable us to read and teach such studies in our own language, the language of "natives."

Passover Greetings

The Plea

By Frederika Shulman

Mr. And Mrs. Johanssen weren't particularly impressed with the tiny oil and its kitchy landscape that they inherited from his father (God rest his soul), whose taste in art left something to be desired. He said he had found it in the last days of the War.

Sure, the lines were steady enough, the hand, probably accomplished but what really intrigued them was of a different matter:

on close examination of the inside of the gilded frame they found a note in tiny Hebrew script:

Help us, it reads. Someone, please, help us.

Apparition (for Marc Chagall)

High above red shtetl rooftops they float:
poet painter and beautiful Bella,
with flower fragrance in air, they embrace.
He is part of her and she is made of green and black white collar and booties loving him, carrying roses she bought for his birthday.
On seeing her, he cannot help but begin to levitate.
That is why at night he paints the City of Light drenched in apple honey, meditates with angels singing praises for Kiddush born in egg bread plates, where Sabbath candle smoke can be tasted on wine coloured finger tips, he draws prayers etched in memory
by grandfather heart.

Marc Chagall, The Birthday, oil on canvas, 1915.

Poinsettia

I find no refreshment in the word, its rich red colour. It has meaning for someone else, like a holiday I can't experience, wrapping paper I can't use, a tree in someone else's livingroom. I remember a small, wood-paneled room with a bright tree, gifts in wrapped packages scattered around the ground. Katy's mom cut the toast in neat rectangles to dunk in perfect soft-boiled eggs. Katy wore white go-go boots.

The red poinsettia is barely a flower. It has no smell. It's a Hallmark card I can't read. Its red points shut me out with their frozen shine and plastic aura.

The sky is pale navy, bordering on frail light above the black roofs and chimneys. Is that a small note of hope, a band of something lighter radiating from the housetops? At the front of the house, the trees are black shadows. No light has arrived, except for a winter blue sky. The trees crouch at the window, protective, combative. Growling slightly in their sleep, they are ready to spring into action if provoked.

Edward Dunbar, Poinsettia, oil on canvas, 2004

Poems on pages B32 and B33 are by Malca Litovitz, a Toronto writer. Her latest poetry collection is* At the Moonbean Café *(Guernica, 2003).

No Charges for Meals Here

("Waiting at Ellis Island, 1905")

Come in for a free smoke and a dance. Tap your foot.
Raising your hand in the stately pose of the cowboy gallant,
Hand slung on your hip,
You lift my hand on high.

We look at each other under the arc of our arms,
A bridge connecting in the long grass.
An untied apron, a cigarette, and a nonchalant accordion.
A dreaming man rests his chin in his hands.

The sign says "No charge for meals"
In dozens of welcoming languages:
Free lunch near the Statue of Liberty.

Eclipse

We're out there on a dark summer night lying on a baseball field looking up at the big black skullcap of the earth.

Then, aurora borealis:
a flood of light, a flash of sun.
God to bat: shooting stars.
Big Dipper, Little Dipper in the ballgame of space.

Café Hillel

(1)

June 27, 2003

In a café,
I smell the ages,
hear the wind chimes,
see the bags – familiar yet dangerous.
At the door,
they check the contents

but it is my heart
ready to explode, gripping its losses
like other people's keys, none fitting the locks –
the combinations mysterious.

I pull when I should push and remember the portables, fields that welcomed us,
God saying "stay";
then, wild birds
in Masada loneliness filling the clouds.

(2)

Jerusalem Wedding

Stand, sweet friend, soak in this bliss,
this family crowning you
as sapphire birds
sing orange songs
in the garden of Beth Tikoa.

(3)

I am here without you at the top of the stairs barely finding the light switch, turning on the small fan making the lights flicker on and off, conscious of my solitude,
my loneliness
steaming the bathroom mirror, ringing the tub in soap.

I am clean and hot,
surrounded by love,
but you are absent.
The twinkling lights on the dark hills do not bring you near.

Erev shel shoshanim stings my eyelids, catches in my throat
when I try to whistle.
(4)

Weeks later, my friend calls Toronto to say she's OK. Ambulances wail in the background.

Songbird of Jerusalem, hold a twig in your beak, burst into mourning –
hills all around you, small red flowers in hot green bushes.

Remember young parents
rocking their baby in the carriage, teens in halter tops wearing earrings and tattoos.
Remember the soldiers at the door,
café brimming with life.

Tower of David

I travel through the desert,
gaze at a Sherman tank, pass brown caves of antiquity nestled into hills
at the side of the road.

High on the tower,
I look down on the city –
her gardens, roses, rooftops –
grace beyond Paris or Rome
because she is mine.

I descend to a dark gift shop, buy bookmarks for "Mazel"
to give to you,
small notebooks covered in Hebrew

a topaz stone with a prayer etched on it.

the holiness of a language
we do not speak but share.

A Princess in a Carriage

By Vivianne Schinasi Silver

At dusk
The horse-drawn carriage
"Hantour" awaits

My father holds my hand
To steady my step
I climb in Settle back comfortably,
On the worn-down leather seat

He gets in and commands
The driver "Yallah," Places a beautiful fragrant
Garland of Jasmine, "fol"
Around my neck.

I inhale its heavenly scent
Mixed with wafts of roasting
Corn and chestnuts.

The sun is just setting in the Turquoise/blue Mediterranean sea.
Lanterns are lit
Their flames flicker
Giving a magical glow
To the Alexandrian "corniche"

I am transported to the Land of enchantment
That promised to last forever.

Oceans and sunsets and bumpy roads later
In the mountains of Charlevoix,
Quebec,

A horse-drawn carriage
Once again
Now, it is I who helps my father
Steady his faltering step.

Isaac Israels (1865-1934), A horse drawn carriage, oil on canvas.

His ailing heart
Drained of his strength

Sadly, it is to be
Our last ride.

Passover Greetings

By Vivianne Schinasi Silver

Orange Blossoms

"Shem El Nessim"
Smell the Spring!
Time to harvest
Blossoms of the orange tree.

Heralding the coming of Pesach
Vast orchards welcome
Families and their picnics
Colourful food feasts
Proudly spread on benches and tables.

Warmed by the Egyptian sun,
As children we frolic in the arbour
Our mirth reflecting a festival spirit.

Huge copper vats quickly fill with flower petals
Gathered earlier in jute sheets
Corners held by everyone.

Soon, a sweet scent emanates
Fills the air with an intoxicating fragrance
That magical potion
Penetrates our every fibre,
Imprints our senses for a lifetime.

The Light Has Gone Out

The tip of a soldier's bayonet
Held us at bay
Told us to go, "Emshi"

A quick, hopeful glance into the courtyard,
Brings back a flood of Happy memories of many a Sabbath.

The hallowed steps of Eliahou Hanavi
Are no longer for me to ascend.
Its place of worship remains empty
As it has in other synagogues.

The building whose soul has been stolen.
Prayers and chants of a people
Whose voice is now stilled.
The Jewish light has gone out of Egypt.

Vivianne Schinasi Silver was born in Cairo. She came to Canada in 1957 after the anti-Semitism of the Suez Crisis forced the community out.

Passover Greetings

Memories of the Modern Jew

By Brandon Marlon

I

Ship of the Desert

A wandering Aramean was my father
Who put foot to sand and stretched his legs pace by pace
Through the steam and earth

He crossed the Jordan and locals knew him as the River Man –
Ha Ivri
His kin for a time could be found wearily toiling under Egypt's black sun
Habiru men and women bound in their hearts for Ashmem
After the gagging drought improved

Salem would have to wait for slavery generations and the mass Return
Of sandals and warm toes turning golden then rich pink

On sand dune ships of donkey and camel the tired souls
And burnt feet
Journeyed back to what by then was widely called Jeru-Salem
To rectify unfinished destinies and an ancient claim

A wandering Aramean from Ur was my progenitor
And I his wandering Jewish son am sorry my toes are so cold

II

Stranger's Torch At Jericho's Gates

A mob of slaves camped at Sinai's heel
To receive the world's gift and strengthen their backs
From the overseer's lashes

Tired eyes looked to the vast beyond from the nipple of Nebo
The transfer of leadership moving from Prophet to General

High walls and massive towers confronted the nomadic rush
Canaan's siege a gradual affliction
Crippling the gates of fortified cities
While cousin cultures jostled for supremacy
And territory
And water rights

From all sides the devastating blows arrived –
Ammon and Moab raided swiftly from the West
And out of sweltering desert
Tribes of Midian and Amalek thrust with spirit and spears
To impale Hebrew faith

But for judicial strategists and the glow of Shiloh
The flame and legacy would have reached thick ash
Smoked into infinite invisibility

And I would not remember the texture of Samson's hair
And my ancestors would never have been pregnant with monarchy
Nor moistened by longevity's full-mouthed kiss

III

Dynasty of Sin and Compromise

The reverberation can still be felt
Waves crashing into the coast of Canaan
Light tides ferrying heavy crews of Aegean skins

Preceded by a raging flame
Scorching the fertile crescent
Iron warriors and copper conquerors
Jeopardizing the boy nation of my grandfathers

Between Jaffa and Gaza
The search for allies and alloys was sparked a smoldering red

At the ensuing moment of immediate necessity
After beggary and protests: "A king! A king!"
The quest for solidarity in organization spawned a worldly throne
Pouring forth Psalms for comfort
Proverbs for wit and wisdom
A dynastic line of Davidic ruler-saviors

Before long the tongue of Via Maris
Extended in branches throughout tribal villages
For traders in times of peace
For troops in times of caustic challenge

All for naught these assimilationist reforms
As ten pieces of Jacob's garment were torn
And centuries of subjugation and threat descend

Though the will will remain and the courage persist
Not the rising of any hammer clan
Nor any glow from sons of stars
Will lift up beaten root shards for good

Two temples plowed to dust
Zion City razed down to pebbles and embers
Baptism by inferno, drowned in sorrows
With but one memento wall
A die-hard clinging to time and Moriah
For future fingerprints to be impressed
For buried ways to be unearthed
For all eyes to rise and look upon the faces of my ancient tribe
Still breathing and suffering
Outlasting Darwinian logic with inexplicable and undeniable exception

Brandon Marlon writes drama and poetry. He lives in Toronto.

Tongues Untied

By Marion Gold

My tongue speaks
Forbidden words.
Forbidden thoughts
Swirl around
In the Centrifuge that is my brain.

In secretive moments,
I write poetry
That no one will read.
I speak Yiddish
A language few understand.

It is mamaloshen –
Mother tongue
It is
The sacred language
Containing the wit and wisdom
Of all women.

I juxtapose the words of the Haggadah
With the recipes drawn from the memories
Of Pesach past.
Chrain, Gefilte Fish, Kneidlach, Goldeneh Yoikh, Ashkenaz Charoset, Sephardi Charoset with Figs and Dates
But no Kitniyot.

And it all Happened on Baldwin Street

But it all started somewhere else
Far, far away
Across the seas
Behind the wall of myths
In a village in Poland.

A girl born of children
Rivka Sara
Rebecca Sarah
Named after two of our Four matriarchs
To become Rose
In another land
From queen mother to flower
In name only.

Marion Gold is a published author and poet who lives in Toronto.

Passover Greetings

Memorial

By I.B. Iskov

The world crawls somewhere under a sinking sky large and hollow without soul without compassion beyond touch

The whole long truth pieces of memory fall tenderly in sorrow become a journey mourned shtetl after shtetl

Impaired logic trembles steals my heart from my blood and skin
a chunk of hungry earth

The world spins feverish, cradled in a cry bloated barren perspiring hard

Pieces of time assemble solemnly summon the forlorn in meeting halls with hope and dedication proud among the poignant stars
sharing history

I.B. Iskov is a poet who lives in Thornhill, Ont.

Havdalah

By Sigal Samuel

Sleeping babes in the hush of the dark sky as night hovers with stars over the fancies of your day nestle deeper into your mother's arms into the house of your father's building for do you see how he's built for you a palace,
sweet child?
sweet child!
this talmud is the nest of nests
these candles of warmth and security stand as pillars bless your mother for her soft eyes bless her again, again
sing her her due of praise and your father his knowledge of law
And bless your God, sweet child whose child you are without end without regret without lack of any thing…
for in his lilting, lullabying nest babes learn the love of princes.

Sigal Samuel is a Grade 11 student at Hebrew Academy in Montreal. Her work has won several awards and she has been published in the Jewish Public Library's First Fruits anthology.

U.S. Congress resolution urges equity for Jewish refugees

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

U.S. lawmaker Rick Santorum has introduced a "sense of the Senate" resolution that is designed to put refugees from Arab countries – including Jews – on par with Palestinian refugees in international diplomatic forums.

The resolution, introduced in the Senate last week, urges the president to instruct America's UN representatives, as well as envoys to bilateral and multilateral meetings, to make sure Jewish refugees are given the same treatment as Palestinian refugees. It also calls on the president to make clear that as part of any comprehensive peace plan, redress for Palestinians must be matched by compensation for refugees from Arab countries.

Please see editorial on page 10

A same-text resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives by New York Congressman Jerrold Nadler.

At a news conference announcing introduction of the resolution, Santorum, chair of the Senate Republican Conference, said, "The United States must embrace the moral and legal imperative to ensure that justice for former refugees from Arab countries assumes its rightful place on the international agenda and that these rights be assured as a matter of law and equity.

At left is a group of immigrants from Yemen receiving their first meal upon arrival in Israel, and at right are immigrant children at a ma'abara, a temporary makeshift camp where most of the new immigrants lived until proper housing could be provided. Some 750,000 Jews were expelled from Arab countries after Israel was created.

'Sept. 11 was used to protect Zionist interests'

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

The Mossad and the CIA infiltrated "Islamic combatant groups" in Afghanistan and were the forces behind the attack on Sept. 11 in New York and Washington, D.C., Imam Mohamed al-Asi said at York University last week.

The "Israeli Zionists" and the "neo-cons in Washington, D.C.," are to blame for leading the CIA into protecting Israeli interests and undermining Islamic self-determination, al-Asi told an evening program in Founders Assembly Hall attended by more than 200 people, who received him warmly.

U.S. imam speaks at York U

The host introduced al-Asi as the imam who was expelled from the Islamic Centre in Washington, D.C., due to the fiery nature of his sermons. For the past 20 years, al-Asi has been delivering his speeches from the sidewalk in front of the centre.

"The Jewish lobby in the United States, and I say Jewish lobby, preferring to say Zionist lobby, but the fact of the matter is that the Jews themselves refer to it as the Jewish lobby… was very disturbed that Muslims were beginning to stand up and their voice was beginning to be heard. Something had to be done about this," al-Asi said at York.

Pro-Zundel Rally

EDMONTON — More than two dozen supporters of Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel demonstrated outside the Edmonton constituency office of Deputy Prime Minister Anne McLellan last week, saying he has a right to deny the Holocaust took place. Zundel, a native of Germany, is being held in an Ontario jail as a security threat after being deported from the United States in 2003. In mid-May, the Ontario Court of Appeal will hear his challenge against a security certificate. If he loses, he could be deported to Germany.

More Swastikas

VAUGHAN, Ont. — Swastikas were spray-painted on the walls of a Vaughan, Ont., pallet business that was destroyed by a powerful explosion last week. York Regional Police said they haven't concluded whether the incident is a hate crime or whether the swastikas were meant to cover up another crime. The owner of the business, a 30-year-old Muslim immigrant from Guyana, said his truck had been vandalized earlier and he had received threatening phone calls. Vaughan has seen a spate of anti-Semitic vandalism in recent weeks, including swastikas painted on 13 cars and homes.

Writer-in-Exile Bursary

TORONTO — A new bursary for writers in exile in the name of Jewish journalist and editor Wilhelm Cohnstaedt was announced last month by York University. The Writer-in-Exile Bursary was set up through the York University Foundation to sponsor a foreign writer enrolled in York's graduate program in communication and culture and sponsored by PEN-Canada, which is a freedom-of-speech advocacy group. The York Foundation has collected more than $37,000 so far out of the $100,000 goal for the initiative. York professor emerita Joy Cohnstaedt initiated the bursary to honour her father-in-law, who was active in the politics of Weimar Germany between 1918 and 1933 before fleeing to the United States, where he lived until his suicide in 1937.

New Bid for NWT Mine

RAMAT GAN — The Israeli diamond wholesaler DGI Group said last month it has formed a consortium that has set aside $2 billion (US) to buy diamond mines around the world, including the Ekati mine in the Northwest Territories. DGI, a leading worldwide diamond wholesaler, tried to buy the mine last year from its majority owners, Australia-based BHP Billiton, but was rebuffed. It said it is making another offer because of rumours that Ekati, Canada's first producing diamond mine, may be up for sale.

UJA Drive in Trouble?

HAMILTON — This year's Hamilton UJA campaign is on track to be short of its its record $1.1-million goal by about $80,000 due to lower donations and donors who have died, organizers say. The target was set to carry on the momentum from last year's record of more than $1 million raised, and the extra amount is committed to global Jewish needs. If the drive falls short, the community will be forced to choose between cutbacks to local services and "not keeping our moral commitment to Israel," men's campaign co-chair Lester Krames told the Hamilton Jewish News.

Passion Challenge Nixed

PARIS — A French court has dismissed a legal challenge to The Passion of the Christ by three Jewish brothers who claimed the film could lead to attacks on Jews. The court ruled against Patrick, Gerard and Jean-Marc Benlolo, who claimed the film presented an erroneous version of the Gospels and would exacerbate anti-Semitism by portraying Jews as God-killers. The movie does not appear "to manipulate biblical texts" nor "have the obvious aim to attack the Jewish community," Judge Florence Lagemi wrote in her decision. The Benlolo brothers said they will appeal the decision. The film opened in France last week.

Deportation Upheld

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A U.S. immigration appeals court has upheld the removal of a former SS guard at Nazi slave labour camps in wartime Poland. Mykola Wasylyk, 79, faces deportation to his native Ukraine if his request to be removed to Switzerland is turned down by Swiss authorities. From April to November 1943, he served as an armed guard of Jews and other civilians at the Trawniki and Budzyn camps. He lives in upstate New York.

Jewish MP Blasted

LONDON — A British Jewish lawmaker was labelled a traitor after calling for economic sanctions against Israel. Labour MP Gerald Kaufman was heavily criticized by the president of Britain's Zionist Federation, Eric Moonman, after he made the comments at a constituency meeting. Moonman told reporters that although he felt Kaufman was pandering to a largely Muslim audience, "it doesn't mean he has to be a traitor to his own people."

Never Too Late to Go

LONDON — A 100-year-old London man moved to Israel. Simon Clyne is thought to be the oldest immigrant ever to move to Israel from Britain. Arriving last month, Clyne told reporters that it's "a dream come true to be here in Israel with my lovely family." He will live near his family on Kibbutz Ramat Rachel near Jerusalem.

Three teens arrested for vandalism incidents

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Police have arrested three teenagers in connection with a string of anti-Semitic incidents in north Toronto that saw a cemetery, a synagogue and a day school vandalized.

Julian Fantino, chief of Toronto Police Services, said Steven Vandermey, 18, and two 15-year-old boys were each charged with three counts of mischief under $5,000, one count each of mischief over $5,000 and one count each of mischief relating to religious property.

Bizarre incident, police puzzled

see story page 32

"Let me be absolutely clear. Let me put everyone on notice. Any hate crime, against any group in this city, is absolutely unacceptable," said Fantino. "Working with the community, we will continue to track down those responsible, arrest them, charge them and put them before the courts where, I hope, the community's condemnation will be reflected in the sentences handed down."

Fantino said tenacious and focused police work, combined with "help from the community, from young people and adults as appalled by these crimes," led to the arrests.

Jewish community representatives appearing at a news conference with Fantino applauded the police. "Kol hakavod – may they go from strength to strength," said Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The police, Farber said, have provided "a sense of security not just to the Jewish community, but to the wider community."

Frank Dimant of B'nai Brith Canada said the Jewish community will now be able to celebrate the festival of Passover with a sense of relief and freedom.

Responding to reporters' questions, Fantino said he had no information that the three alleged perpetrators were linked to any anti-Semitic groups. However, another unexpected link arose that shocked the staff and congregation at Beth Tzedec Synagogue: Vandermey's father, Frank, is a longstanding Beth Tzedec employee.

Gary Mansfield, president of the congregation, said Frank Vandermey, who works at Beth Tzedec Memorial Park, occasionally also worked at the synagogue. The congregation's cemetery is only a few blocks away from Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park, where 27 headstones, five wooden benches, a granite bench, a menorah, several plaques and signs were knocked to the ground.

"Frank has always been very courteous and an excellent worker. He is very trustworthy. We hope he will continue to work with us and for us into the future," Mansfield said.

"We understand he and his family must be going through a difficult time and we at the synagogue want to be as supportive as possible through this difficult time," he added.

Speaking at the news conference, Farber called on the attorney general to consider laying hate charges in connection to the vandalism. Under the Criminal Code, consent of the attorney general is required before such charges can proceed. He also suggested Crown attorneys should seek stiffer sentences since the offenses were motivated by hate.

"These are not just the crimes of youth, but serious Criminal Code offenses," he said.

The incidents that prompted the charges took place on the weekend of March 20-21. Seven windows at the Pride of Israel Synagogue on Bathurst Street, south of Steeles Avenue, were broken. Nearby, the Eitz Chaim Day Schools Patricia Avenue branch also had two windows broken, while seven swastikas were painted on the walls of Congregation B'nai Torah next door. Also in the neighbourhood, profanities and swastikas were written on a clothing donation box and several United Jewish Appeal signs were defaced with swastikas.

The vandalism came on the heels of another incident in the City of Vaugan where 13 cars and houses were spraypainted with swastikas. And in another incident, an Iranian immigrant was arrested for spray-painting anti-Semitic graffiti on construction hoarding in Bloor West Village.

The rash of anti-Semitic incidents startled the Jewish community, who held a rally against hate two weeks ago that attracted an estimated 3,000 people.

Four headstones toppled in Brantford Jewish cemetery

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Four headstones were knocked over recently in a Jewish cemetery in Brantford, Ont., in what police believe was a random act and not necessarily a copycat of recent anti-Semitic vandalism in Toronto.

The incident at the Beth David Cemetery took place a few days after 27 headstones were pushed over at the Bathurst Lawn Memorial Cemetery in Toronto. Despite the similarity in the offences, police say Brantford cemeteries report many such incidents during the year and overall, the Beth David is not the main target for this type of early morning vandalism.

"It's nothing to take a report of 20 tombstones being knocked over in a cemetery," said Insp. John Bates of the Brantford Police Service. "Unfortunately, this goes on all the time."

Bates said police received a second report of four headstones in Mount Hope Cemetery also being knocked over only three days after the incident at the Beth David.

There was no graffiti or spray-painting of any slogans or symbols to indicate the incident at the Beth David was motivated by anti-Semitism, he added.

In Toronto, meanwhile, the occurrence at Bathurst Lawn was part of a wider spate of incidents in which a nearby synagogue and day school had windows broken and fundraising billboards were spray-painted with swastikas. Earlier, 13 houses and cars in Vaughan were smeared with swastikas. The incidents were widely reported and condemned by political leaders.

'I felt a sense of obligation'

From the editor's desk

If the paths of our lives were lines of bright light, what images would they project in the grand vastness of heaven from our countless intersections with the lives of others?

In the case of one person I recently met, the line of his life would undoubtedly project a beautiful, eternal symmetry of glittering gold in settings of spectacular silver.

Allan Covens is an expert in gynecological oncology. Born in Montreal in the late 1950s, the energetic but understated doctor is now on the staff of Toronto's Sunnybrook Hospital with a teaching appointment at the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto.

I met with Covens last month over a cup of coffee to discuss a medical emergency that took him in February to the Medical Centre of the Valley, a hospital in Afula, Israel, where the storied Jezreel Valley meets the verdant Galilee.

Despite his relative youth, there is no one on Earth more adept at the treatment of cancers of the cervix by laparoscopic surgery. Covens is a pioneer in the field.

From his base in Toronto, and with the training that took him to other hospitals in Ontario, the United States and France, Covens has pushed this medical frontier further than anyone else because of one overriding objective: to preserve the fertility of women afflicted with this particularly cruel cancer.

The routine treatment of cervical cancer is, generally, by radical hysterectomy, the removal of the entire uterus. Coven's treatment removes only the tumour and leaves the uterus intact.

But the number of women who are eligible medical candidates for his laparoscopic surgical technique is relatively small. The factors that determine that eligibility are the size of the tumour, the fertility aspirations of the patient and, of course, the patient's age and condition of health.

For those few women who are eligible candidates, Covens has brought them, literally, future generations.

One such eligible patient was a vibrant, life-loving 20-year-old woman in Natzrat Illit, who had recently completed her tour of duty in the Israel Defence Forces. Her PET scan test results suggested that the cancer in her cervix had spread to her lymph glands. But her overall health profile raised some doubts in the mind of her doctor, Yehuda Ben-David, as to the reliability of the results, for the carcinoma in her tumour was relatively small.

Ben-David had trained for two years under Covens in Toronto in the mid-90s. Indeed, he was the first of three Israeli physicians whom Covens has trained. And as the worldwide community of gynecological oncologists is small, they have remained colleagues and friends ever since.

Allan Covens

Ben-David acted quickly, responsibly and thoughtfully. He called his mentor in Toronto and consulted with him about his young patient's case. She was an ideal candidate in need of the type of surgery that Covens had pioneered. Yet Ben-David was not yet ready himself to undertake the minutely intricate and very demanding procedure.

His question to Covens, therefore, was inevitable from the moment Ben-David picked up the phone: would he fly to Israel to perform the surgery?

Covens did not answer immediately. He could not. There were the normal and reasonable concerns in his mind that were in everybody's mind about the security situation in Israel. (The latest suicide bomber had just killed eight people in downtown Jerusalem.) The decision would not only affect him. He had to think of his wife and three children as well.

Ben-David sensed his mentor's concerns. But he did not belittle them. He simply asked: "If you're not going to come, who is?"

The pure, plaintive poignancy of Ben-David's question persuaded Covens.

He rushed to make the necessary arrangements to get to Israel as soon as possible. He bought a ticket on the first available flight that El Al could find for him and arrived in Israel just before Shabbat. Surgery was scheduled for the following Sunday morning.

Prior to the surgery, Covens delivered a talk about the procedure to a number of doctors from Tel Aviv and Haifa who had been invited to the Afula hospital to observe his work. He also spoke to his patient and to her mother. The patient's grandparents, one a survivor of the Holocaust, the other a Lebanese Jew, were also in the room, hearing but not understanding the doctor's explanations to their children, tearful and worried, but hopeful for their granddaughter's young life.

The surgery lasted four and a half hours.

"I felt a sense of obligation," Covens told The CJN two weeks after he returned.

"I felt an obligation to the patient even though I didn't know her, to my colleague and to the country. We'll know the final results only after five years. There is, I would say, a 95 per cent chance that she has been cured. I am deeply satisfied that I went."

Where the path of Covens' life has intersected with that of his young patient from Natzrat Illit, there will forever be imprinted in the eternal vastness of time and heaven a bright geometric stylization of peoplehood, caring, community and belonging.

SPEAKING OUT AGAINST HATE:

Film on 'Italian Wallenberg' set to premiere

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A gripping film about a quiet hero who rescued up to 5,000 Jews during World War II will bring Toronto's Jewish and Italian communities together this month.

The daring exploits of Giorgio Perlasca, a Christian who posed as a Spanish diplomat in Nazi-occupied Budapest and issued protective documents to prevent the deportation and murder of Hungarian Jews, will be the subject of Perlasca: An Italian Hero at a special showing April 19 at 8 p.m.

The Italian state-TV docudrama has been hailed as dramatic and compelling as the celebrated Schindler's List. Perlasca himself has been compared to Oskar Schindler and has been called "the Italian Wallenberg," referring to Swedish hero Raoul Wallenberg, who issued his famous fake schutzpasses to thousands of Budapest Jews in 1944.

But the name of Perlasca, who died in 1992 at age 82, does not jump off the page as do those of other war-era heroes. If anything, he downplayed his accomplishments until an Italian journalist found him in the late 1980s living in obscurity in Padua, Italy.

The story poured out, and in 1989, Perlasca was named by Israel's Holocaust remembrance and education authority, Yad Vashem, as Righteous Among the Nations. Israel made him an honorary citizen.

The highest national honours followed from Italy, Hungary and Spain. In 1990, he received the United States Holocaust Memorial Council's Medal of Remembrance from U.S. Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia.

Giorgio Perlasca

Until then, "the man never came forward, not even to his wife," says Walter Arbib, president of SkyLink Aviation, who saw the film on television late last year and has spearheaded the Toronto screening.

"His story is testament to human daring and compassion," says Arbib. "It is particularly relevant today."

Slated to attend the screening at the Varsity Theatre (55 Bloor St. W.) are Perlasca's wife Luciana, his son Franco, and Zsuzsi Gelleri-Dear, the Jewish secretary, now 83, who helped Perlasca issue the life-saving Spanish documents to Jews. It is hoped she will be reunited with one of them.

They will join leaders from the Jewish and Italian communities, as well as Toronto Police Chief Julian Fantino, local political figures, the journalist who found Perlasca and the actor who plays the hero in the film.

Perlasca worked for a meat-importing firm in Budapest during the war. When Mussolini fell in 1943, he declined to return to his native Italy and instead, made his way to Spain's embassy in the Hungarian capital.

There, he revealed himself as a former fighter for Franco's fascists during the Spanish Civil War and was given a job in charge of safe-houses that sheltered Jews who had already received protective papers.

When the Spanish envoy fled Budapest in late 1944, Perlasca boldly announced that he was the legation's new charge d'affaires, and changed his name to the more Spanish-sounding Jorge.

"At first, I didn't know what to do, but then I began to feel like a fish in water," he would later relate. "I continued giving out protective passes and looked after the Jews in the safe-houses flying the [neutral] Spanish flag. As the proverb says, 'Opportunity makes the thief.'"

Without sanction from the Spanish government, Perlasca continued to give out the passes, spirit Jews to safe-houses and use his own money to bribe members of the pro-Nazi Hungarian Arrow Cross.

In one famous instance, in the presence of Wallenberg, he rescued two Jewish boys from capture right under the nose of SS chief Adolf Eichmann.

It's estimated he rescued between 3,500 and 5,000 Jews from certain death.

After the war, he was repatriated to Italy, where he lived out his days. Of his erstwhile political leanings, he said, "I was neither a fascist nor an anti-fascist, but I was anti-Nazi."

There will be a free pre-screening of the film at 2:30 p.m. on April 19 for high school and university students.

Organizers say the evening will be especially relevant, as the day before is Yom HaShoah.

There will be a special fundraising reception on the Royal Bank's executive floor prior to the showing. Beneficiary charities of the effort include Villa Columbo charities, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, Jewish National Fund, the Perlasca Foundation and the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Oslo the key to ending current Mideast violence, ex-envoy says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

There may be a way out of the bitter cycle of bloodshed that stains Israel's increasingly tense relations with the Palestinians, Canada's former ambassador to Israel believes.

In a speech last week at Temple Sinai marked by both optimism and pessimism, Michael Bell said the now-defunct Oslo peace process, with its vision of a two-state solution, could be the key to ending the current violence, triggered by the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

"The parameters of a workable settlement have been established," noted Bell, a senior scholar at the University of Toronto's Munk Centre for International Studies

"Ultimately, the parties will have to return to the principles of Oslo, even if under another name," added Bell, whose speech was sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now and ARZA Canada.

Bell, who was also Canada's envoy in Jordan and Egypt, speculated that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's proposal for a unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip could rekindle peace talks.

But he warned that Sharon's plan, which is opposed by about half his cabinet, could be a ploy to buy time, divert attention from the Greek Island bribery scandal that has enveloped his coalition government and relieve pressure on Israel to give up the West Bank.

The Gaza plan, which at best may be "a long shot," should be the first of a series of Israeli withdrawals from the territories, said Bell, the only Canadian diplomat who has twice served as ambassador in Tel Aviv.

"Gaza should not be the end of the process," he observed, but rather "a solid building block" that will create a "new dynamic" and enable Israel and the Palestinians to restore trust and resume negotiations.

Bell, who left the department of foreign affairs last summer after a 36-year career, urged the leaders of Israel and the Palestinian Authority to exercise "moral responsibility," jettison the legacy of mutual suspicion, distrust and hatred, and renew bilateral talks.

The status quo is untenable, and if the conflict doesn't end, Israel and the Palestinians run the risk of destroying each other, he said.

"They can't afford not to resolve their problems," said Bell, who was last posted to Israel from 1999 to 2003. "This poison must be excised."

Reviewing the Oslo era, which lasted from 1993 to 2001, he said it inspired much hope for a brighter future and brought Israel and the Palestinians close to an agreement.

But perhaps Oslo was pushed "too far, too fast" by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak and former U.S. president Bill Clinton, Bell said.

Apportioning blame for Oslo's collapse, Bell castigated PA President Yasser Arafat for not having sufficiently prepared the Palestinians for a final-status accord, and he criticized Barak for expanding settlements in the territories.

Michael Bell

Neither side, he said, really understood each other's needs and requirements.

The Palestinians made a catastrophic mistake by unleashing violence, which hardened Israeli public opinion and reinforced Israel's "Holocaust mentality," Bell said.

Arafat, whom he described as the "iconic embodiment" of the Palestinian people, either turned a blind eye to terror or was incapable of controlling it.

And Arafat's claim that the ancient Jewish Temple was never in Jerusalem is contradicted by the facts of history.

Barak miscalculated by giving Sharon, then the leader of the Likud party, permission to visit the Temple Mount in eastern Jerusalem.

Bell called Sharon's foray to the Temple Mount, which occurred just before the start of the second intifadah, an insensitive provocation.

Turning to the current situation, Bell faulted Sharon for generally relying on an "iron fist" policy to deal with the Palestinians.

> 'Gaza should not be the end of the process'

Speaking about Israel's broader policies, Bell said centuries of anti-Semitism, combined with Israel's attendant sense of insecurity, weigh heavily on Israeli decision-makers.

These factors tend to make negotiations more difficult and render compromise as weakness, he said.

In a reference to the despair that grips the region, Bell said Palestinians feel trapped by the growth of Israeli settlements beyond the Green Line, while many Israelis no longer believe in the possibility of peace.

Alluding to the mood in Israel, Bell pointed out that 200,000 Israelis have emigrated since the second intifadah began in September 2000.

The security barrier Israel is presently constructing is almost certain to lead to the de facto annexation of parts of the West Bank and sow despair among Palestinian moderates, he said.

Meanwhile, the Palestinian Authority is riven by massive corruption, it is losing credibility and ground to radicals and it has virtually split off into fiefdoms dominated by various warlords, Bell said.

Givat Haviva urges help for Israeli Arabs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jews and Arabs in Israel must improve the lot of Israel's large Arab minority, says the representative of an organization dedicated to promoting equality and mutual understanding and respect in Israeli society.

In a recent appearance here, Givat Haviva emissary Shaul Kochavi said its work has become all the more important since police killed 13 Israeli Arabs in nation-wide demonstrations following the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising almost four years ago.

As a result of their deaths, Arab-Jewish relations in Israel have changed for the worse and turned "kind of explosive," he told a handful of local supporters, including former Canadian minister of national defence Barney Danson.

Kochavi spoke on the day Israel assassinated the spiritual leader of Hamas, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, and Israeli Arabs declared they would observe a "national day of mourning" in response to his death.

In an interview following his brief presentation, Kochavi accused the Israeli government of having failed to deal effectively with the fallout of those events, which he called a "bleeding wound."

He said the killings enraged Israel's one million-plus Arab citizens and have prompted Israeli Arab moderates to adopt "extreme positions" similar to those espoused by some Arab members of the Knesset.

In recent years, Arab parliamentarians such as Azmi Bishara have called for what, in effect, would be a secular state in place of Israel.

"Israeli Arabs are suffering from inequality, and now they're trying to get what they deserve under the law," Kochavi said.

In objective terms, they are "very close to being second-class citizens," he added. "Jews and Arabs, together, are fighting to change this situation."

In his talk, Kochavi – a member of Kibbutz Hazorea – cited several of the award-winning programs Givat Haviva has pursued to build co-operation between Jews and Arabs in Israel.

"Face to Face" brings Jewish and Arab high school and university students together so they can confront and overcome mutually held stereotypes and misconceptions.

"Goals of Peace" teaches Jewish and Arab boys and girls soccer skills and the value of cross-cultural interaction and dialogue.

In the "Earthdome" program, Arab and Jewish students build a structure made of soil and other natural materials.

In "Through Others' Eyes," they visit each other's homes to learn about photography.

"Women in Community" trains Arab and Jewish social workers to fight for women's rights in their communities.

Moreshet, Givat Haviva's Holocaust Research and Education Center, delivers lectures on the Shoah in Hebrew and Arabic, among other languages.

Founded in 1949, Givat Haviva is Israel's largest and oldest organization working for civil society, peace and democracy in Israel. More than 12,000 adults and children attend its workshops, seminars and courses every year. Former president Ezer Weizman ruefully called it Israel's "best kept secret."

Located on a 50-acre campus on a kibbutz half way between Haifa and Hadera, Givat Haviva was the recipient of the 2001 UNESCO Prize for Peace Education.

This past January, the Canadian government donated $110,000 to Givat Haviva's Women's Center.

In reaction to Israeli government cuts in social services, the organization has introduced new programs for disabled and disadvantaged youths, Kochavi said.

No longer forgotten refugees

According to the United Nations, some 725,000 Arabs from former British Mandatory Palestine became refugees when the Jews in the fledgling State of Israel refused to be overrun by invading Arab armies. Unwilling to accept a sovereign Jewish presence within the Middle East, most of the leaders of the Arab world these past 56 years – including those who have purported to lead the Palestinians – without concession to conscience or regard for their fellow Arabs' misery, have preferred to consign the Palestinians to squalid refugee camps rather than to relieve their suffering.

Ever since that fateful return by the 20th-century Jews to their historic homeland, the unresolved plight of the Palestinian refugees has occupied an unprecedented place and singular prominence in international affairs.

But the unsuccessful campaign to annihilate the nascent Jewish state and the stubborn refusal of the Jews to be annihilated created other other refugees as well: Jewish refugees. Between the years of 1948 and 1970 some 855,000 Jews were expelled from or fled their homes in Algeria, Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Libya, Morocco, Syria and Tunisia. They left behind their homes, personal effects, businesses, community assets and a unique Arab-Jewish heritage that had been fostered for hundreds of years. The World Organization of Jews from Arab Lands estimates that those Arab governments confiscated from the fleeing Jews more than $100 billion (US) in property.

In the world's nearly six-decade devotion to the cause of the Palestinian refugees, it has forgotten the injustices perpetrated upon the Jewish refugees, even though Resolution 242, adopted by the Security Council in 1967, calls for "a just settlement of the refugee problem" and makes no distinction between Arab refugees from former Mandatory Palestine and Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

Last week, a resolution was simultaneously introduced in the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives by Pennsylvania Senator Rick Santorum (Republican) and New York Congressman Jerry Nadler (Democrat) respectively, that would compel American envoys to raise the Jewish refugee issue whenever the Palestinian refugee issue is raised, as "an integral part of any comprehensive peace." The joint resolution was the initiative of Justice for Jews from Arab Lands, a New York-based coalition of 27 Jewish organizations. Its executive director, former Montrealer Stan Urman and Winnipeg human rights activist David Matas, last year wrote the definitive study on the subject, Jewish Refugees from Arab Countries: The case for Rights and Redress, which was excerpted in the Sept. 25 issue of The CJN.

The legislative measure last week in Washington is only a first modest step. It must be followed by other nations walking alongside. We therefore urge Canada to join the march. In this way, justice might be done and the Jewish refugees forgotten no longer.

Shocked by vandalism

I was shocked to learn that some miscreants in my city toppled more than two dozen Jewish gravestones at Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park Cemetery. At this moment of grief, sorrow and frustration in your community, I extend my hand in support.

This particular incident is an eye-opener for all of us and points to the fact that we are all sitting upon a pile of gunpowder.

As a Hindu, I am worried because in my community, people are also being targeted by the same fundamentalists in India and all over the world. It is in our common interest to come closer and unite against these evil forces. I firmly believe it is time to tell the government to stop fundamentalists from coming to Canada through this country's faulty immigration policies.

I have faith in the strength of your community, but if my community joins yours, our strength will be multiplied many times.

I have started talking to members in my community about the necessity for Jewish-Hindu unity and in the coming days, you will receive more communications from us. Let us unite to protect ourselves. May God help us.

Embarrassed by self-determination?

On Tuesday, March 16, Jewish students at York University stood united against something that plagues and frightens the hell out of us: the vilification of the Jewish people. We were responding in one loud voice to a mock checkpoint set up by the pro-Palestinian group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) in the centre of our campus. I have never been more proud to be a Jew. It was the first time that, as an active Hillel member and Israel advocate, I have seen such unity between Jewish students from different backgrounds at York.

I was shocked to learn that Toronto's Jewish community was embarrassed by Hillel's response to the demonstration and that they have abandoned us. I want to make clear that our response was not just about Israel advocacy. The utter hatred for Israel inspired by the depiction of Israeli soldiers as "born to kill" has, without a doubt, anti-Semitic undertones. Doing nothing would have led to further anti-Semitic sentiment. The "checkpoint" deserved only one response: the one we as students who have to face this every week chose to make.

We ignored Norman Finkelstein, we ignored material that reads, "From Occupied Palestine," we have ignored information tables that vilify us, but this was too much.

In all of our events, there is always room for criticism and room to learn from our mistakes. I am not claiming our response went off without a hitch.

However, I urge Toronto's Jews to leave their boardrooms, come to campus and see what it is like to live as a Jew every day at this institution. Until now, we've been plagued with a lack of unity on campus. The community should be proud of our unified response.

One of the many reasons for anti-Semitism is that Jews are perceived as easy targets. On March 16, Jewish students at York became a force to be reckoned with. I am holding my head high. I am proud of our response to this vile act of "political activism" on the part of SPHR. And I am thankful for the involvement of York's staff and Jewish student leaders.

The Jewish community stood behind us after our sukkah was torn down this past fall. Why is it that the community rallies against our victimization, but is embarrassed by our self-determination?

Differs with Kirshner

I read Sheldon Kirshner's column ("Palestinians look to a one-state solution," CJN, March 18) and had to take it with not just a grain of salt, but the whole salt shaker. Kirshner writes, "The PLO moderated its position and renounced terrorism." If it were only so. He also writes, "The two-state solution was embraced by Palestinians" as part of the Oslo process. I believe the proper verb is "rejected."

Was it not then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak who offered Palestinians a state on 95 per cent of the West Bank and Gaza, and wasn't it Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat who walked away without a counter-proposal? Wasn't it Arafat who has never given up the demand for the right of return to Israel of the four million so-called Palestinian refugees, with the stated goal of creating a Palestinian majority?

I fail to understand what Kirshner is talking about.

Differs with Fulford

I take issue with two of Robert Fulford's assertions ("Canada, America and Israel and the future of freedom," CJN, March 18).

First, his suggestion that Canada did not respond adequately to 9/11 is at variance with the facts. Immediately after the terrorist attacks, Canada provided safe landing for many aircraft diverted from U.S. air space and was one of the first countries to sign on to the international effort against Al Qaeda and to send troops to Afghanistan. To this day, we maintain an active presence in that country and continue to work closely with the United States in cross-border security.

Secondly, Fulford's attempt to discredit criticism by the majority of Canadians of U.S. President George W. Bush's unilateralist policies as some form of psychological anti-American crutch is utter nonsense. In the most recent issue of the Walrus, Michael Adams, president of Environics Research Group, reports on an extensive survey by his company of the root causes of the current U.S.-Canadian divide. Here is one of his conclusions:

"The policy areas that most strongly express Canadian values are reflected in our social safety net, our universal health-care system and our multilateral approach to international relations. Many Canadians see these as the aspects of our country that differentiate us most clearly from the United States. And it's these policies the government must treat with the greatest care."

The Madrid lessons

By EMANUELE OTTOLENGHI

The Madrid bombings teach us four important lessons about terrorism.

The first lesson is about the modus operandi of Al Qaeda and other similar organizations. The use of suicide bombers seems to be the trademark of such religious radicalism. But while the brand of radical Islam that Osama bin Laden and his like espouse undoubtedly emphasizes the role of the "martyr" and gives moral and religious backing to both suicide missions and their murderous results, the death of the Islamic warrior is not a strategy, but merely one tactical device.

In last month's Madrid bombings, security on Spanish trains was so lax that it was sufficient to place the explosives in the trains and activate them by remote control. Al Qaeda's main goal is to kill and maim in the greatest possible numbers and disrupt civilian life in the process. The suicide mission is a technique, a device used to maximize the chances of success of a military operation, a choice of weaponry rather than an ideological imperative, a choice in which the "martyr" is the cruise control system of a smart human bomb.

The second lesson applies to terrorism in general. A crucial aspect of terrorism is public exposure. There is a voyeuristic element in terrorism, in that it needs to make news. Since its aim is to influence an audience, it cannot go unnoticed. As each event raises the threshold of death, every act of terrorism needs to match previous attacks in the magnitude of the outrage it causes. The destruction caused by 9/11 raised terror to unprecedented levels, and 2½ years of conventional war in Afghanistan and Iraq, and of terrorism across the globe, have made public opinion more accustomed than ever before to images of death.

Mainland Spain failed to take notice when seven Spanish agents were ambushed, murdered and brutally trampled upon in far-away Iraq, just as two Israelis killed in a drive-by shooting in the West Bank hardly make headlines in the evening news anymore, even in Israel. As the war goes on, terrorism needs to up the ante. Madrid was its opening gambit in Europe, as 9/11 was in the United States. Terrorists will try to emulate both: Europe and the United States should both take notice that mega-death, rather than just killing scores of civilians, is the new goal of terrorists.

The third lesson stems from the second and it applies to Israel as well as to the West. Terrorism is still a show, but one with political aims. In Spain, it scored a spectacular initial victory when it won an election after a single event, and at a relatively low cost.

It remains to be seen whether the new Spanish government will keep its pledge to withdraw troops from Iraq, but the country's initial response to the outrage was exactly what the terrorists had hoped for – politics by other means, forcing a change in the course of history that legitimate means would not have achieved.

In Israel, terrorism has largely failed to achieve its goals because the collective psyche of Israelis (like that of Americans) works differently than that of Europeans: for both Americans and Israelis, terrorism is a form of blackmail of the worst kind, a sort of genocidal mafia whose aim is similar.

Terrorists have adopted their tactics because they assume that their enemies, if bled enough, will relent and go home – in the Americans' case, withdraw from the entire Middle East, in Israel's case, sink into the sea. Their failure to reach their goals has not dissuaded them from further pursuit though. If anything, their response to Israel's and the United States' determination not to budge has led to increasingly bolder operations.

An example is the recent Ashdod attack aimed at a toxic waste deposit. Had it succeeded (like the earlier failed attacks at the Pi-Glilot fuel deposits and at the Azrieli Towers in Tel Aviv), it would have killed hundreds, if not thousands.

The threshold has indeed risen, and mega-death is the target of current terrorism. This development, of which Madrid was a part, suggests that the only response civilized countries can give to the phenomenon is a renewed resolve to fight to the finish, with determination, pre-emption and ruthlessness. The alternative is to give in to the terrorists' demands, which in Israel's case are tantamount to national suicide. In the West's case, yielding would lead to the slow death of freedom.

The fourth lesson is political. Terrorism is not the mad reaction of the oppressed and downtrodden of the earth, reacting inevitably to despair. That explanation applies to the animal world, where instinct alone, not rationality, determines action and reaction. Human beings are different. Terrorism is a conscious choice, often the result of the combination of ideology – religious or secular – and resources, that seeks to achieve goals based on a rational calculation of costs and benefits.

Terrorists act upon the assumption that our will to fight is weak. Their strategy is to vanquish the West by depriving us of our resolve to resist their blackmail. They are persuaded that our societies' threshold of pain is very low and that if enough pain is inflicted, we will capitulate. Madrid proved them right, and Spain's electoral and political response will invite more attacks on Europe.

One can only hope that different countries with different governments will not be as short-sighted and cowardly as the new Spanish prime minister and his voters.

The Madrid bombings brought down a government willing to fight and replaced it with one willing to capitulate. It sent home a government that stood side by side with the United States in the war on terrorism and elected one that will stand with Europe as a rival to the U.S. vision in the war on terrorism, and it vindicated a political vision that bans violence from the toolkits of governance in favour of soft diplomacy, precisely at a time when the world is about to descend into barbarism again.

All this was achieved by a single, perfectly timed bomb that influenced the will of a sovereign nation. Madrid is therefore worse than Munich in 1938, because it shows a European mindset that failed to recognize the full nature of the threat the West confronts.

It took the fall of France and the Battle of Britain before England, who stood alone against evil, could be joined by others in the battle for freedom and the tide could change. Israel has stood alone in the last three years and confronted the onslaught of terrorism in its own Battle of Britain. Madrid showed us all too painfully that the moment the tide will change in Europe is still far off.

Why Poland matters

Each time he returned to Israel, he was asked if anti-Semitism in Poland is still prevalent. "Yes," he'd reply, "just as in other European countries." He'd add: "Polish Jews are tied to their bad memories and refuse to free themselves from them. They don't want to see a different Poland. I've the impression that they don't put similar questions to those who return from visits to Germany or France."

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

The speaker was Shevach Weiss, Israeli academic and parliamentarian, who recently retired as Israel's ambassador to Poland. He was born there and survived the Holocaust with his family thanks to Polish and Ukrainian neighbors. His return to his native land enabled him to help create a new climate of understanding between Poles and Jews.

A series of interviews Weiss gave on Polish radio have been collected in a book, now also available in Hebrew. Though throughout his tenure he persistently and vigorously drew attention to many acts of gross anti-Semitism in Poland, he has refused to describe the country as suffused with anti-Semitism. He has distanced himself emphatically from the statement by former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir that Poles get their anti-Semitism with their mothers' milk.

"In the eyes of the majority of the Polish elites, anti-Semitism is a source of great shame," says Weiss. He knows what he's talking about. He speaks the language, knows the country and was actively involved in Polish life. He has also been a great source of strength to Poland's small Jewish community there. Most Poles have responded to him with enthusiasm and generosity. Poland's staunch support for Israel is largely due to him.

In the words of Anthony Polonsky, the renowned expert on Polish history, the loss of the Jews has cut off a limb of Poland. Many Poles still feel the phantom pains. It seems that helping them to cope also helps us to heal our own wounds.

When some of us started the Polish Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada, today active in Montreal and Toronto, most Jews responded, at best, with indifference and, at times, with hostility. They asked, often polemically, the same kinds of questions that Weiss heard in Israel. Those who were prepared to listen to answers, perhaps even to visit Poland, saw a more nuanced picture.

So we've persevered, with some success. We've been able to show that, in addition to the vestiges of the old anti-Semitism there's now also another Poland, aware of its loss of the millions of Jews who once lived there and determined to preserve as much of its Jewish culture as possible. It behooves us Jews to respond accordingly. I'm proud to have played a small part in it.

Living on my own

For the last three days, I've been watching a gigantic black spider slowly creep its way along my bedroom ceiling.

Since I first noticed it hovering above my closet, it has completed almost a full circuit of my room and is now comfortably perched above the foot of my bed. I suppose I should be grateful I missed it when it was above my sleeping face.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

I'm not really sure what to do about this spider, to tell you the truth. Heaven forbid I ask someone else to take care of it for me, because that might send the message that I was either too inept or too cowardly to do it myself. Besides, in the granola-lovin' hippy area that I recently moved into, asking a neighbour to do the dastardly deed on my behalf could unwittingly invoke the rage of an animal rights activist. And with an enraged spider in my bedroom and an enraged activist in my hallway, I might as well live on my balcony.

I couldn't possibly ask my building manager, because I would have to see him every month when I pay my rent and thus endure the humiliation of reminding him about the tenant who didn't have the guts to kill a spider.

I also don't have the 10-foot ladder that I would need to reach my ceiling. It wasn't at the top of my shopping list when I left home and moved into my very own place three months ago. I do, however, have a wrinkled tomato in my fridge and a great pair of white knee-high pleather boots.

Every week, I go shopping at all kinds of quaint Italian and Austrian grocery/delis, where I spend exorbitant amounts of money on highly perishable imported food items. And every week, notice that all sorts of living creatures seem to get to these food items far faster than I ever do. Maybe that's how the spider on my bedroom ceiling got so big in the first place. I must say that it is far more well-fed than I am.

Living on your own comes with a special set of challenges, but it also has its own unique rewards.

Who cares about the first time I ever saw my name in print or the first academic award I ever won? The day I put up the shower curtains in my bathroom was the proudest day of my life. I figured out how to liven up a bathroom that had been painted an awful pea shade of green ("Go for butter yellow! Definitely butter yellow!" whispered a gay interior decorator in my ear) and how to pry open the unpryable blue shower hooks to install the curtains on the shower bar. One of the many things no one ever bothers to mention when giving you advice about life is that shower curtains never come with shower hooks, which to me is the most ridiculous thing I have ever heard of. It's like making you buy shoes without shoelaces.

For the holidays last year, I asked my friends to get me housewares. It's amazing to me that I have used my fondue set at least 40 times, yet my frying pan is still pristine. (Because you would have to be a moron to screw up melting cheese, or, for that matter, chocolate).

With all that calcium in my diet, I'll never get osteoporosis, but I suppose I'm now far more likely to die of scurvy.

And my stainless steel pots? They have the mysterious allure of things that have never been used. Maybe I should use one of them for the spider – to suffocate it, not cook it.

Minor inconveniences aside, I love my new place. I suppose that if I lived with someone else, the spider would only be a temporary problem – something I could shuffle along to the next room, where hopefully someone else could hurry along its ultimate demise.

But I'm not above peaceful cohabitation with another living creature. Even if has eight legs and lives on the ceiling – nobody's perfect.

And there's plenty of food to go around, too.

A barrier to identifying as Jews

From the moment I arrived at university, I have been involved in Jewish student life. I got to Halifax and realized that the Jewish life I had in Toronto would not be as easily accessible here. I quickly found myself actively engaged in the effort to make Jewish student life attractive and meaningful for myself and others. Nearly three years later, I have come to realize that this goal is not as easily attained as it perhaps once was.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

When we were walking home from school a few weeks ago, a friend of mine mentioned that the second someone finds out he is Jewish, a discussion about Israel and Mideast politics always seems to follow. It seemed to him that it is difficult to publicly identify as a Jew without having to weigh in on Middle East politics. I think his argument speaks to a growing problem.

In a modern, multicultural age, we want to avoid restrictive labels. We do not want to be defined as one thing, recognizing that a single classification necessarily ignores the complexity of influences that make up an individual.

On campus, though, my involvement with the Jewish Students' Association has overshadowed the other roles and positions I have taken on. The significance of this, however, goes beyond the annoying implications of being pigeonholed. Rather, it speaks to what it means to be characterized as a Jew today.

If you are engaged in Jewish life, it doesn't mean you are deeply involved in Israeli politics. If you hold conservative religious views, it does not follow that you ascribe to conservative political views. If you are opposed to suicide bombings, it doesn't mean you support the most radical right-wing outposts. It's not logical or rational, but the link in many people's minds between religion and politics, between culture and current events, has become automatic, even natural.

The frustration this can engender is obvious. Religion isn't politics and one's propensity for Torah study doesn't exactly correlate to having passionate views about the policies of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. As a result, it becomes difficult to stand among students and try to instil a desire to connect with Jewish values when that connection is immediately associated with political affiliation. While there is nothing wrong with holding strong political views, it is undoubtedly problematic to be assigned such views by default.

It is evident that Jewish communities are struggling. The rise of anti-Semitism, so much of which is connected to the Mideast conflict, has left us in a position where our security in the Diaspora can no longer be taken so strongly for granted. But while anti-Semitism can be a strong, motivating force for community solidarity, for young Jews confused about identity, hatred in their communities and on campuses serves as a further threat to their identification as Jews. As long it is perceived that hatred of Jews stems from Israel's policies, people will resist identifying with their Judaism as a way to avoid political tensions.

It is exhausting to take a defensive posture all the time, but it is even harder to justify a position when you are seen to have an automatic bias. Jewish students who advocate for Israel or articulate a pro-Israel position often have their arguments, no matter how well-constructed and logical, dismissed as coming from someone too close to the political situation in the Middle East, and thus incapable of objectivity.

The political climate has forced us to expend our effort on political advocacy. The attempt to influence public opinion is necessary, but at the same time, we must find more ways to connect with people on topics and issues beyond Israel and its policies.

With the focus on politics, we turn away from culture, learning and the diversity that makes the Jewish people distinct.

The Kirshner File

Immigrant identities nourished by food

The French statesman, Jean Anthelme Brillat-Savarin, is best remembered for one telling aphorism: "Tell me what you eat, and I shall tell you what you are."

Similarly, as Canadian food writer Thelma Barer Stein and others have noted, "You are what you eat."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

As generalizations go, these comments ring true. And with Passover upon us, the culinary arts will be all the more appreciated.

The selection, preparation and consumption of food is steeped in culture and religion. Food solidifies group bonds, lubricates social relations and reinforces ethnic identity.

So it can hardly be surprising that food, glorious food, played an implicit role in the immigration of Jews – and Italians and Irish – to the United States in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

During this period, millions of immigrants from poverty-stricken European countries flooded into America in search of a better life.

And what better defined this than access to an inexpensive and abundant food supply?

Almost universally, North America was regarded by new immigrants as a continent where hunger could be kept at bay.

Jewish immigrants from eastern Europe, who had experienced poverty first-hand, understood this imperative perfectly, writes Hasia Diner, a New York University professor of American Jewish history, in Hungering for America: Italian, Irish & Jewish Foodways in the Age of Migration (Harvard University Press).

"From biblical sources through modern writings, the intimate connection between food and holiness, between good food and good life, defined Jewish ideas of consumption," she observes in this original, illuminating and entertaining book.

Dietary laws obliged Jews to know what they had eaten, while knowledge of the anatomy of cows and chickens constituted sacred information.

Indeed, rabbis derived some of their authority from a familiarity with this data.

In short, eastern European Jews inhabited a universe shaped by a love of food. Memoirs, songs and stories reinforced the widely shared belief that good food and health were synonymous.

Chaim Zhislovsky, the socialist theoretician, recalled that his father, a rabbi, often spoke of culinary delights "like mushrooms marinated with little cucumbers."

The Jewish calendar, encompassing the Sabbath and major holidays, moved along a food trajectory. At the court of illustrious rabbis, tables groaned with appetizing dishes.

Sabbath meals were associated with chicken soup, roasted meat, gefilte fish, cholent, cakes and fruits. Memoirists wrote of the elaborate preparations and weeklong scrimping endured by the poor so they could enjoy the gustatory joys of the Sabbath.

As Diner puts it, "The Sabbath and its foods elevated… ordinary lives to transcendence and bore witness to the intimate connection between sanctity and food."

Holidays called for special dishes.

On Passover, matzah reigned supreme, and on Chanukah, the latke was ubiquitous. Hamantaschen took pride of place during Purim, and on Rosh Hashanah, there was honey cake, tzimmes and sweetened fish.

Famines that struck Russia – the home of millions of Jews – from the 1890s onwards reduced the Jewish masses to penury. And so the poor often subsisted on a diet of dark bread, potatoes and herring.

Wealthy Jews, on the other hand, partook of a cornucopia of rich foods that included meat, fruits, baked goods and dairy products.

America, the destination of the impoverished and the persecuted, empowered Jews who had been poised on the abyss of starvation. The United States challenged the notion that a balanced meal was the sole prerogative of the well-to-do.

"By eating foods once the preserve of the Jewish upper classes, they engaged in an act of class reversal," Diner writes. "The formerly poor started to eat blintzes, kreplach, kasha-varnitchkes, strudel, noodles, knishes, and most importantly, meat every day."

The melting pot culture of the United States exposed Jewish immigrants to new foods. In the garment shops of major cities, Jewish workers consumed corned beef sandwiches, while Italians feasted on fried eggplant.

The Jewish propensity for Chinese food emerged in the 20th century. In 1928, the New York Yiddish daily Der Tog published an article titled "The War between Chop Suey and Gefilte Fish."

Like Jews, Italians immigrated to the United States, often out of a desire to leave behind the culture of food scarcity once and for all.

"Poor Italians believed that America offered good prospects for good food," Diner notes. They had heard that American workers were accustomed to three meals a day, something unimaginable in Italy.

Poor Italians could only dream of jams, preserves, cakes, baked olives, dried figs stuffed with almonds and sausages sprinkled with Spanish peppers.

The working class relied on staples such as rice, corn, wheat and home-grown vegetables. Meat was virtually unattainable.

Day labourers survived on plain bread soaked in oil and salt or garnished with a mixture of crushed raw tomatoes and garlic.

Whatever their diets, Diner points out, the great majority of poor Italians spent most of their hard-earned income – three-quarters or more – on food.

In the United States, Italian immigrants learned to feast on meat and cheese dishes, which had sometimes been beyond their reach. "Once in America, Italians built their lives and diets around the consumption of foods that were familiar but had been inaccessible."

And in the United States, Italian immigrants aped the elites of their homeland by elevating food hospitality to a fine art.

Many Italians sold fruits and vegetables as a livelihood. "Selling food represented a chance to go into business for oneself and capitalize upon [Italian] community taste," says Diner.

As they prospered, they branched out into the more lucrative general market, transforming their businesses into huge corporations such as Del Monte.

Food was an essential ingredient in helping forge a unified Italian identity.

"Thus pizza and sausage drew together Italian men, regardless of their place of origin and their lack of exposure to these foods before coming to America," Diner writes.

Much of Italian public life – weddings, baptisms, funerals, parish events – revolved around food. "Food embodied where they had come from and what they had achieved."

By contrast, Irish immigrants did not generally have a love affair with food.

Recurrent famines and an almost universal reliance on the lowly potato left such a painful impact on Irish Catholics that food was not seen as a source of communal expression and national joy.

"To the contrary, when the Irish remarked upon food, they did so negatively. They spoke of hunger and lamented the absence of food in general."

In her view, alcohol, rather than food, was the cornerstone of the Irish social system and Irish collective identity.

But for Jews and Italians, food was honoured, celebrated and savoured.

Jewish Life

Dusty pages from long ago

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Ask any Torontonian to point you to the corner of Agnes and Terraulay streets, and you're likely to receive a shrug because those street names don't exist any more.

But it was on that corner – the present-day intersection of Dundas and Bay, in the heart of Toronto's old, largely Jewish, Ward neighbourhood – that a bitter street riot broke out on the evening of June 8, 1911. Ultimately, thousands of people were involved in the melee, which lasted for three hours and resulted in eight arrests and multiple injuries. According to the Toronto Star, "a large force of police were required finally to quell the disturbance."

A Christian missionary group had been in the habit of using that corner on Sunday evenings to preach to the Jews. What made that night different from all other nights, however, was that two other orators, a Jewish socialist and a Zionist, decided to speak on opposite corners.

Both commanded sizeable audiences. So too did S. H. Rohold, the Presbyterian missionary who often attracted a crowd of casual listeners.

In those days, many Yiddish-speaking Jewish immigrants had poor English skills. Thus, according to the Star, the crowd became inflamed after the socialist translated some of the missionary's words.

"The excitement spread to the Zionist group, and a rush against the missionary was organized. Stones began to fly, and fist play was indulged in. Soon the air was black with a perfect fusillade of old tin cans, chairs, and all sorts of missiles. In the crowd were a number of women and children, who had considerable difficulty in escaping to shelter."

The police, caught unprepared, sent for reserves, and a large detachment of uniformed officers soon arrived. By this time, the mob had grown to "several thousand" in size and part of it was "surging violently around the missionary and his supporters. The police used their batons freely, and belabored the heads of the fighters."

Recriminations were exchanged for days afterwards. Rabbi Solomon Jacobs of the Holy Blossom Synagogue blamed the missionaries who "come into the district thickly populated with Jewish citizens, cast aspersions on their religion, wound their feelings, abuse the rabbis, and do their utmost to stir up trouble among peaceful and law-abiding citizens."

Dr. John Shayne, head of the Zionists, blamed the police for "us[ing] their clubs and batons indiscriminately, hitting men, women and children."

But as the missionaries explained in a letter to the Globe, their message to the Jews of Toronto was "the same as that given by the Christian Church the world over." They blamed the Jews for the ruckus and noted that "the offence of the cross with them has not yet ceased."

Thank goodness we don't live in those dark ages any more – or do we? Last summer, 92 summers after 1911, Toronto streets again became a spiritual battleground as Jews for Judaism waged an effective tug-of-war for Jewish souls with the missionary group Jews for Jesus. Today, as millions of moviegoers soak up powerful anti-Semitic stereotypes, the words of one Jewish Torontonian from 1911 (I picture a wise old Bubbe, sitting on her porch) seem especially relevant.

"Those people should mind their own business. Why can't they leave us alone, and not keep on trying to convert us, as they call it, and to save us from being heathens? We are no heathens, I tell you, no heathens. We have a religion, and we believe in it. We like it. It is good enough for us, and we are going to keep it. Let outside busybodies keep their hands off."

Mimouna on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Immediately after the close of Passover, when many Jews are putting away dishes or lining up in bakeries, Sephardi Jews from Morocco celebrate a much more beautiful tradition. They usher in Mimouna, a celebration of liberty, community values, friendship, togetherness, and an extraordinary show of hospitality. Today, a look at Mimouna on the World Wide Web.

Mimouna has a connection to the final day of Passover when the Israelites finally reached the Red Sea. Many of the day's traditions reflect that connection, such as going to the beach and putting (sometimes live) fish on the table in remembrance of the splitting of the Red Sea. It is also a day when expensive clothes are worn and tables are decorated in silver in remembrance of the Egyptian coins that were washed up after the Egyptians were drowned [www.jafi.org.il/education/festivls/pesach/m2.html]. The members of Moshav Gimzo celebrate Mimouna in style. Take a look at the photo album of their festivities [www.gimzo.org.il/pictures/mimunalbum/].

The SephardiConnection website describes the day this way: "In marked contrast with the seder night, when congregants hurried home from the synagogue to begin the Haggadah, congregants on Mimouna's eve take the time to greet each other at the evening service with the consecrated formula tarbah (success), the special Mimouna blessing Alallah Mimouna, Ambarka mas'uda, to drink a little mahya and stop on their way home" [http://sephardiconnect.com/pesah/mimouna.htm].

A page titled "Passover: History and Meaning of Freedom in Faith" continues the description. "On the eve of Mimouna, family members, friends and cousins visit each other's homes, going from house to house. There is a certain order to these visits. On their way home from synagogue services, Mimouna celebrants will visit the rabbi's family, the chazzan, their parents, friends and then their neighbours, in that order. Traditional embroidered dress is worn by members of the household. A big banquet, buffet and feast are hosted by each household. Some believe that Mimouna represents a symbolic new beginning of freedom from slavery, and so sweets are set out on a table with a white tablecloth decorated with flowers and wheat sheaves… In the sense of Mimouna being a new beginning, eating these sweets symbolizes a sweet year" [http://tinyurl.com/24r3q].

Early the following morning, families in coastal cities get up and head for the seashore. They splash their faces with water and step barefoot in the ocean – to replay, in a sense, the miraculous crossing of the Red Sea.

But in Israel, Mimouna has emerged as a prime political event. According to an article in Ha'aretz, 30 years ago a Labor politician started the tradition of turning the house parties into gatherings for "all the people of Israel." Since then, it mushroomed into a day for politicians to be seen. Officials of all stripes made appearances, helicoptered from event to event and tried to score points. But lately it seems that the public has become jaded. "Once, when a prime minister would come, we'd feel he was bringing honour to the Moroccans. Now, we know they come for themselves, not for us" [http://tinyurl.com/2s9up].

What about the origin of the name "Mimouna"? According to the French language page, La Mimouna, there are several theories. It may allude to the word "emunah," which means faith, or possibly to the word "mammon" and the coins that were washed up onto the shores of the Red Sea. Others suggest that the celebration can be traced to the anniversary of the death of Rav Maimon, the father of Maimonides [www.sefarad.org/janine/dossier/20010409.html].

The preferred way to spend the day is at family picnics, where tents are pitched in recognition of the biblical phrase, "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob." What to pack for the picnic? If your mother never taught you any Mimouna recipes, the Kfar Olami site has a couple of suggestions. Couscous Hiloo is very sweet. It calls for couscous, sugar, cinnamon, raisins, dates, apricots, almonds and almond milk. For something pungent, try the Moroccan carrot salad which has carrots, garlic, paprika, hot pepper, lemon juice and olive oil [http://tinyurl.com/33vpw].

Meanwhile, Daniel Rogov provides a recipe for "mofleta," the first leavened bread eaten after the Passover holiday [www.stratsplace.com/rogov/israel/mimouna_2002.html].

Enjoy and have a very Happy Mimouna.

Jewish vs. Christian views of the Messiah

Books
Bernard Baskin

What are the essential theological differences that distinguish the saviour of Christianity from the Jewish Jesus? I think that there are five main areas of difference.

The first involves the question of the Messiah. The Church, of course, accepted the idea that Jesus was the long-awaited Messiah whose coming had been predicted by the Hebrew prophets. According to this tradition, the Messiah was to be a descendant of the royal house of David. He would restore the independence of Judea, establish God's kingdom and bring about an era of peace, justice and righteousness for all humankind. With the advent of the Messiah, there would be no wars, no class distinctions, no poverty. The Messiah would usher in a kind of utopian age.

Christianity asserts that Jesus was this Messiah. The Jewish affirmation is that he was not. Looking at the world today, it is hard to believe that the Messianic era has arrived.

In the second place, the Christ of Christianity is more than human. He is the son of God, not as you and I may be sons of God, but in a totally different way. He was conceived in a supernatural manner and his nature is divine. This divinity of Jesus is something Jews cannot accept. We do not compromise on monotheism. "You shall have no other gods besides me," reads the second commandment. The unity of God: this is the basic Jewish affirmation.

The church separated from the synagogue when it began to deify Jesus. Undoubtedly, contemporary Jews feared that a tangible God could lead to idolatry, to the worship of a human being, and would thus weaken veneration of the One God.

The third vital difference revolves around the concept of the resurrection. Christianity affirms that the idea of Jesus' resurrection gives humankind assurance of immortality. Easter is a more important day in the church calendar than Christmas. It asserts that the resurrection is proof of the immortality of the soul. Judaism also teaches that there is life after death. But it is based on the conviction that God, who created men and women, did not intend for them to utterly perish. Faith in immortality rests on the fact of God, not on any event in history.

The fourth point of difference is concerned with the necessity and the reason for the death of Jesus. From the Jewish point of view, he did not seek his death. He did not voluntarily surrender himself. According to the Christian Bible's account, one of his disciples had to be bribed to betray him. The last words of Jesus would seem to indicate his conviction that God had forsaken him.

But for the Christian church, he died voluntarily as a lamb of God, as a Passover sacrifice, in order that the sins of humankind might be redeemed, and in order that all who believe in him might achieve salvation.

Judaism believes that no human being can atone for the sins of others. Each person will be rewarded or punished according to his own actions. The person who sins can undergo a process of contrition and forgiveness in accordance with the Yom Kippur formula, "Repentance, prayer and charity can avert the evil decree."

Finally, there is a vital difference between the two religions in regard to an intermediator between God and man. Christians often direct their prayers not to God but to Jesus. Judaism recognizes no intercessor between man and God, or that such a mediator is essential or necessary. The humblest and the most powerful are on an equal footing before the Lord.

It isn't likely that believing Jews and Christians will ever reach agreement on who or what Jesus was. But, we do share a vast treasure house of common moral and religious traditions. If we are loyal to them, we can, despite essential differences, unite in a harmonious effort to fashion a society in which people will enjoy blessings of security, freedom and peace, and acknowledge their kinship as children of a universal God.

Responding to anti-Semitism

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

I remember reading an article a few years back about a young woman who had undertaken an emotional and difficult search for her birth mother. Happily, not only was the woman found, she was also willing to be put in touch with her daughter, whom she had given up for adoption as a newborn baby more than 20 years earlier.

Soon notified, the daughter was overjoyed.

First, however, the caseworker had a cautionary warning for her: "Your birth mother is not just anyone," she said. "She is a well-known Hollywood celebrity."

"Go on," responded the excited daughter. "Tell me, who is she?"

"Your mother," was the reply "is Roseanne Barr."

"Oh my God!" exclaimed the daughter. "Isn't she a Jew?"

It seems the fact that her birth mother was found, was a celebrity and was willing to be in contact with her was all eclipsed by the disappointing fact that she was a Jew.

One is just left to marvel at how the world perceives us Jews. We would like to think that we have come of age and that anti-Semitism in our times is outdated. We like to believe that after 2,000 years of Diaspora and persecution, culminating in the Holocaust and the founding of the State of Israel, hatred for the Jew is but a sad relic of history. We like to read of how hatred or stereotyping has become unfashionable and politically incorrect.

Just this week, we were informed about how the official sign language used by the hearing impaired has been modernized. No longer will an Asian be portrayed by slanting the eye, a homosexual by a limp wrist, or for that matter, a Jew by indicating a hooked nose. As commendable as these and other similar efforts may be, the eradication of racial hatred has yet a long distance to travel.

I believe that anti-Semitism, as despicable as it may be, will never be fully eradicated. Subdued, hopefully, but not gone for good. I believe dastardly anti-Semitic acts serve as a reality check of sorts, an unfortunate but necessary evil that helps to re-establish our very distinct identity as Jews – an identity some may prefer to forget or at least downplay. Anti-Semitism is a reminder.

Canadian Jews, Toronto Jewry in particular, were reminded of this recently. In the span of just a few days, our community was subjected to dozens of anti-Semitic acts: house doors spray-painted, JNF and Israel Bonds placards defaced with graffiti, synagogue windows shattered and tombstones overturned.

Perhaps a response to anti-Semitism would be our own assertion of who we are. Then perhaps God will not need to allow or grant these haters the power to express their hatred.

But hate they will. Anti-Semitism is of a perennial nature. Yearly, one is reminded of this in the immortal words of the Passover Haggadah: "Shebechol dor vador, omdim aleinu l'chalotainu" (For in every generation, they stand upon us in their intent of destroying us), "v'Hakadosh Baruch Hu, matzilainu m'yadam" (and God will save us from them).

Reading circle brings together Jews and Muslims

By NATALIE RUSKIN
Special to The CJN

One of the first things Atif Khalil's parents did when they moved to Toronto from Saudi Arabia during the Gulf War was to register their son in a private Christian school.

They believed the conservative values of private school, rather than the secular ones in public school, would better preserve their son's Muslim identity.

Fifteen years later and somewhat distanced from his parents' intentions, Khalil, 28, says he's been questioning religion ever since his early private school days.

"I started getting a hold of counter-missionary material and I'd engage in discussions with my Bible teacher," he says.

Khalil's intense curiosity about spirituality has led to his involvement in an unprecedented type of dialogue: a Jewish-Muslim spiritual text circle.

Participants discuss mystical texts from respective faiths

Once a month for the past two years, Khalil has joined Rabbi Aubrey Glazer of Beth Tzedec Congregation to lead a reading circle for Jews and Muslims.

Khalil acts as imam for the group, heading up the Muslim portion of prayer.

Every month, participants meet at either a synagogue or a mosque and discuss a different mystical text from their respective faiths.

Immersed in an intense PhD program in Medieval Islamic philosophy and Sufism (Islamic mysticism) at the University of Toronto, Khalil admits he often learns more from listening to Jewish and Muslim dialogue participants than from his own studying.

"In the process of retaining and strengthening our own spiritual identities, we somehow paradoxically arrive at a deeper appreciation of the others," he says.

Each session begins and ends with a prayer and a prolonged moment of silence. There is often a drumming or musical aspect, as well as a period of meditation.

The idea for a spiritual circle was developed by Khalil and Rabbi Glazer, also a U of T PhD student, after 9/11, when Khalil says he "felt a need to engage in dialogue with people of other traditions."

But unlike other Jewish-Muslim dialogues that were developed to ease Middle East tensions, Khalil argues that his group meets to explore the religion of the heart.

"From what I know, this kind of dialogue, which is rooted in spirituality, doesn't really exist in other parts of the world.

"We're trying to get beyond the forms and structures," he says.

"Often in the more political dialogues, religious differences are diluted to arrive at some commonality – if politics comes up, there's almost always some sort of conflict."

That's why Rabbi Glazer believes there is an unspoken agreement in the group never to discuss politics.

"Our hope is that, through engaging in the common path of these religions of the heart, we'll be able to come with new eyes to the political aspect," Rabbi Glazer says.

Over the past year, Toronto campuses have become hotbeds for Muslim-Jewish dialogues about the Middle East conflict.

In an effort to prevent the kind of violent protests that broke out two years ago at Concordia University in Montreal, and in response to continuing politicization of Muslim-Jewish tensions in Canada, students have started dialogue groups at U of T and York University.

In early January 2004, a group called Shalom-Salaam@York held a public event to introduce peaceful dialogue to York's increasingly polarized main campus.

Later that month, a student group at U of T called Muslim-Arab-Jewish Dialogue (MAJD) introduced its own dialogue day to the public.

"Muslims and Jews lived together for many years, but they never had the opportunity to get to know each other" says James Sevitt, 24, one of MAJD's founders.

Although Sevitt's group is more political, he shares Khalil's passion for connecting with those of other backgrounds.

"Dialogue taught me that often you discover who you are through other people. Someone says something and you realize, 'That's a value I believe in.'"

But Prof. Martin Lockshin, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, cautions against taking the cathartic dialogue route.

"Dialogue is not about opening up entirely and saying exactly how we feel," he says, adding that years of experience with Toronto interfaith organizations have taught him that "if people disagree with me, that too will be dialogue."

But Khalil is intent on taking the debate out of dialogue. His goal in the spiritual circle is not to learn more about the conflict in Israel.

"I think the fact that I don't read much about what's going on in Israel has made me more of a suitable candidate for spiritual dialogue," Khalil says.

When asked if, as a dialogue leader, he should be informed of the latest developments in Muslim-Jewish relations, Khalil shakes his head.

"Political conflict by nature pulls people to either side," he says.

"The modern world is obsessed with ideology and politics, and it's only accentuated today because we're living in a secular culture that tries to marginalize religion," he adds.

"The media is quite instrumental in fanning the flames of antagonism," Khalil says. "I guess the press finds they sell more papers when they have people saying outrageous stuff."

Career guru offers job advice to modern workers

Barbara Moses

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

People today are more likely than their parents or grandparents to evaluate their career choices, says Barbara Moses, the president of a career management company and author of several career planning books.

"If work was secure and did not interfere with other life commitments, there was no heightened consciousness about whether it had meaning or if it was satisfying," says Moses, whose latest book is What Next: The Complete Guide to Taking Control of Your Working Life.

Now, workers ask themselves what price they are paying to remain at their current job, she says. "They have become more sophisticated in thinking about their work. They have come to think of good work as a right, not a privilege.

"If people feel appreciated, and do not feel as if they have to constantly market themselves, they will stay. If work is perceived as being 'soulless', they will leave. They resent choosing between great work and a great life," she says.

> 'If work is perceived as being "soulless", they will leave'

Moses, president of BBM Human Resource Consultants Inc., is a columnist at the Globe and Mail who has been dubbed "Canada's Career Guru" by Fast Company magazine. She has appeared frequently on television, including the Today Show and Canada AM, and has been profiled in such newspapers as the Los Angeles Times and the Chicago Tribune and in Parenting magazine.

She says work plays a huge role in how we feel about ourselves. "Great work inspires us. Bad work can be soul-destroying."

She is fascinated, she says, with the conflict people feel between what they want and need in a job and what is available to them.

"[Studying work trends] is complex, because it brings together psychology, sociology, social psychology and career studies."

Her new book, geared to a broad audience, "is for young people, older people – anyone who works."

Featuring self-assessment tools, diagnostic instruments, quizzes and exercises, it enables readers to discover their talents, find their fit in 10 industry sectors, identify their best work configuration, overcome career challenges such as burn-out and boredom, and learn how express themselves in their work.

> 'They should understand the choices available and rethink what they need'

"Advice in the book is grounded in my intimate understanding of the workplace, and in an understanding of the complexities of people's lives today," Moses says.

"There are more work options available. People can work part-time from their home, work in several different arenas, or become self-employed.

"They should understand the choices available and rethink what they need. The major mistake people make is not defining their problem. They must figure out why they are hurting, and understand what they really want."

The foundation for making a meaningful career decision is an understanding of what motivates them, their special talents, "and what makes their soul sing," Moses says.

She considers her book a gift to her readers. "I want to give them the feeling that they can master their challenge. Many people feel burned out and unhappy, and there is nothing wrong with them. I'm telling them what they can do about it.

"This is the new reality, and here is what you can do to cope with it."

Clothing drive to benefit 300 Israeli students in need

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

In an effort to help close to 300 needy Israeli students, UJA Federation has organized a collection drive for clothing, personal items, school supplies and other goods.

These students, at the Kfar Galim Youth Village, located just south of Haifa, come from families who cannot supply even the most basic of needs.

Kfar Galim, established in 1953, is a secular, co-ed youth village offering junior high, high school and technical college study programs for 1,100 students, including the approximately 300 residents of the boarding school.

So far Toronto UJA volunteers have taken several large hockey equipment bags filled with a variety of arts and crafts supplies, school supplies - including a generous donation from Motek and Greg Konopny of Office Supercentre - and toiletries, to the youth village. Clothing drive organizers hope that when the joint UJA-Israel Bonds Solidarity Mission departs on May 17, participants who will be visiting Kfar Galim, will be able to deliver many more necessities.

Gary Samuel, a UJA campaign canvasser, and a past chair of the Real Estate division, feels that this project is particularly important because it benefits children.

"So far I've donated some clothes, jackets, and toiletries, just extra stuff we had around the house," says Samuel. "I heard about these kids and what UJA was hoping to do, and it struck me as very important because we could help youngsters – directly – by responding to their specific needs. If that wasn't enough impetus, the fact that I'm a father myself, gives me all the reasons to get involved in a project such as this."

Barry Zagdanski, who, along with 23 members of his extended family, are currently in Israel until after Pesach, donated one duffel bag of necessary items for the youngsters of Kfar Galim, and personally carried another three bags himself. Zagdanski will be visiting the youth village and will deliver the goods in person. "I'm honoured to be the delivery man, and to take these important day-to-day necessities to the students at Kfar Galim," says Zagdanski. "These are youngsters in real need, and UJA is doing the right thing, at the right time for them. They, like all Israelis, are certainly going through enough these days, and if we can help them in any way, that's simply what we must, and will do."

UJA Federation volunteers of all ages are helping to collect clothing and other necessities for 300 students at the Kfar Galim Youth Village.

Passover 2004

By ISAAC APTER
1st Year student at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life @ the University of Toronto

"In each and every generation they rise up against us to destroy us..."

Isaac Apter

Following the recent increase in attacks against Jews and Jewish institutions, these words from the Passover Haggadah have again come to life for Jewish Torontonians, as well as members of Jewish communities around the globe.

The story of Exodus teaches us that we left Egypt as the Nation of Israel through the saving power of G-d. But Passover is more than just a simple tribute to this 3,000 year old event. The Haggadah, throughout the course of the Seder, literally asks us to re-enact and re-live Pharaoh's enslavement of our people. Today's irony is that we do not need to be actors in order to have a taste of this ancient cruelty. All we have to do is open the local newspaper to read about the latest batch of anti-semitic graffiti around the city.

This rise of antisemitism can only be described as a new antisemitism in so far as anti-Zionist or anti-Israel sentiment is believed to be its stimulus. In substance, however, it is not a new phenomenon. It is simply a recycling of mediaeval myths - the blood libel, tales of well poisonings and accusations of murder, refitted to a new context. Antisemitism has shown its ugly face throughout the generations.

Nonetheless, it is precisely at these times when we are facing such challenges to our continued existence that we must remember the second half of the phrase mentioned above from the Passover Haggadah: "…And The Holy One, blessed be He, rescues us from their hands."

So when I sit down for the Seder this Passover, I will be sure to appreciate my heritage as if I "personally came out of Egypt." As someone who has personally received hate emails in my inbox simply because I am a Jew, I hope to change my feeling this Passover from that of fear to fortitude, from sadness to joyousness. Even though these events are occurring today, we can be comforted by the knowledge that we have gotten through times like these in the past with the help of G-d. These are my traditions - my bond to the past, my strength in the present and my hope for the future.

Tracing the roots of Zionism to Toronto

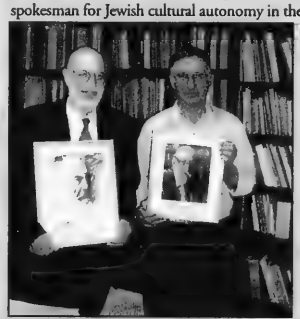
By WENDY LAMPERT
UJA Federation

When Toronto brothers David and Eleazar Birnbaum talk about their family history, it's with reverence and pride.

That's because their grandfather, Nathan Birnbaum, was a world-renowned Jewish religious thinker, writer and scholar who coined the term "Zionism."

Nathan Birnbaum is considered by many to be among the builders of modern Judaism. He was only 19 when he founded Kadimah in 1882, the first Jewish nationalist students' organization. In 1885, he founded and edited the first nationalist and Zionist journal, Selbst-Emanzipation, where he coined the term "Zionism." He was an early adherent of Theodor Herzl, and played a prominent part in the First Zionist Congress in 1897.

However, Nathan left the Zionist movement after he and Herzl developed ideological differences. He had begun to question the political aims of Zionism and to attach increasing importance to the national-cultural elements of Judaism. He became a leading spokesman for Jewish cultural autonomy in the Diaspora, stressing the Yiddish language as the basis of Ashkenazi Jewish culture. In the years preceding World War I he gradually abandoned his materialistic and secular outlook and turned to religion, eventually embracing Orthodoxy, which he practiced and preached until his death in 1937.



Brothers Eleazar and David Birnbaum (l-r) hold pictures of their grandfather, Nathan, and father, Solomon, in the Nathan and Solomon Birnbaum Archives in Toronto.

"My grandfather developed three major Jewish movements of the twentieth century; I'm very proud of that," says David.

David and Eleazar's father, Solomon Birnbaum, was a world expert on Yiddish and other Jewish languages, as well as Hebrew paleography, or the study of the development of ancient Hebrew writings and inscriptions. Their uncle, Uriel Birnbaum, was a poet and artist, some of whose works have been reproduced in stained glass at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The brothers say the Birnbaum family tree can be traced back more than 1,000 years, and includes connections to key figures in Jewish history, such as famed biblical commentator Rashi and Rabbi Joseph Caro, author of the Shulchan Arukh, the medieval code of Jewish law.

"I've always had a sense of our history," says Eleazar of his family tree. "It gives me a sense of our place in the world – I'm a link in a chain," notes the professor of Near Eastern languages, who taught at the University of Toronto.

David, an architect and city planner by training, now spends 40 to 50 hours a week maintaining and developing the family archives, which include thousands of letters, reports, books and other writings by and about Nathan and Solomon Birnbaum and other members of the family.

"We get so many requests that this is a full-time job for me," David notes. "My grandfather had such a rich and intense life in many spheres, and people are interested in that."

The Birnbaum family's connection to Toronto began in 1964, when Eleazar was offered a job teaching at University of Toronto. David, who was living in England at the time, was persuaded by his older brother to join him in Canada.

"He wanted us to come, so we came with my family, and brought my parents," notes David. They all lived together in one house, where Solomon continued his work until shortly before his death in 1989 at the age of 98.

This prolific family has made an important imprint on world Jewish history.

"My grandfather and my father – they were great innovators," notes Eleazar. "Through them, I feel very much linked to our Jewish past, and to the Jewish future."

Support for Toronto's Jewish community flourishes

Faith and ethno-cultural groups lend support

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Following the ongoing series of antisemitic attacks throughout the Greater Toronto Area over the past few weeks, support from Toronto's non-Jewish community continues to flourish.

Many of the 3,500 people in attendance at the March 24th UJA Federation – Canadian Jewish Congress community gathering in solidarity against hate and antisemitism, were from outside the Jewish community, and since the event many have come forward to offer their support.

Representatives of two churches quickly offered their properties as new locations for UJA Federation lawn signs, many of which have been victimized by antisemitic graffiti in recent weeks.

Canon Linda Nichols of Holy Trinity Anglican Church in Thornhill put a UJA sign up on the front lawn of her church on March 23rd as a sign of support for the Jewish community, and the response has been overwhelming.

"We've had so many calls from all people, Jews and non-Jews alike, thanking us for doing this, for standing up to this type of unacceptable behaviour," says Canon Nichols. "During my sermon on Sunday, I addressed my congregation as to why I decided to erect the sign here, and they were all extremely supportive. Another member of the church plays bridge with Jewish men each week and he saw – firsthand – the pain they were in because of this rash of antisemitism. He was especially proud to see the UJA sign up here."

Reverend Brent Hawkes of the Metropolitan Community Church of Toronto was only too happy to lend his church – and support – to the Jewish community.

"I was at the March 24th rally, and I must say, it was an incredibly strong and emotional experience for me," says Reverend Hawkes. "The Board of the church, as well as our congregation were so thrilled and proud to see that we had placed a UJA sign on our property. Our congregants share a very strong sense of empathy for what our Jewish neighbours have been going through, and the calls and conversations I've had with members of our congregation have been overwhelmingly supportive."

In a letter sent to Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region, Reverend Samuel J. Bianco and Reverend Damian MacPherson of the Archdiocese of Toronto wrote: "Sometimes silence can be construed as consent. It is, therefore, incumbent upon us to forcefully express our condemnation and strongest protest against the recent antisemitic activities which… are totally contrary to our Canadian and Christian values."

In a press release, the Jaffari Islamic Centre in Thornhill wrote: "No cause could ever be assisted by such immoral acts. Personal freedoms of religion and self-expression cannot and should not be allowed to be compromised no matter what differences may exist between different groups."

"Any time this type of hate is perpetrated, the Christian community stands against it," says Canon Nichols. "It's like it says on the UJA sign itself, 'what will tomorrow hold if we don't act today?' That's true for all of us, regardless of background. It's a wake up call for everybody reminding us that we must be vigilant and let people know this type of activity is not what we want in this wonderful, multicultural city."

Our Cup Runneth Over!

Members of the UJA Federation Business Cabinet hit the gridiron last week in a special Toronto Argonauts program held at the SkyDome. The event featured a guest panel of Argos insiders, including longtime Campaign volunteers and Argos co-owners David Cynamon and Howard Sokolowski. Moderating the discussion was mayoral runner-up, and former CFL Commissioner, John Tory. Participants had the opportunity to have their photos taken with the Grey Cup.

Beauty of Toronto's synagogues captured for all to enjoy

UJA Federation's Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) – which boasts the largest collection of synagogue records in Canada – along with Ryerson University, recently launched a virtual exhibit entitled Toronto's First Synagogues.

This collaborative effort, funded by Canada's Digital Collections of Industry Canada, captures the beauty and rich history of Toronto's oldest synagogues.

Robert Burley, a professor of photography at Ryerson University, and a prominent architectural photographer who has had his work displayed at exhibits around the world, presented the idea to Ellen Scheinberg, Director of the OJA.

"Mr. Burley contacted me to see if the images of the synagogues could be linked to the related archival documents, which he felt would help provide some background and context to his photographs," says Scheinberg. "That's exactly what we've been able to do with this exciting and innovative exhibit."

"The exhibit is intended to be tackled in three stages," says Scheinberg. "The first phase involves the inclusion of three of the original synagogues: the First Narayever, the Kiever and Knesseth Israel synagogues. Over the course of the next two years, we will attempt to include as many as 20 to 25 synagogues, which were established before the 1950s, to the site. We are also planning to add an educational component to the display, in order to link it to the high school curriculum within both the Jewish as well as public school systems in Toronto and North York."

Toronto's First Synagogues begins with an introduction written by Dr. Stephen Speisman, a Toronto historian, and Executive Director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park, which provides background information about the history of Toronto's Jewish community and the synagogues.

The site also includes many of Burley's photographs, which are integrated with close to 100 images of archival documents, photographs and works of art. There is also a multi-media section at the end of the display, containing audio and video clips.

Former Toronto rabbi works with students on Young Judaea program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Young Judaea's Year Course for recent high school graduates will be one of the beneficiaries – as a long-term program for overseas students – of a new $10 million (US) initiative of the Jewish Agency.

"A part of me feels guilty, because there are other sectors of society that could use that kind of infusion much more, but at the same time, in the long term... it will likely increase the chances of aliyah for the North American Jewish population, and that will ultimately benefit Israeli society in a different way," said Rabbi Howard Markose, the program's director of education, in an interview last week at the offices of Canadian Young Judaea.

Rabbi Howard Markose

Rabbi Markose, 46, was in Toronto following a stop in his hometown of Minneapolis, to promote the program, which was established almost 50 years ago. No stranger to Toronto, Rabbi Markose lived here for 10 years, serving as spiritual leader at Shaar Shalom Congregation and, prior to that, as assistant rabbi at Adath Israel Congregation.

He and his wife Judy, a former director of Camp Ramah Canada, left with their children to make aliyah a decade ago. For the past four years, he has served at Beth Sholom Congregation on the High Holy Days.

The Jerusalem-based rabbi's affiliation with the Young Judaea program, an affiliate of Hadassah, dates back to 1994, when as a new oleh he juggled a part-time teaching position there with four other jobs. He continued teaching part-time while serving as rabbi of Kehilat Moreshet Avraham, a Masorti congregation in Jerusalem, for seven years.

"I love what I do. I really enjoy the program," Rabbi Markose said. He believes it's a "natural next step" for teenagers leaving high school.

The multi-faceted, non-denominational program – which has 240 participants this year, including two Canadians, 169 Americans, more than 50 from Great Britain and the rest from the Israeli scouting program Tzofim – includes a community service component, which can be in one of several locations in Israel, as well as Jerusalem-based classes of 12 to 18 students, said the rabbi, naming about half a dozen Canadian universities that give credit for them.

Hebrew classes are mandatory, as is learning about Zionism. Other subjects include the Arab-Israeli Conflict, Introduction to the Jewish Bookshelf, Tanach and Jerusalem and Zionism. Credits are granted through the University of Judaism College-in-Israel, an affiliate of its namesake in Los Angeles.

"The great thing is that we learn about it in a classroom atmosphere, then set foot on the place we're teaching in class," said Rabbi Markose.

A compulsory campus activism seminar to help students learn to advocate for Israel, regardless of their political leanings, is also part of the program. The seminar predates current campus conflicts linked to the Israeli-Palestinian situation.

Tuition fees equivalent to $18,100 include airfare from New York, room and board, medical insurance and field trips. As a result of the new funding – which was approved following a meeting of 11 participants with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and other high-level officials – scholarships of $5,000 (US) will be offered on a needs basis.

The grants are also being utilized for recruitment, said Rabbi Markose, adding that 300 students are expected to participate next year.

Other specific "tracks" of the program include Marva, which offers a taste of Israeli army service; and Shalem, a program with yeshiva-type classes for Orthodox participants who choose it. The regular program, whose participants reflect the spectrum of Jewish observance, offers kosher facilities and is publicly Shabbat-observant.

Because of the intifadah, program organizers have had to impose more restrictions, balancing supervision with promotion of independence, said Rabbi Markose. "It's a challenge," he said.

Although there are no formal expectations for most of the participants on their return – aside from the British contingent, which commits to two years as Zionist youth leaders – Rabbi Markose said, "We certainly want to encourage them to use their leadership skills...to share their experience on the Year Course. Our goal is to promote a love for Israel."

Further information may be obtained from Rabbi Markose at markose@hadassah.org.il, or from the Canadian Young Judaea office in Toronto. Applications are still being accepted, although the deadline has technically passed.

Relatives add stress commenting on eating habits

By LISA WEINBERG

About Nutrition

Q. I have a beautiful, healthy, active one-year-old daughter who is thriving, but my mother continues to put stress on my husband and me by continuously commenting on how small she is and what a light eater. I am tired of my extended family policing my daughter's eating habits. How do I handle this problem?

A. I am so glad you asked this question. I see at least one patient per week, where the parent is fine, the doctor and I agree there is no problem, but well-intending extended family or teachers believe otherwise and openly offer their advice and opinion.

We (mothers and bubbies) take the responsibility of feeding our children very seriously, so I do acknowledge that most of these relatives mean well. But please leave unsolicited opinions at home. If the child is thriving, meeting his or her age-appropriate milestones and growing (the rate of growth will vary widely among children), then there is no cause for concern. Please re-consider adding additional stress to a mother's life.

Q. There is so much conflicting information about vitamin supplements. Can they really prevent diseases like colds, cancer and heart disease?

A. Much research is being done in this field. There is no clear evidence that vitamins can prevent common colds, although some people believe vitamin C and zinc can make you feel better when you have a cold.

With regard to more serious illnesses like cancer and heart disease, there is no definitive answer about vitamin supplementation in prevention of these diseases. However, there is much interest in the study of phytochemicals, compounds found in fruit and vegetables, and their potential roles in preventing the onset of cancers. Phytochemicals act like antioxidants and protect cells from damage. There are hundreds of phytochemicals and the best way to get them is by eating a wide variety of vegetables and fruit. Focus on broccoli, Brussels sprouts and cauliflower. Phytochemicals are released when these are chewed and cooked, so taking a pill may not provide the best defence.

Q. I enjoy green tea. Does it have a lot of caffeine?

A. Green tea has about 50 mg of caffeine per cup, about one-quarter of coffee's caffeine content, but it is available in decaf now.

Q. I have read that selenium is a mineral we need more of and that it may be a preventive against cancer. What food sources contain selenium?

A. Brazil nuts are the best source. One-quarter of a cup, four to five nuts, will give you your daily requirement.

Q. I find I often crave a piece of cheddar cheese at the end of the day. Why is this?

A. Aged cheeses like cheddar have actually been known to release a relaxed feeling, and this is likely what drives your craving.

Q. For the past several years, I have been eating more fish – tuna and salmon mostly – and I am disturbed about the recent reports stating that these types of fish are high in contaminants. I was eating fish because I thought it was healthier. Now I'm thinking it's not. What are we to do?

A. This is a concern for many. Very large fish tend to be more at risk for contamination because they are older, and fish with high fat content, like salmon, store contaminants in the fat.

Here is the bottom line as it stands to date. When eating tuna, choose light over white tuna. It has half the mercury. Choose canned over fresh tuna more often. Avoid fresh tuna if you are pregnant and limit canned tuna if you are planning to get pregnant and for children.

For salmon, farmed salmon contains substantially higher fat content than wild salmon and therefore has higher levels of contaminants. Fish labelled Atlantic salmon is farmed. Otherwise it is labelled wild salmon. Wild salmon has a slightly stronger flavour. Most canned salmon is wild unless otherwise labelled.

The interesting issue though is that the levels measured in cooked salmon, both wild and farmed, appear to be about equal. It is believed that cooking methods like grilling or broiling allow the fat to drain off.

Scientists mostly still believe that the health benefits outweigh the risks in consuming fish.

When preparing salmon, remove all skin and brown areas of fat before cooking, then cook to drain away as much fat as possible.

Remember too that smaller fish species may be less at risk, so include all types of fish in your diet.

David Zimmer, M.P.P.
Willowdale

On Monday, March 22nd, in response to anti-Semitic vandalism across the city, David Zimmer, MPP, Willowdale, made the following statement in the Ontario legislature:

HATE CRIMES

"Mr. David Zimmer (Willowdale): ... Ontario has long stood as a model for diversity, openness and tolerance. Toronto's citizens come from 169 countries, making it the most multicultural and multiracial city in the world. Sadly, however, even here, we are not immune from racism and intolerance. This past weekend, my riding, Willowdale, and other ridings saw vicious anti-Semitic attacks. At Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park Cemetery, 27 headstones were toppled, six benches were knocked over and a menorah was struck down. There was $20,000 in damage. But the real cost cannot be calculated in dollars. It is counted in tears, in sleepless nights, in locked doors and in anxiety. ...

How angry must a person be to destroy 27 grave markers - not simply one or two grave markers, but to spend the time and energy and anger in knocking over 27? How filled with hate a person must be to cause this pain to others.

I know everyone - everyone in this legislature wants to end this intolerance. We look forward to a day when racial and religious intolerance will be stamped out in every community, in every town and city, in every part of the world. But we must also do everything we can to eliminate it from here, from our own communities as well, because it still lurks. It lurks in the dark heart and in the evil mind. Our obligation is to be ever vigilant against it."

'Sept. 11 was used to protect Zionist interests'

"If they can't criminalize the Muslim community, there must be some major cataclysmic type of criminal activity… so they need something that would jolt public opinion into perceiving everything that is Islamic as terrorist. Without Sept. 11, they wouldn't have been able to do that," he said.

"Sept. 11 was used by the Israeli Zionists, who by now had their representatives in those sectors of people called neo-conservatives [who were] all steering American policy to protect Israeli Zionist interests."

Al-Asi was part of an event titled "From Ground Zero to Islamophobia: Who Are the Victims?" that was hosted by seven different campus organizations, including the Muslim Action Network, the Muslim Student Association, the Middle Eastern Student Association, the Pakistani Student Association and the Pakistani Student Federation.

According to the Anti-Defamation League, al-Asi has also accused Israel of carrying out the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center after the United States refused Israel's request to have the Americans suppress the Palestinian intifadah.

In an article that appears on the Muslim Student Association website (last updated in November 2003) at the University of Missouri, St. Louis, about Salman Rushdie, al-Asi defends the fatwa issued against the British author.

"Any Muslim who renounces Islam has, in Allah's judgement, forfeited his right to live," al-Asi said.

"In due time, sooner or later, Rushdie will surface and a Muslim around at the time and place will fulfill his duty. But at this point in time, there are history-breaking events and earth-shaking developments which shall never be overshadowed.

"The Israeli Zionist [sic] are the true and legitimate object of liquidation. A new generation of death-defying youth are motivated by Islam, and Islam alone, to challenge and destroy the racism and nationalism of Tel Aviv's politicians. Israel is running out of time and all the politicians know it."

In his own promotional material for his lectures and CDs, al-Asi describes himself as "sharing with us [the late Iranian leader] Imam Khomeini's insights and understandings from the real world."

Canadian Jewish Congress and Hillel of Greater Toronto have sent letters of complaint to York University, but they had not received a response as of The CJN's deadline.

In its complaint, Hillel said that "the spread of such falsehoods" and "hateful words" is "harmful to York's academic environment," and it urged the university to monitor such events in the future and "publicly condemn the hateful speech… that instead of increasing tolerance and understanding of a serious issue, promoted intolerance and hostility towards a targeted group on campus."

"From Ground Zero to Islamophobia: Who are the Victims?" was promoted via e-mail as "an effort to raise awareness of and combat unfair discrimination and harassment, anti-Muslim prejudice and racism through constructive and proactive educational means and represent unity in diversity."

The evening began with a slide show of military personnel oppressing Muslim civilians around the world while a song played in the background that included the chorus "Why do we stand by spectating while our brothers cry jihad? We are bound by one conviction. We believe in Allah."

The other main speaker of the evening, Zafar Bangash, director of the Toronto-based Institute of Contemporary Islamic Thought, also spoke about 9/11. The institute is described on its website as "an intellectual centre of the global Islamic movement."

"There was Osama bin Laden sitting in a cave plotting these fantastic events and no one in the United States knew about this?" Bangash asked.

He also challenged the audience to consider whether bin Laden disabled the entire U.S. Air Force.

"It is standard policy that as soon as a plane goes off a flight path, the air force is mobilized to intercept the plane. Where was the U.S. Air Force?"

Bangash spoke about several conspiracy theories, including allegations that Canadian corporations defrauded Canadian taxpayers out of $2.5 billion in order to make banks Y2K compliant.

"Now this happened in Canada. You can imagine what goes on in the United States," he said.

Bangash also complained about the lack of leadership in the Muslim community in Toronto.

"Any screwball can get up… [and] give their two-bit opinion about Islam."

Referring to television appearances by Irshad Manji, the Toronto author of the best-selling book The Trouble with Islam, he said, "Even [a lesbian] claims to be a spokesperson for the Muslims," adding later that she doesn't belong in the Muslim community.

In a statement, York University said it "is committed to free speech and the right of individuals to express controversial opinions, provided statements made are within the laws of Canada, specifically criminal anti-hate law."

The school said it "is confirming the nature of comments made by a visiting U.S speaker at a student event at York. We understand that comments were made which were deeply offensive to members of the Jewish community. In response, the university will convey these concerns to event organizers and reiterate to our students that while free speech is a democratic right, mutual respect of others and conduct that rejects hatred is a fundamental responsibility of all York students."

Event organizers could not be reached for comment by The CJN's deadline.

U of T conference looks at Holocaust in Holland

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Holocaust in Holland, which decimated three-quarters of Dutch Jewry, was the subject of a day-long academic conference at the University of Toronto late last month.

Held at the Munk Center for International Studies under the auspices of the Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Chair in Holocaust Studies, the forum attracted speakers from Holland, Israel, Canada and the United States.

Historian Michael Marrus, the occupant of that chair, opened the conference saying the topic was important because the Holocaust had a "devastating" impact on the Netherlands.

Citing a sombre statistic, he said that 102,000 of Holland's estimated 140,000 Jews were killed by the Germans. Seventeen thousand Jews were hidden by Dutch Christians.

The level of the massacre in Holland – whose tolerant treatment of Jews was widely regarded as a model of fairness – was one of the worst in Nazi-occupied Europe, he said.

In an attempt to explain the high murder rate, Ian Buruma, a journalist and a professor at Bard College in New York, suggested that Dutch society valued conformity and did not encourage resistance and heroism.

As a result, the law-abiding Dutch did not "stick out their necks" and "looked the other way" as Germany began to implement its anti-Jewish campaign.

Buruma, who is half-Jewish, also noted that Jewish survivors tended to be assimilated.

Pim Griffioen, a member of the Netherlands Organization for Scientific Research, argued there is no "monocausal reason" why 75 per cent of Dutch Jews perished.

Johannes Houwink ten Cate, a University of Amsterdam scholar whose paper was read by Marrus, said the Dutch civil service co-operated with the "Nazi apparatus" and that there was no shortage of local collaborators.

Griffioen agreed that Dutch and German administrators established "effective co-operation" in carrying out anti-Jewish measures.

When Dutch public servants began resisting Germany's anti-Semitic policy, they were told their intervention on behalf of Jews would not be tolerated.

According to ten Cate, Germany's occupation turned more brutal after the 1943 Battle of Stalingrad.

Ron Zeller, representing the Netherlands Organization for Scientific Research, said organized Dutch opposition to the occupation did not emerge until 1943.

In a paper on Dutch public opinion and the Holocaust, University of Leiden historian Bart van der Boom said the majority of people in Holland strongly disapproved of Germany's anti-Semitic policies.

"It's clearly false that the Dutch were indifferent," van der Boom said.

But he said the issues that most preoccupied them were food scarcities and Germany's forced labour policy.

Michael Marrus

Van der Boom said the average Dutch citizen assumed that the persecution of Jews was intended as a German show of force and a sign of Germany's intention to subjugate Holland. Few equated the deportation of Jews with Germany's plan to exterminate European Jewry.

"They did not think that deportations meant death for Jews," he said.

Most believed Jews would be put to work in labour battallions rather than be murdered.

Robert Jan van Pelt, a University of Waterloo expert on the Holocaust, said the Dutch failed the Jews by virtue of their inability to protect them.

Dan Michman of Bar Ilan University said that, contrary to the situation elsewhere in Europe, documentation on the persecution of Jews is fairly abundant in Holland.

That claim ran counter to ten Cate's assertion that more than 90 per cent of such documents had been destroyed by the Germans.

Deborah Dwork of Clark University said the German Jewish refugees who streamed into Holland after Hitler's rise to power in 1933 usually presented themselves as Germans.

They refused to give up their German identity precisely because the Nazis had tried to rob them of it, she said.

Henry Schogt, who was born and raised in Holland and who later married a Jew, said his parents opened their home to Jews during the German occupation.

"They made a choice to resist," said Schogt, a retired scholar. "We belonged to a minority of like-minded citizens."

In a lecture called "Remembering Anne Frank," University of Indiana English professor Alvin Rosenfeld described her as the 20th century's "best known victim."

Moderates win Concordia student elections

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – A moderate slate was elected to the executive of the Concordia Student Union (CSU) in a vote held late last month.

New Evolution, which was supported by Hillel, is seen as the heir to the current executive, Evolution, Not Revolution. Its administration has been marked by a significant reduction in the politicization that rocked Concordia University in the previous three years, when the CSU was dominated by a far-left faction.

New Evolution's Brent Farrington, currently a CSU vice-president, heads the eight-member slate, which pledged to increase services to students and downplay activism.

A record 4,671 voters participated in the March 23 to 25 election, representing about 15 per cent of the 30,075 undergraduates eligible to vote. In percentage terms, the turnout was about the same as last year, and well above the 10 per cent or less who usually cast ballots in previous years.

New Evolution, which takes office in June for the 2004-2005 year, received 2,336 votes, beating the left-leaning runner-up Concordians in Action, which received 1,664 votes. Four slates were on the ballot.

New Evolution's platform included a promise to get four-hour parking meters, a pledge to fight to maintain the tuition freeze and opposition to a computerized plagiarism program.

The elections also filled 30 seats on the CSU Council of Representatives, two on the university senate, and two on the board of governors. Hillel activists Rachel Guy and Adam Spiro succeeded in getting elected to the council.

Pledge to downplay activism

Another 14 students that Hillel supported because of what the Jewish campus group called their "moderate, representative views" were elected to the council. Hillel also supported Tyler Wordsworth, a current CSU executive member and one of two students voted onto the board of governors.

Hillel waged an active campaign to get the vote out, believing that apathy was the reason extremist groups had been able to take control of the CSU in the past.

Hillel past-president Noah Sarna said before the election that he was concerned students might become complacent because of the peace on campus this year. Because Evolution, Not Revolution has done such a good job, he said, there are far fewer grievances against the CSU than in the past and that might mean students wouldn't bother voting.

The Concordia University Alumni Association reportedly spent $25,000 on a communications blitz urging students to vote that included direct mailings and ads in several newspapers.

The Diary of Anne Frank has been translated into about 60 languages and bought by 25 million readers since its publication in the late 1940s.

He criticized the fact that Frank's Jewish identity has often been downplayed so that her story will appeal to a universal audience.

Frank's father, Otto, who survived the war, preferred her diary to be seen as an upbeat and inspirational protest against war and racism rather than as a tragic tale of a Jewish teenager who succumbed to a slow, miserable death in Bergen-Belsen.

The Diary of Anne Frank notwithstanding, the Holocaust was not widely discussed in Holland before the trial of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann, said Buruma, who was born in The Hague in 1951.

By the mid-1960s, the fate of the Jews was inextricably associated with Holland's plight during the war.

And it was fashionable to be philo-Semitic and pro-Israel.

But philo-Semitism – and love of Israel – have gone out of fashion in Holland today, Buruma said.

He said he recently attended a soccer game there, where fans shouted "Death to Jews" and mimicked the hissing sound of gas.

The Dutch like to portray themselves as great anti-Nazi resisters, he said, but "various shades of grey" have since smudged that picture.

"A disturbing amount of Nazi anti-Semitic propaganda [has] stuck to [them]," he said.

Yiddish classes to start at York U this fall

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

York University's Centre for Jewish Studies is offering Yiddish language courses beginning this fall.

"This is an important development at York for our Jewish students and for those interested in a deeper understanding of life in eastern Europe before the Holocaust," says the centre's director, Prof. Martin Lockshin.

The courses are offered through the Committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Prof. Kalman Weiser, who is currently the Silber Family Chair for the Study of the Holocaust and Eastern European Jewry, will be the course director.

A Yiddishist and expert on eastern European Jewry, Weiser, 31, has been teaching modern and European Jewish history, the Holocaust and anti-Semitism at York for two years.

"We are fortunate to have Prof. Weiser begin this exciting track as it complements his work and study in this field," Lockshin says. "He is very popular among the students at York. All of his courses are filled to capacity."

Ethel Cooper, chair of the Committee for Yiddish, says the establishment of Yiddish courses at York is the realization of one of the committee's long-standing goals.

"Now, thousands of Jewish students, including those preparing to become Jewish studies teachers, will have the opportunity to reconnect with Yiddish, the thousand-year-old language that is the foundation of Ashkenazi Jewish culture."

Lockshin says students have asked for these courses and "we are happy to respond to student interest. By responding to a need, we are also raising the status of Yiddish, showing people that the university is giving appropriate recognition as Yiddish as an integral part of European Jewish identity."

He says the courses "complement" the Silber Family Chair for the Study of the Holocaust and Eastern European Jewry and York's Jewish Teachers Education Program, which trains the largest number of teachers for Jewish schools in Canada.

York University currently has more than 4,000 Jewish students, Lockshin says.

"We have a thriving Jewish education program and with [Toronto's] Jewish population moving closer to York University, it is likely that we will have an even larger share of Jewish students."

A native of New York City, Weiser has a PhD in Yiddish from Columbia University. He has taught courses on Yiddish at Columbia and the University of Washington at Seattle.

Weiser says the image of Yiddish has been in flux since the late 18th century.

"The Jewish enlightenment [haskalah] typically vilified the traditional vernacular of Ashkenazi Jewry as a marker of Jewish insularity and backwardness," he says. "As Jews modernized and integrated into general society in the 19th and 20th centuries, many left behind Yiddish because of its association with poverty and Jewish distinctiveness."

The Jewish population's socio-economic advancement, along with its acculturation, led to the decline of Yiddish usage in the 20th century. That decline was hastened by the Holocaust.

"Today, a new attitude toward Yiddish, especially among young Jews, is emerging as Jews become more at ease with their Canadian, American and Israeli identities and as distance and nostalgia grows from the immigrant generation," Weiser says.

"Yiddish is less and less associated with poverty and foreignness and increasingly being recognized as a storehouse of 1,000 years of Ashkenazi life."

Weiser says Yiddish is now firmly ensconced in elite universities in North America, Israel and Europe.

He adds that Yiddish is the original language of Jewish modernity – the language of 19th- and 20th-century Jewish politics, literature, theatre and music.

Weiser expects the Yiddish classes will attract not only Jews interested in learning about their ancestry and the language of the contemporary chassidic world, but also ethnographers, musicologists, linguists and historians.

"With record enrolments in Yiddish classes around the world, I think the research of Canadian Yiddish culture is an up and coming field," he says.

The first course in Beginners Yiddish will be held on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons from 2:30 to 4:30 p.m. and is open to credit or audit students. For more information, call 416-736-5823.

Richler 'too hot to handle' for many universities

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Mordecai Richler once said, in observing that Jews needed a 75 per cent average to get into McGill University, while gentiles required only 60 per cent, that he failed on both counts.

One can only wonder what he would have thought of the two-day Richler Challenge last month at McGill, the first academic symposium of its kind on the writer, who died almost three years ago.

About 150 professors, students, writers, publishers and members of the public, as well as his wife Florence, participated in the event, organized by the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada. The goal was to examine Richler's literary legacy, as well as his impact as a polemicist.

It was not intended to be a dry dissection of his work – although there was some of that. The event had a show-biz feel to it: Hana Gartner, host of CBC's The Fifth Estate, acted as mistress of ceremonies, and it was filmed by Canadian Learning Television.

Despite Richler's status in Canada, the event's organizers said little scholarly attention is paid to him and, in fact, not a single "Richler scholar" could be found to take part. The closest was David Brauner, director of American studies at Britain's University of Reading, author of a paper comparing Philip Roth, Saul Bellow and Richler.

Richler's work is not taught much in universities in Canada or abroad. His novels are not easy to classify and don't fit neatly into literature or Canadian studies courses. One session was called "Is Richler Canadian Content?" – something Toronto writer David Macfarlane thinks would have "infuriated" Richler because he hated "the idea of limiting literature by national identity."

Although Richler often disparaged Western Canada, his work is more likely to be taught in universities there. Certainly, he rarely turns up at McGill.

University of Toronto English professor Donna Bennett said some women professors find Richler's protagonists too chauvinistic. She said satire also dates quickly and many young people today don't understand his cultural references.

Neil Besner, who teaches Canadian literature at the University of Winnipeg, thinks Richler is simply too "impolitic" for our "deferential culture."

"He's too raw, too apt to jangle sensitivities," Besner said.

As symposium co-organizer Ken Whyte, a former editor of the National Post and Saturday Night magazine who worked with Richler for 10 years, said, Richler "may be too hot to handle," but he believes academia has a responsibility to keep Richler's important contribution to literature alive.

Prof. Glenn Deer of the University of British Columbia agreed, saying Richler could be relevant to a new generation for what he had to say about the immigrant experience and inter-ethnic relations.

University of Calgary graduate student Blair Munro, obsessed with Richler since he read The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz in high school, said if he has any say, he will see that Richler's work continues to be taught.

Retired Concordia University English professor Mervin Butovsky said Richler's depiction of Jews does not support the perception that he was a self-hating Jew. His writing shows a "humour bordering on sentimentality. It is essentially moral and didactic."

Butovsky said he captured how Montreal Jews of his generation, who had unprecedented opportunity professionally and economically, were haunted by the ghetto they grew up in.

Joel Yanofsky, author of Mordecai & Me: An Appreciation of a Kind, said Richler and the Jewish community had a "love-hate relationship."

"They were co-dependent; both sides needed the other. He liked pissing people off and they expected it… Jews wanted to have pride in him but couldn't. Mordecai Richler recognized he was a disappointment; he just didn't care."

Brauner said Richler's Duddy character is stereotypical, but he is "unashamed and unselfconscious of being Jewish, which is a rarity among the compulsively self-analyzing Jewish protagonists in American literature. Richler refused to patronize or normalize Duddy."

McGill sociology professor Morton Weinfeld said Richler's Jewish identity was at the core of his writing, fiction and non-fiction.

"He was raised in an intensely Jewish milieu and [at the] time of the Holocaust and birth of Israel… When he rebelled, he knew exactly what it was against."

Richler was insecure like many Jews, especially those who came from an immigrant, working-class background, he said.

Had Richler attended the recent conference on anti-Semitism in Montreal, he would have satirized the "palpable" insecurity, "but would have understood it."

Weinfeld said Quebec intellectuals misunderstand Richler if they think he was "anti-Québécois" for lampooning the language laws or exposing the province's anti-Semitic past.

Both Jews and francophones tend to be defensive and resentful of outside criticism, he pointed out.

"I think we should give Richler the benefit of the doubt."

Retired La Presse columnist Gerald Leblanc, who wrote a rebuttal to Richler's sensational 1991 New Yorker magazine essay about Quebec, was in no mood to do that. He is still angry over what he sees as Richler's "lies" and cavalier dismissal of Quebecers as racists. He considers Richler a "great" novelist, "but the other stuff is pretty heavy for me… I hate it."

Attention on Mideast obscures brutal civil war in Sudan

"The most vicious ethnic cleansing you've never heard of is unfolding here in the south-eastern fringes of the Sahara Desert," Nicholas Kristof wrote in a riveting New York Times column ("Ethnic Cleansing, Again," March 24). "It's a campaign of murder, rape and pillage by Sudan's Arab rulers that has forced 700,000 black African Sudanese to flee their villages."

Kirstof provides many horrifying details on how the Arab rulers of northern Sudan continue, after 20 years of civil war, to oppress the blacks of the south – who are mostly Christian and animist – killing large numbers and driving others from their villages, especially those near the Sudan-Chad border.

The UN's Sudan co-ordinator, Mukesh Kapila, has characterized the situation as similar to the Rwanda genocide of 1994. He is quoted as saying: "This is ethnic cleansing. This is the world's greatest humanitarian crisis, and I don't know why the world isn't doing more about it."

Kristof writes: "Sudan's leaders should not be able to get away with mass murder just because they are shrewd enough to choose victims who inhabit a poor region without airports, electricity or paved roads."

Inaccessibility and the lack of modern amenities partly explains why so little international attention is being focused on one of the world's greatest on-going tragedies. The media can't easily get to the story. The opposite conditions apply to, say, Israel. In Jerusalem or Tel Aviv, journalists can descend in great numbers to report on a hot story, broadcast it from modern, well-equipped studios, and then return to their luxury hotels or apartments and otherwise lead normal, First-World lives.

The story in Sudan is also being suppressed because of the Sudanese government's hostility toward journalists. But even more important, surely, is the West's cultural indifference to the tragic circumstances of Africans in general. Some call this racism.

Consider, for example, the paucity of stories coming out of the Congo, where some four million people have died in the past five years alone because of war and its effects, or the lack of reports from Algeria, where more than 100,000 people have been butchered in a decade of civil religious strife. Taken in this context, the indifference to Sudan becomes the norm rather than the exception.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

"In the 21st century, no government should be allowed to carry out ethnic cleansing, driving 700,000 people from their homes," writes Kristof. "If we turn away simply because the victims are African tribespeople who have the misfortune to speak no English, have no phones and live in one of the most remote parts of the globe, then shame on us."

Kirstof says Sudan should be hauled before the UN Security Council and the world community and be forced to halt its "pogroms." Good luck! The United Nations has been rendered next to useless by its blinding obsession with Israel, due to the power of the Arab/Third World automatic majority bloc and the increasingly appeasement-oriented European Union.

It is almost inconceivable that "the world community" will wake up and pay attention to the sad fate of hundreds of thousands of poor, brutalized people in southern Sudan.

הופתעתי לטובה מעיתונאים קנדיים שלענו לכל מנלנלי העיתים שנינו את ישראל על חיסול יאסיר. הם חזיבירו שבמצב מלחמה חיסלו ארה"ב, אנגליה, צרפת, כל אחת בתורה ובזמן שהתאים לה, את אויביהן. ואיש אינו חולק על כך שישראל נמצאת במצב מלחמה עם החמאס.

ערד איש יקר שנפטר בשיבה רעה הוא אבו עבאס. בשנת שמנים וחמש הוא פיקד על הטיפת אנתיש התיידים האיטלקית אקילה לורו. אנשיו ירו והרגו תייר יהודי נכה, ליאון קניגהופר, וזרקו אותו לים עם כיסא הגלגלים שלו. בניגוד לשייך יאסיר- גלעזהופר לא הטיף מכיסא הגלגלים שלו להרוג אנשים. עם כיבוש עיראק תפסו האמריקאים את אבו עבאס. חרשות הפלשתינאית הקימה קול צווחה ודרשה את "הסגרתו" של הצדיק לידיה. לאחרונה חודיעו האמריקנים שהוא מת במעצר.

להזכיר לכולנו שהמאבק הפלשתינאי אינו רק אנטי ישראלי, אלא אנטישמי בוטה. אבל שישאר ביניהן.

מחלה ישראלית קשה
אחת התכונות הישראליות הפחות נעימות היא הוסר הפידגון. יש לי חבר שקורא לזה "עיקרון פָּאדל תָאופניים": כדי שאני אחייה למעלה-אתה חייב להיות למטה.

והמעשה הפנם מגיעל באמת. לפני מספר שבועות פורסמה כתבה מרגשת בידיעות אחרונות על בית ויול בבית חולים שיבא, שהוא הוסכל לילדים שמחלת הסרטן שלהם סופנית. הכתבה לא חסכה שבחים מנפלאות האנשים שעובדים שם וגם צייגה שזה המוסד היחיד בעולם שקיים לילדים כאלה (אולי לא ידעתם-אבל רוב הדברים החדשים בעולם הוממצאו בישראל-פשוט מטעמי צניעות החליטו שכמה מהם כדאי להעביר לארצות אחרות....). רק מה, בערד שקשרו כתרים לאלה שעובדים שם, שכחו את זאת שהגתה את הרעיון- ד"ר דפנה מיתר. מדוע? כי היא פשוט כבר לא שם. לא היינו יודעים על הגילוחות הזו אלמלא אילנית רוט, שביקה טופלה ונפטרה שם כתבה לעיתון "האחשת המדהימה הזו, ששמה לא תוזכר בכתבה, חיתה מעורה בכל שלב ושלב בבנית המקום-מאיסוף תרומות ועד בחירת ולוגות....." פוּיה.

בימים אלה, שבהם רבים מאיתנו טורחים על כושר גופני,שלח לי דני את החברקה הבאה:
הליכה עוזרת לחארץ את חיק. כך, למשל, יכולים אנשים בני שמנים וחמש לבלות עוד שנתיים בבית וקנים ב 5000 דולאר לחודש.....
הסבמא שלי התחילה ללכת חמישה ק"מ ליום מגיל ששים. עכשיו היא בת 97 ואף אחד אינו יודע לאן היא הלכה....
הצטרפתי למועדון בריאות בשנה שעברה, חוצאתי 400 דולאר לחודש. לא הפסדתי גראם במשקל. רק אחר כך הסתבר לי שבעצם צריך ללכת לשם.....
יש לירידיים עצומות. מול שחבטן שלי יחתר גדולה, כי היא מכסה אותן....
היתנון בעשיית תרגילי כושר כל יום הוא שמתים יותר בריאים....
אם אתה מתכנן cross country- כדי שתתחיל במדינה קטנה....

אזרחי העולם
לפני מספר שבועות פורסם במוסף "הארץ" ראיון מרתק עם הסופר א.ב. יהושע על ספרו החדש, שמוקדש למח שקורה בישראל סביב גל המתאבדים הפלשתינאים (שליחותו של הממונה על משאבי אנוש"). בין השאר מתאר הסופר את כאבו ודאגתו מכך שמליון(!) ישראלים הגישו בקשה לאזרחות ופספורט פולניים(!). לא סוד הוא שבימים קשים אלה מבקשים ישראלים רבים שתניזה בידם אזרחות אלטרנטיבית. פולין עומדת להצטרף לשוק האירופאי, וכך יהפוך דרכון פולני למסמך רב ערך.

צריך להגיד כאן דברים קשים, ואני מתנגד בפני מי שהדברים לא כל כך יעמו לו (אפשר לפסוח לעמוד הבא). יש על הלב רוב היהודים שהגיעו לישראל עשו זאת משום שגורשו, או שהרגישו לא בטוחים באירופה, בארצות ערב, ואיפה לא. ועל אף שגדלו בארץ דור או שניים של צברים, "התנרשה החברתית" עדיין חזקה מאוד- יהודים אוהבים להימצא היכן שבטוח. ישראל היא כיום המקום הכי לא בטוח בעולם ליהודים, עם רמת אנטישמיות מאוד גבוהה. מאות של צעירים פלשתינאים מאמינים שהם יהפכו לצדיקים אם יתפוצצו וירגו תוך כדי כך כמה יהודים. אפילו הנאצים לא האמינו שהרג יהודים הופך אותם לצדיקים. חלק מיכם יגידו-או קיי, אז מה כבר אפשר לעשות עם אינפורמציה כזאת? לו אני ראש ממשלת ישראל, הייתי עושה כל מאמץ לסיים את הסכסוך, אפילו תמורת ויתורי שטח מפלגיים. שאם לא כך- אולי תהייה בסוף מדינה, אך לא יהיו בה יהודים. אבל שישאר ביניהן.

Ceremony to recognize Canada's first Holocaust Memorial Day

OTTAWA — In November 2003, Parliament passed Bill C-459, an Act to establish Holocaust Memorial Day, setting in place a day to commemorate the six million Jewish people who were murdered by the Nazis and their collaborators.

The first annual Canada Holocaust Memorial Day will be April 18.

"It is our duty as the Parliament of a great and civilized nation to ensure that the words 'never again' are inscribed in our hearts every bit as much as words can be inscribed in stone,"said Scott Reid, one of the five MPs who sponsored the bill.

A ceremony to recognize this milestone in Canadian history not only honours the memory of those who perished, but also acknowledges what Judy Wasylycia-Leis, another sponsor of the bill, described as "Canadians' determination to prevent history from repeating itself."

The event will be held in two locations, beginning at 2 p.m. on Parliament Hill, where the commemoration will include a wreath-laying at the eternal flame, a moment of silence and the Jewish War Veterans' colour guard.

Co-sponsors of Bill C-459 to be recognized

Participants will then slowly march to the Ottawa Congress Centre for what event chair Joel Dimitry described as "a moving ceremony."

Prime Minister Paul Martin will be the keynote speaker, and Israeli ambassador Haim Divon will represent the State of Israel.

The ceremony will recognize the five members of Parliament who co-sponsored Bill C-459, but the highlight will be the lighting of six candles: one representing the six million who died, one for the 1½ million children who died, one for the children of survivors, one for the righteous gentiles who saved Jewish lives, one for the Allied forces and one for the resistance fighters. The shofar will be blown and the names of Holocaust victims will be read aloud.

More than 1,500 people are expected to attend this historic Holocaust Remembrance Day ceremony, which is being sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), Canadian Jewish Congress, Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, the Embassy of Israel, the Ottawa Holocaust Remembrance and Education Committee and the Ottawa Vaad Ha'ir.

Buses will be provided for those who wish to attend from Toronto. Members of Parliament, senators and provincial and municipal dignitaries have been invited. Five busloads are arriving from Toronto, and large groups are planning to come from Montreal and Kingston, Ont.

Montreal hospital pioneers new medical procedure

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) has become the first medical facility in North America to perform hip surgery that allows patients to be up walking the next day and offers a better chance of returning to their previous activities, including sports.

Orthopedic surgeon Dr. John Antoniou announced at a press conference that he had successfully performed a 1½-hour procedure on four patients at the JGH, all of them in their late 40s to early 50s. They went home four or five days after surgery and did not require any stay in a rehabilitation institution.

Antoniou said the metal-on-metal hip "resurfacing" technique he used is preferable to total hip replacement for younger persons, or even those as old as 65, who are very active physically. One of his next patients is 61.

One of the first four, 48-year-old engineer Phuoc Van Hoang, who had the surgery on his left hip 24 days earlier, was at the press conference. He demonstrated how he is walking at this stage, somewhat stiffly with a cane, but it's a vast improvement, he said. He also said he has no pain. Before the surgery, the pain was so bad he had to take sleeping pills to get any rest.

Replacement surgery is generally used for people with an advanced loss of cartilage in the hip joint, usually caused by osteoarthritis or rheumatoid arthritis.

The major advantage of the new type of surgery is that it preserves most of the hip bone and the natural shape of the hip, meaning the patient will have more normal balance and natural range of motion, Antoniou said.

The surgery uses the latest generation of technology, known as Articular Surface Replacement (ASR), a trademark name of DePuy Orthopedics, a division of Johnson & Johnson Inc.

About 200 surgeries in the world have been done using ASR to date, Antoniou said.

Resurfacing involves removing the diseased portion of the head of the femur, or thigh bone, and reshaping it. It is then covered with a metal cap with a short pin on it that fits onto the bone. The cap fits precisely into a metal cup that is implanted into the hip socket.

Patients walk the next day after new hip replacement

By contrast, a total hip replacement requires amputation of the head and neck of the femur, and replacing it with a ball on a stem. The stem, which is about six inches long and an inch wide, is inserted into the canal of the femur.

The ball is mated with a cup that is implanted into the hip socket, forming an artificial ball-and-socket joint. The cup is often plastic or separated from the ball by a plastic lining.

Hip resurfacing, a procedure that has been available since 1991, is much more common in Europe, where more than 20,000 such operations are performed each year. Antoniou said it is especially accepted in England, where about 10 per cent of hip surgeries are done with resurfacing, as well as Australia where the figure is close to 30 per cent. This is partly explained by the fact the technique and technology were largely developed in Britain.

Antoniou expects resurfacing will soon become much more popular in North America. Resurfacing has not been as accepted on this continent because older generations of implants did not always work that well, he said.

ASR is an improvement over other metal-on-metal devices because the clearance between the two components is just right for the formation of a thin layer of a lubricating joint fluid that reduces friction, he said. ASR also represents superior metallurgy to earlier hardware, featuring ultra-smooth surfaces and thinner metal.

In addition to potentially better function for patients, Antoniou said ASR should also wear better. Testing indicates it could last 25 or 30 years, which is an important factor for younger, more active patients, who tend to outlive traditional total hip replacement that lasts on average 15 to 20 years and has a higher risk of breakage.

Younger patients have often been counselled to delay surgery and be less active because of the limited lifespan of total hip replacement, Antoniou said.

If the patient must someday have further surgery, the resurfacing implants are easily converted into a traditional hip replacement, he said.

ASR is not licensed in Canada at the present time, but DePuy is hopeful the product will become fully licensed in the near future. ASR is not available in the United States, but is currently being sold in Europe where it is being made available on a patient-by-patient basis.

JGH orthopedics chief Dr. David Zucker said the wait for ASR surgery will be about four to six months.

"We're very excited that such innovative new procedures are being pioneered at the JGH," said hospital president Stanley Plotnick. "It's a privilege to be among the first to offer this new option to our patients."

"The orthopedics department of the JGH is one of the finest in Quebec. This groundbreaking achievement is testament to this excellence," added executive director Henri Elbaz.

Auto dealer to head Winnipeg's CJA campaign

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — As chair of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg Combined Jewish Appeal 2004 campaign, auto dealer Larry Vickar is using his sales skills to help the community.

"Our goal is $4.5 million this year," Vickar says. "We have many deserving beneficiaries, but we need more resources for a couple of newer initiatives."

He cites the community's financial contribution to the Canada-Israel Committee, the leading Canadian Jewish advocacy organization for Israel.

The other new initiative that will need more community resources is the Grow Winnipeg campaign. Vickar notes that a number of Jewish Argentine families have come to Winnipeg – more than 100 over the past four or five years. As a result, he says, organizations such as the Jewish Child and Family Service and the Jewish school system will need greater financial support.

Vickar's work in both the auto industry and community service is part of his family's tradition. The Vickar family originate from Melfort, Sask.

Larry Vickar is a past president of the Manitoba Motor Dealers Association and was a national director of the Canadian Motor Dealers Association. For the past two years, he has been the CJA campaign vice-chair. He is also vice-president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg in charge of financial resource development.

The 2003 campaign raised more than $4.3 million, $31,000 more than the original goal. It was the sixth year in a row that the Winnipeg campaign has exceeded its goal and the 10th year in a row that the amount of money raised has increased.

The Women's Campaign also exceeded its goal of $875,000 last year, reports Gerry Koffman, CJA Winnipeg's executive director.

Koffman notes that in 2003, there were 220 new gifts worth $60,000 and that overall, about 7,000 individuals contributed to the campaign.

Winnipeg is the only community in North America that still has a two-line card so that contributors can designate how much of their gift goes to local needs and how much to Israel. Last year, 65 per cent went to the local community.

"I believe the keys to our success are our human resource base – we have hundreds of canvassers – and our missions to Israel," Koffman says.

"The missions help raise awareness in the community. We have had 130 people on our last three missions."

He also notes that many members of Winnipeg's Argentine Jewish community made gifts last year and did their share of canvassing. "They have become very much a part of the fabric of our community," he says.

What befell the people Israel in Nazi Europe...defies description. Untold numbers were forced out of their homes, torn from their families, trampled in the dust, worked to death.
...Countless trains stuffed with human cargo sped to the camps, where from chimneys smoke ascended to God.
Megillat Hashoah 1:8-9,13

...Never will I be able to forget, and never will I have the power to understand.
...For these do I weep... for those who sanctified God's name and the name of the people of Israel, refusing to be subdued, fighting to the death...
for infants who never learned to say "Mommy," for boys and girls whose youth was stolen from them.

Cemetery vandalism 'probably a random act'

'I think it is kids who do it. I don't think they realize it is an anti-Semitic act'

Allan Norris, past president of Congregation Beth David, said "my guess is it's a copycat from what happened in Toronto," but without anti-Semitic intent.

"I think it is kids who do it. I don't think they realize it is an anti-Semitic act. They may not have known it was a Jewish [cemetery]," Norris said.

The Beth David Cemetery is located in the centre of Brantford at the northeast corner of the much larger Mount Hope Cemetery. It is "in an out-of-the-way area on the grounds" and is used as a shortcut for the surrounding residential area, Bates said.

"My sense is that no one was specifically targeting the Jewish cemetery. It was probably a random act," he added.

Norris said many incidents of vandalism had been recorded in his 20 years of looking after the cemetery. "This isn't the first time and I guess it won't be the last."

The cemetery contains graves that date back to 1902, he said.

Brantford was home to one of the oldest Jewish communities in Canada, but "there are virtually no Jews left," he said.

At its peak in the 1960s, the city was home to about 150 families and seats in the synagogue were at a premium.

Every third or fourth store on the city's main streets was owned by a Jewish merchant, while others in the community made their living as professionals, Norris said.

However, the children of that generation moved to Toronto and their parents, now retired, moved to be with them. The synagogue was sold about three years ago but Norris remains and continues to look after the cemetery.

"I had all sorts of frantic calls from relatives," he said, but he assured them the stones will be righted as soon as the ground dries to permit heavy equipment to operate without causing even more damage.

Norris said Brantford's Jewish community has experienced anti-Semitic incidents in the past, particularly on one occasion more than 10 years ago when a gang of youths broke 47 windows in the synagogue while neighbours on the same residential street remained silent. "No one had the decency to pick up a phone and call," he said.

Bizarre incident leaves police puzzled

By PAUL LUNGEN

Swastika daubed on forehead

In one of the more bizarre incidents of anti-Semitism reported to police, a Toronto man said he was attacked by two strangers who got out of a car, ran after him and used a blue marker to daub a swastika on his forehead as they pinned him to the ground.

Toronto police say they are investigating the incident, though Det. Kevin Guest of 33 Division said, "We don't have any evidence that would support it.

"We're at an impasse. [The victim] can't identify the vehicle or the perpetrators."

The incident took place in the early morning hours of March 25, days after a rash of anti-Semitic vandalism rocked the Greater Toronto Area. Kerry Fletcher said he couldn't sleep and was out for a walk at around 2:30 a.m. in the Lawrence and Don Mills area. He saw a car speed through a stop sign and yelled at the occupants, using the "f" word and calling them "shmucks."

Fletcher said he was surprised when the car stopped, the doors opened and out came two large men, one white and one black.

"I bolted and ran," he said, but they caught him in a dark, public path.

"They flipped me over and said, 'Move and die.'" After landing some blows, they daubed the swastika on his head, saying, "'This is what you get, you f—ing Jew,'" Fletcher said.

He said he could only give a vague description of the car – it was a dark, older model – and he couldn't identify the assailants as his glasses were knocked to the ground. He was not robbed.

Though he realizes the odds of tracking down the perpetrators are remote, he said, "I just wanted to let people know it happened."

Guest said police responded when Fletcher called them the next morning. They photographed the swastika, which he said was not drawn correctly.

Given the lack of details and any corroborating witnesses, there is little police can do to track down the perpetrators, Guest said.

"To say the least, the circumstances are odd."

UIA Federations hosts second women's conference

OTTAWA — A second UIA Federations Canada's National Women's Leadership Conference will take place this May in Ottawa, following the success of the first conference two years ago in Winnipeg.

The event, which is being called "Many Voices: One Vision," is scheduled for May 16-18. Guest speakers will include Justice Rosalie Abella, author and journalist Irshad Manji and Ruth Bar-On, executive director of Israel's Crisis Management Centre.

"The conference is a wonderful opportunity to bring together women who have been volunteering with their local federations and to enhance their skills in leadership, community education and Jewish enrichment through workshops," said conference chair Donna Dolansky. "It will also lend great exposure to the host community."

"As our conference title indicates, our speakers represent a wonderful cross section of prominent Canadian women as well as women from overseas connected to our cause," said Torontonian Lesley Binstock Offman, co-chair of the national women's division with Alice Raby from Montreal.

Prof. Norma Joseph, chair of the religion department at Concordia University and a CJN columnist, will be the conference's scholar-in-residence.

Jewish leaders meet with Prime Minister Martin

OTTAWA — In the wake of last month's spate of anti-Semitic attacks in and around Toronto, senior Jewish leaders from several organizations came together in a show of solidarity for a meeting March 29 with Prime Minister Paul Martin.

Joining the prime minister were Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, Minister of International Trade Jim Peterson and Elinor Caplan, member of Parliament for Thornhill.

Groups represented were Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), UIA Federations Canada, the federations of Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa, Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre and B'nai Brith Canada.

"We came together as a unified delegation to convey to the prime minister the apprehension and concern in the community following these despicable acts," said CJC national president Keith Landy.

"We wanted to thank him and the senior members of his caucus who loudly and publicly condemned the recent incidents and to encourage such open denunciations as a template for responding to future acts of anti-Semitism and any manifestations of hatred."

Said CIJA co-chair Brent Belzberg: "We wanted to reinforce for the prime minister the notion that the resurgence of contemporary anti-Semitism is a global phenomenon that transcends borders.

"We appreciated [his] undertaking to enhance Canada's leadership role in the international campaign against anti-Semitism, both in the context of multilateral forums and Canada's bilateral foreign relations."

Acting CJC national executive director Manuel Prutschi urged Martin to stay the course in Canada's campaign against international terrorism both at home and abroad.

"We conveyed the community's concern that terrorism is, and will continue to be, a real threat to national security," said Prutschi. "We encouraged the government to make the case to Canadians that counter-terrorism measures remain necessary in a world where no country is immune to terrorist attacks."

CIJA co-chair Steven Cummings said the delegation "also sensitized [Martin] to the profound physical, psychological and financial impact of the heavy security burden the community is bearing and that this very need constituted an infringement on our rights as Canadians."

Cummings said Martin "gave a very sympathetic hearing to the human side of the various security measures the community is forced to undertake at our schools, synagogues and other communal institutions… we asked the prime minister to consider what the government could do to assist us in this process."

The delegation also engaged Martin in a discussion of racism and discrimination in Canada and the need to maintain civil discourse.

"We agreed that it would be advantageous for the government to explore its role in promoting core Canadian values, such as respect for diversity and pluralism, to help maintain civility and act as an antidote to expressions of hate irrespective of the source or the target," said CIJA's chief executive officer Hershell Ezrin.

Financial Consulting in the 21st Century

Written by: Michael Dorfman,
Senior Vice President/ Managing Director / BMO Nesbitt Burns

S. Jonathan Kirshblum,
B.A., CFP, FMA, FCSI
Financial Planner
Investment Advisor

I met Jonathan Kirshblum almost three years ago when BMO Nesbitt Burns was attempting to recruit him from a competitor where he had been an advisor for over six years. In our first discussion, we had a meeting of the minds regarding what we saw as the future role of a investment advisor and what servicing clients' best interests had to entail.

We were both believers in the need to shift away from the traditional approach of servicing clients as a stockbroker, to a more holistic approach that considers an individual's whole financial life. This approach necessitates the advisor becoming an expert in financial planning and developing the skills required to analyze and integrate all of a client's financial affairs. This requires an in-depth knowledge of matters such as insurance, retirement planning, estate planning and education planning.

It is also an adoption of a strategic shift in the daily management of investments. The role of the individual stockbroker supported by his or her own firm's research is supplanted by an exclusive service offering: a) asset management by specialist portfolio managers from around the world, previously available only to pension funds and institutions; and b) daily monitoring of client holdings, diversification levels and risk exposure by objective third-party consulting firms. The added benefits of such a strategy are best understood within the context of one's own portfolio; generally speaking, assets can be better positioned with managers who consistently achieve performance objectives.

In the United States, investment advisors who have adopted this approach now service some 40% of individual investors. An advisor's transition to this approach requires intense education and a financial commitment. The move from commissioned broker to fee-based consulting is, in the first few years, a step backwards financially - which is one of the main reasons why many choose not to do it.

Jonathan embraced the transition because he understood that this type of approach serves his clients' best interests. His commitment to excellence is evident in his recent attainment of the CFP and FMA designations. Fewer than 10% of advisors in Canada hold either of the two designations, and even fewer hold both.

CFP stands for Certified Financial Planner and is an internationally recognized designation. Individuals who wish to attain the CFP designation must undergo thorough training, pass a challenging and demanding 6-hour examination, must already have had years of experience as an advisor, and finally, must meet ethical requirements set by the Financial Planning Standards Council. In the financial planning industry the CFP designation is considered the highest standard in Canada and internationally.

FMA stands for Financial Management Advisor. It is a designation bestowed on individuals who attain a mastery level knowledge of wealth management strategies that enables them to counsel individuals on complex wealth management issues beyond the scope of basic financial planning. It is designed for seasoned financial services professionals who want to obtain the specialized expertise required to provide wealth management services for elite clients.

On October 3, 2003, Jonathan was officially welcomed as Fellow of the Canadian Securities Institute (FCSI). This designation is awarded to financial services professionals who have met the most exacting standards for industry experience, advanced education and solid endorsement from their peers and superiors. It is recognized as the most senior designation available and highest honour conferred in the financial services industry.

We at BMO Nesbitt Burns congratulate Jonathan Kirshblum on his achievements and are pleased he has chosen our firm within which to build and grow his reputable wealth management practice. Throughout the years Jonathan has been recognized for his expertise in various investment strategies. He has written for the Financial Post and Investor's Digest and has been interviewed on several networks including ROBTV, the CBC, and CTV.

As part of our commitment to education, we have invited Jonathan to write four investment columns to appear in upcoming issues of the CJN on topics of financial interest for investors of various ages. We hope you will enjoy his upcoming columns.

Circle of Care's Kosher Meals on Wheels... we deliver sustenance and smiles!

The seed for Kosher Meals on Wheels began in 1921 when Hebrew Weston Charitable Services undertook fundraising to hire a cook to prepare kosher food for patients at Weston Sanitorium. In 1966, the Jewish community identified a need for prepared kosher meals into the community; the response was met by Circle of Care with a program which today is the recognized Kosher Meals On Wheels Program to the Jewish community in Toronto.

Who Can Benefit From Kosher Meals On Wheels

- Individuals who find it difficult to cook or make good nutritional choices.
- Seniors living at home independently. Many anxiously await arrival of their volunteer and meal by preparing their table place setting.
- Isolated homebound and/or disabled persons.
- Persons convalescing or with mental or physical disabilities.
- Persons recovering from surgery or other temporary situations.
- As a secondary benefit to clients' families and care managers, the program provides a daily personal link to ensure well-being of the recipient.

The Personal Touches
An essential element of the program is the enthusiastic and energetic support of staff and volunteers. Dedicated volunteers arrive weekdays year round to deliver meals by noon to all corners of Toronto and York Region, regardless of weather conditions. Yearly, Circle of Care volunteers deliver over 60,000 Kosher meals and as many warm smiles to 700 clients. Meals are prepared under supervision of the Kashruth Council of Canada and planned by a registered dietician.

Meals meet diverse dietary requirements (diabetic, minced, soft/ pureed, no added salt, low fat, lactose intolerant) and include soup, vegetable, dairy or meat entrée, juice, bread, and dessert. Frozen entrées and soups, easily reheated in a conventional or microwave oven, are available for weekend or holiday use. A traditional Shabbat meal is delivered on Friday. Our Kosher Snack Program can provide fresh, appetizing cold food selections as a second light meal along with regular meal delivery.

Cost
Kosher Meals on Wheels, Snacks and Soups are priced for affordability. Subsidies may be available to eligible persons.

Quality Assurance
Staff are in regular contact with Kosher Meals on Wheels recipients to ensure their dietary needs are being met and their satisfaction with the service.

Circle of Care is absolutely dedicated to fulfill its mission to support individual independence and quality of life in the community. Within a broad framework and commitment to Jewish values, Circle of Care strives to provide excellence of care and leadership in the home care field.*

Computing Mental Fitness

Computers keep your mind alert, seniors say. Now, research shows this could improve quality of life.

At the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, fitness is more than physical. The popular monthly Brain Aerobics program gets members thinking on their toes with logic, math and word puzzles. But March's Brain Aerobics participants got a very special workout – using the computer keyboard and mouse.

"I wanted to attract people who didn't think they could ever use computers," says Jennifer MacLeod, Coordinator of Computer Services. "Many hesitate to pick up something new, but when we offer fun activities, they find themselves having a good time. That's the first step."

It's a crucial step, according to active Betel Centre member Cynthia Cohn. Using computers is a necessity of modern life, she says. "Our grandchildren do not write letters – they e-mail."

Cynthia, who has been computing since 1950, was excited to take the helm of the Centre's Computer Committee, helping plan courses and special events like the computer Brain Aerobics, which, she says, "really made me start thinking logically."

Even novices found themselves clicking away. "Once you get someone sitting in front of a computer," says MacLeod, "they start to think, 'Maybe I could learn this after all.'"

Brain Aerobics is usually held in the Betel Centre library, but based on member response, MacLeod would love to offer a repeat high-tech program in future. "It was overwhelmingly positive; I hope everybody who enjoyed it starts to think about taking a [computer] class."

Cynthia originally came to the Betel Centre for watercolour painting classes, but now volunteers on the Ticket Desk and participates in Intergenerational programs, teaching crafts and story writing to elementary students.

She says computer classes help in unexpected ways. "There's a camaraderie in the classroom," she says, and "it's amazing all you can do; research, learn a new hobby or craft," or get involved politically. "Using computers keeps you very alert."

All of which adds up to healthier, happier living. One U.S. study found that stimulating intellectual activity could decrease Alzheimer's incidence by almost 50%. And Cynthia believes programs like computers or Brain Aerobics are important for another reason.

"When a person works, they have a schedule, go out at a certain time." Once retired, it's more important than ever to plan exciting activities. The Betel Centre is more than just a place to go, she says. "You make friends… and you'd be surprised how many of your old friends you meet here."

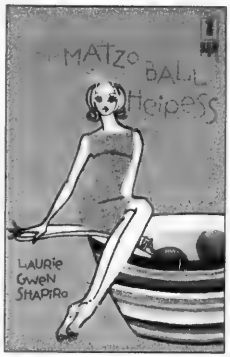
Hilarious novel depicts an unusual seder

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Why is this Passover different from all other Passovers? On all other Passovers I am knee-deep in cookbooks. Why on this Passover am I engrossed in a novel?

Laurie Gwen Shapiro, whose first novel, The Unexpected Salami, will soon be made into a major motion picture, has followed just in time for Passover with The Matzo Ball Heiress, a definite "floater" (as opposed to a "sinker,") if you know your matzah balls.



In the novel, Passover is approaching. Heather Greenblotz, heiress to the Greenblotz Matzah Company fortune, is looking forward to spending the holiday alone in her Manhattan apartment, as usual, with a very unkosher ham and cheese panini. You see, while every family in America celebrates with Greenblotz matzah on the seder table, the Greenblotz family is hardly the poster child for its products. And this year profits are down. What's a national institution to do?

But wait! Just in time to save the day comes an offer from the Food Channel to broadcast, live yet, the Greenblotz family seder. There's only one problem. There is no Greenblotz family seder, and the plucky, resourceful heroine must assemble family and would-be family members for this charade.

What follows is a hilarious romp from the Lower East Side of Manhattan to Amsterdam, as Heather tries to locate her divorced father and his gay lover. (Mom declines to attend as she will be scuba diving in the South Pacific.) Cousin Greg can make it with his girlfriend. Heather's business partner Vondra agrees to come, but not without her boyfriend, who just happens to be the United Nations spokesman for the Egyptian government. And that's just one side of the table.

Mixed into the festivities as she struggles to find her own Jewish identity is Heather's love interest, who keeps kosher and is observant.

I asked Shapiro, who lives on New York's Lower East Side, down the block from the Streit's matzah factory, how she researched the details of matzah production for the book.

"I'm a filmmaker and wanted to make a documentary about the Streits. I met a young woman who introduced me to members of the family. She suggested to me, 'Why don't you write a book? I'll make sure you get your matzah facts straight."

Later, Shapiro found a magazine from the 1950s with Passover recipes, which became the menu for the book.

Unlike Heather, Shapiro has never missed a seder. "Almost every Jewish person, regardless of the level of observance, celebrates Passover," she said. "This is a holiday that takes place in the home rather than the synagogue and revolves around food and family."

Aunt Esther's Passover Hawaiian Chicken was added in the late 1960s to the family seder repertoire. "It was always brisket and turkey, turkey and brisket. We needed something new," said Shapiro. "It was such a hit it that it has stayed on the seder menu ever since."

Ima Ida, the matriarch of Shapiro's father's family, moved to New York City from Jerusalem in 1920. "She and my grandfather were kids when their parents left Vilna for Palestine in the late 1800s and were among the original Zionist settlers," she told me. Ima's berenjena (fried eggplant) is a Shapiro family staple on the seder table.

AUNT ESTHER'S PASSOVER HAWAIIAN CHICKEN

½ cup matzah meal salt and pepper for seasoning the matzah meal
oil for frying
4 boneless chicken breasts, cut in 2-in. pieces
2 large eggs, beaten
1 cup julienne cut peppers (green, red and yellow, mixed)
1 20-oz. jar duck sauce
1 20-oz. can pineapple chunks, undrained
1 cup chicken broth

Preheat the oven to 350. Season the matzah meal with salt and pepper. Heat the oil in a large skillet. Dip the chicken pieces in the egg, then the seasoned matzah meal, and brown on both sides. Remove. Saute the peppers briefly in the same pan. Place the chicken pieces and peppers in a large baking pan. Combine the duck sauce, pineapple chunks with their juice and chicken broth and pour over the chicken and peppers. Bake uncovered for 1 hour. Serves 4-6.

IMA'S BERENJENA (FRIED EGGPLANT)

1 large eggplant, peeled and sliced in ¼-in. rounds
2 eggs, beaten
matzah meal seasoned with salt and pepper to taste
oil for frying
2 15-oz. cans tomato sauce
salt, pepper and oregano to taste

Preheat the oven to 350. Dip the eggplant slices into the egg, then into the seasoned matzah meal, coating completely. Meanwhile, in a large skillet, heat the oil. Saute the eggplant until golden brown on each side. Repeat until all the eggplant is browned. Drain on paper towels. Mix the tomato sauce with salt, pepper and oregano to taste. In a large baking pan, arrange a layer of eggplant, cover with some seasoned tomato sauce, and continue layering eggplant slices with sauce ending with sauce. Bake for 30 minutes. Serves 4-6.

Israel closes West Bank and Gaza until Yom Ha'atzmaut

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel has extended its closure over the West Bank and Gaza Strip until after Israel's Independence Day on April 26.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz told the Israeli Cabinet on Sunday of the move regarding the closure, imposed last month amid fears Palestinian terrorists would try to avenge the assassination of Hamas founder Sheikh Ahmed Yassin.

Mofaz made the announcement two days after a Palestinian teenager killed an Israeli settler in the West Bank.

Last Friday night, the 18-year-old infiltrated the Avnei Hefetz settlement and shot at the Zaga residence.

Hani, 14, was wounded in front of her five siblings.

Her father, Kobi, rushed outdoors with his pistol drawn – only to be fatally cut down by a burst of gunfire.

Israeli troops reacted swiftly.

Soldiers in the West Bank settlement shot the Palestinian gunman dead.

And on Sunday, a commando unit dispatched to his hometown of Tulkarm killed the Hamas man who masterminded the attack.

"Our noose on terrorism is closing tighter," said a senior Israeli security official, noting that the weekend also saw a sweep of Nablus, in which 23 Hamas fugitives were nabbed while planning to carry out suicide bombings inside the Jewish state during Passover.

Also noteworthy was the initial confusion over who carried out the Avnei Hefetz attack, given that the Hamas claim was rivalled by similar statements put out by Islamic Jihad and the Al-Aksa Brigade.

According to Israeli officials, this signified not only a lack of co-ordination between the terrorist groups, but a desperation on their part to claim a "success," given the relative lack of recent attacks they have managed to carry out.

The extended closure and similar measures are deplored by many in the nationalist-religious camp, who accuse Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of encouraging Palestinian violence with his plan to disengage Israel from the Palestinians by removing Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza.

But when National Religious Party chief Effi Eitam and his counterpart from the National Unity bloc, Benny Elon, voiced criticism to that effect at Sunday's Cabinet meeting, Sharon quickly rebuffed them.

"Whoever feels uncomfortable is welcome to get up and leave, rather than sit in the government," political sources quoted the prime minister telling Eitam and Elon, whose parties hold four of the 23 seats in his governing coalition.

It was one of the strongest hints yet that Sharon believes he could survive as prime minister without the NRP and National Unity bloc. Political pundits have long seen a broad coalition government in the works, with the Labor Party – currently leading the opposition – joining ranks with Sharon's Likud.

Still, with Labor lingering on the sidelines until Sharon proves he means to go through with the disengagement plan – itself awaiting approval by U.S. President George W. Bush – the prime minister is talking tough.

In a newspaper interview published last Friday, he suggested that Israel could act against Yasser Arafat, calling the Palestinian Authority (PA) president "an insurance liability."

Arafat, who has weathered several such threats from Sharon since the two tangled in Beirut in 1982, shrugged the words off.

But Arafat could have a more serious threat on the domestic front. Mohammed Dahlan, a former Gaza security chief who hails from Arafat's own dominant Fatah faction, called over the weekend for a thorough overhaul of the PA.

"The Palestinian people are looking for a way out," Dahlan told the Globe and Mail last Saturday. "They are looking for a Palestinian leadership to take them to this exit." Dahlan added: "We have to change our role. We have to change our way of thinking, of working, of implementing our commitment."

Shoah insurance body issues compensation cheques

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — The international commission charged with resolving Holocaust-era insurance claims is doling out $1,000 (US) cheques to survivors or heirs who can't document their wartime policies, but say they never collected on them.

Announced last week by the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims, the humanitarian awards will go to 16,000 survivors or their heirs. ICHEIC continues to evaluate and provide payments for claims from survivors and heirs.

"These payments are a symbolic acknowledgment of the fact that many insurance policy proceeds were never paid to victims of the Holocaust," ICHEIC chairman Lawrence Eagleburger, a former U.S. secretary of state, said in a statement. "These payments represent the long-delayed efforts to morally address the wrongs done to Holocaust victims who invested their hard-earned savings in insurance policies for their families."

Some say process moving too slowly

Eagleburger appointed Samuel Berger, national security adviser under former U.S. president Bill Clinton, to serve as the ICHEIC's senior counsellor for the humanitarian claims process. Berger developed the criteria for evaluating humanitarian claims and supervised the payment approval process.

"Given the discretionary nature of judgment involved in evaluating these claims, it was useful to have someone with unimpeachable integrity and outside the process," said Mara Rudman, the ICHEIC's chief operating officer.

Berger was unavailable for comment.

The allocations will go to 4,867 recipients in the United States, 5,061 in Israel and thousands in other countries.

The awardees were chosen from a pool of 30,000 claimants whose policies were considered, Rudman said.

The criteria for evaluating the claims weren't released, but approximately 93 per cent of those receiving the awards are themselves Holocaust survivors.

More humanitarian awards are expected later this year.

Rudman said many claimants couldn't remember the insurance companies' names, but much of the anecdotal information they provided was quite strong.

Sources in the ICHEIC said some commission members wanted to give just $300 (US) to those lacking documentation, but Jewish groups on the commission fought for a higher amount. Rudman disputed that account, however.

The $1,000 figure is the same as the ICHEIC's minimum payment for claims from eastern European countries.

"This is just a humanitarian token payment for people that had some kind of recollection," said Roman Kent, chairman of the American Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors and an ICHEIC member.

The announcement comes as the ICHEIC has finished collecting applications from Holocaust survivors and their heirs and is now processing the claims. The ICHEIC is to distribute more funds throughout the spring and early summer and would like to conclude its work by the end of 2004, as it is budgeted to do.

Of the 82,000 claims in the ICHEIC's system, half of the 17,000 that name an insurance company have been decided, Rudman said. As of March 5, $64 million (US) has been offered, not including the humanitarian payments, she said.

Some in the Jewish community applauded the announcement of the humanitarian awards, but others remain concerned the ICHEIC is moving too slowly.

"I for one do not celebrate the payment of $1,000," said Elan Steinberg, executive vice president of the World Jewish Congress and a member of the ICHEIC. "It is certainly something we agreed to with mixed feelings at best."

Steinberg estimates that between 150,000 and 200,000 Holocaust survivors have died since the ICHEIC was formed in 1998.

"Some of us want to see these payments accelerated and in more realistic sums," Steinberg said.

The ICHEIC has been accused of not working diligently on payments. It has been sued by some Holocaust survivors, and some members of the commission have urged Eagleburger to resign.

The ICHEIC underwent reforms in October, and is considering selecting an ombudsman to help survivors and heirs seek redress from the commission and illuminate the actions of insurance companies, which have been accused of slowing the payment process.

Founded in 1998 by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, the ICHEIC has encountered repeated problems in the past two years. Eagleburger threatened to resign in 2002 over difficulties in securing co-operation from German insurance companies.

Economic cost of intifadah

The intifadah has cost Israel between $9 billion and $11.6 billion (Cdn) so far – not including defense costs – according to the Bank of Israel report for 2003. The amount comes to between 6.2 per cent and 8 per cent of Israel's gross domestic product. The report found that the intifadah, which began at the end of September 2000, was one of the main reasons for the recession between 2001 and 2003.

Terrorists hide in hospital

The army and Shin Bet security service arrested 12 wanted Palestinians in a raid on Bethlehem's psychiatric hospital. Most of the arrested men are members of Fatah's military wing. According to security sources, the operation foiled a double suicide bombing, which the arrested men had been plotting.

Tolerance Day in Israel?

The committee studying the Orr Commission's report on government policy toward Israeli Arabs recommended that Jewish and Arab Israelis should celebrate a mutual "Tolerance Day" each year. Justice Minister Yosef Lapid presented the holiday idea last week to Arab representatives, who said they would examine the proposal, but would not accept any Zionist symbols at the celebration.

Qureia: Attacking civilians bad

The Palestinian Authority's prime minister condemned suicide attacks on Israeli civilians. Ahmed Qureia said the attacks have damaged the Palestinian cause and given Israel cover to build its West Bank security barrier. Qureia also welcomed Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to withdraw from Gaza, but said it should be followed by a withdrawal from the entire West Bank.

Poll: Palestinians back terror

A majority of Palestinians support terrorist attacks on Israeli civilians, according to a poll taken just before the March 22 assassination of Hamas leader Sheik Ahmed Yassin. Fifty-three per cent of Palestinians support the attacks, up 5 percentage points from a December poll. Some 87 per cent of respondents in the recent poll, taken by the Palestinian Center for Policy and Social Research, support attacks on Israeli soldiers, and 86 per cent favour attacks on Israeli settlers.

Sharansky blasts BBC

Natan Sharansky accused the BBC of a "gross double standard" toward Israel. The Israeli cabinet minister fired off a missive to the British global news service last week, accusing it of holding a "deep-seated bias" against Israel. Sharansky was reacting to BBC coverage of Israel's recent arrest of a 16-year-old would-be suicide bomber, as reporter Orla Guerin repeatedly accused the army of using the boy for propaganda purposes.

South African Jews build new identity

By GEOFF SIFRIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — For South African Jews, this Passover falls at a time when the themes of oppression and liberation in the Haggadah resonate particularly strongly with the atmosphere in the country.

South Africa is celebrating a decade of democracy, with national elections due on April 14, the day after Passover ends.

The country's first free election in 1994, which marked apartheid's official end, brought Nelson Mandela's largely black government into power. Since then, South Africa has attempted to remake itself into what Archbishop Desmond Tutu calls the "rainbow nation."

It has put in place basic democratic institutions, such as a powerful constitutional court – headed by Chief Justice Arthur Chaskalson, who is Jewish – but faces enormous problems of poverty and land distribution and the absence of a strong democratic tradition, which could pose challenges to future political stability. The Jewish community also has gone through huge changes. One has been the accelerated emigration of its members to English-speaking countries such as Australia, Canada, the United States and England.

That emigration has reduced the size of the community from roughly 125,000 in the 1980s to some 80,000 today. The reasons range from the violent crime rate – among the highest in the world – to whites' difficulties in getting jobs and general anxiety about the country's political stability.

After some years of demoralization, the Jewish community recently has begun to rebound. It has placed in key leadership positions young, dynamic people who are less burdened by the baggage of apartheid and who are vigorously engaging in the new South Africa.

Examples of this young blood are Yehuda Kay, 28, national director of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies; Zev Krengel, 31, chair of the board's Johannesburg area council; Avrom Krengel, 35, chair of the South African Zionist Federation; Rabbi Craig Kacev, 32, acting director of the South African Board of Jewish Education; and Warren Goldstein, 32, recently chosen as the country's chief rabbi.

"The fact that I was at school during the apartheid years and only voted for the first time in the 1994 elections enables me to relate to South African society with a clean slate," Goldstein said in an interview with the South African Jewish Report, the country's main Jewish newspaper.

One example of the community's new outward-looking approach is a "Pesach Freedom Seder," organized by the board of deputies, which was held at the legendary African National Congress headquarters at Lilliesleaf Farm near Johannesburg. Lilliesleaf is where the core group of liberation movement leaders was arrested in 1963, resulting in a trial at which Mandela and eight others were sentenced to life imprisonment.

Jewish and non-Jewish religious and political leaders, including several Cabinet ministers, were invited to the seder. Also invited were Jewish activists who played a vital role in the country's freedom struggle.

The new Jewish leadership is also trying to heal an old rift in the community between conservative mainstream Jews and left-wing Jews who were active in the anti-apartheid struggle. Activists have been highly critical of the mainstream, accusing it of not speaking out sufficiently against apartheid.

Mainstream Jewish organizations, which never openly supported apartheid, maintained that speaking out too forcefully would ignite anti-Semitism in the government and society, and that criticism had to be moderate to protect the Jewish community. Only in the mid-1980s did the board of deputies publicly denounce apartheid.

The board recently hosted a meeting with 30 left-wing Jewish human rights activists and academics to discuss Jewish and South African issues. The atmosphere was positive, though the activists' views on Israel, Judaism and various South African issues often differ from the mainstream's.

The issue of Israel continues to be a source of anxiety for Jews: governmental and societal sympathies lie strongly with the Palestinians. But the government repeatedly has stated that its official policy is recognition of Israel's right to exist within secure borders, alongside a Palestinian state.

In the upcoming election, most Jews are unlikely to vote for the ANC, the dominant black political party, which grew out of the liberation struggle. Though the ANC is credited with effectively steering the economy through difficult times in recent years, many Jews believe it represents the interests of the black majority more than those of minority groups such as Jews.

Jews are expected to vote more for the Democratic Alliance, a liberal opposition party headed by a Jew, Tony Leon.

Hamas' revenge plans aren't exhausted

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

The terror attack at the Avnei Hefetz settlement should not be regarded as the act of revenge that Hamas has promised in response to the assassination of its leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin.

The strike was no more, no less than what the organization was able to carry out for the time being – this is what Hamas could muster as it plots more ambitious terror strikes.

Immediately after Yassin was killed on March 22, the media was filled with warnings and predictions from commentators and politicians about a lethal wave of terror. The anticipated attacks were to come as a reprisal for Israel's decision to kill the Hamas spiritual leader. Such a wave of terror could, indeed, occur, especially with Passover upon us. Still, more than two weeks after the assassination, current circumstances should be put in perspective.

For months, Hamas has been operating in the absence of any internal restraints on terror attacks. Its desire to carry out a "mega-attack" was not born in the aftermath of the Yassin assassination – its effort to carry out major attacks stretches back almost two years, since the attempted attack on the Pi Glilot fuel depot in Tel Aviv. Just a few weeks ago, the Israel Defence Forces stopped a terror cell that intended to carry out a major attack.

The selection of Avnei Hefetz as a target reflects the difficulties faced by Palestinian terror organizations. With the newly constructed separation fence and assertive IDF and Shin Bet actions in major West Bank cities, the terror groups are finding settlements beyond the fence to be the easiest targets. It is simpler for terror cells to reach settlements than to cross the Green Line and infiltrate a city such as Netanya (whose Park Hotel was the site of a lethal terror attack on Pesach two years ago).

The weak link exposed by the Avnei-Hefetz attack was not the long separation fence, but rather a local fence that winds around the settlement. Defence establishment red tape, which has slowed efforts to close gaps in local fences around settlements, allowed the terrorist to infiltrate Avnei Hefetz. A long (12-minute) period passed before the terrorist was located, but once IDF troops reached him, they operated efficiently and well.

Hamas appears to have been the main force behind this attack, though Islamic Jihad also perhaps had a hand in it.

In the West Bank, the IDF has stepped up efforts to crack down on Hamas. Since Yassin's killing, Israeli security officials have received reports about Hamas mobilization efforts in the Nablus area, and about plots to send suicide strikers out before Passover.

A major IDF and Shin Bet security service effort last week, undertaken at the time of the Avnei Hefetz attack, led to the arrest of 26 Hamas men in Nablus.

U.S. Congress resolution urges equity and justice for Jewish refugees

"This resolution exposes a serious issue that has been ignored for years," Santorum said. "All refugees, regardless of their ethnic background, should be recognized and considered when international diplomacy is taking place."

The initiative was welcomed by U.S. Jewish organizations, including the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC).

JJAC executive director Stanley Urman said the resolution "for the first time establishes a balance for what has traditionally been a skewed perspective on Middle Eastern refugees. It sets the standard for how to address and resolve these issues."

It goes beyond "a declaration of lofty principles," Urman said. "It is a call for action that will be followed by concrete actions in Washington."

He said the resolution recognizes that Palestinians were not the only people made refugees following Israel's War of Independence.

"To recognize the rights of merely one refugee population is a fundamental inequity, illogical and unjust."

In fact, Urman said, the 850,000 Jewish refugees from 10 Arab countries outnumber the Palestinian refugees by more than 125,000. In addition, thousands of Egyptian Copts and Christians throughout the Middle East have also been forced to leave the Middle East since the late 1940s.

Palestinians were not the only people made refugees

The Santorum resolution borrows extensively from an executive summary of a report prepared by Urman and Winnipeg immigration lawyer David Matas called Jewish Refugees From Arab Countries: The Case for Rights and Redress.

Setting out specific points to be implemented, the resolution suggests American delegations to diplomatic forums "should ensure that the relevant text refers to the fact that multiple refugee populations have been caused by the Arab-Israeli conflict and any explicit reference to the required resolution of the Palestinian refugee issue is matched by a similar explicit reference to the resolution of the issue of Jewish refugees from Arab countries."

The resolution also calls on President George W. Bush to craft U.S. policy so that "the issue of refugees and the mass violations of human rights of minorities in Arab countries… be resolved in a manner that includes redress for the legitimate rights of all refugees displaced from Arab countries and recognition of the fact that Jewish and Christian property, schools and community property was lost as a result of the Arab-Israeli conflict."

In their report, Urman and Matas state that the status of Jews in Arab countries changed dramatically when Israel was established. Most Arab countries declared war against Israel or backed the war.

"Jews were either uprooted from their countries of residence or became subjugated, political hostages of the Arab-Israeli conflict. In virtually all cases, as Jews were forced to flee, individual and communal properties were seized and/or confiscated without any compensation provided by the Arab governments involved."

Afterward, the international community failed to address the rights of displaced Jews.

"Since 1947, there have been over 681 UN resolutions on the Middle East conflict, including 101 that refer directly to the 'plight' of Palestinian refugees. In none of these 681 UN resolutions… is there a specific reference to, nor any expression of concern, nor any international action taken to recognize, ameliorate or otherwise address the plight or rights of the hundreds of thousands of former Jewish refugees displaced from Arab countries," Urman and Matas write.

Urman said in the last two years, Israel has begun to gather data about lost Jewish property in Arab countries, laying the groundwork for a counterclaim to Palestinian calls for the return of property. One Jewish agency, the World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries, estimates that lost Jewish property totals $100 billion in today's dollars.

Urman said any future resolution of the Mideast conflict could include a plan floated by former U.S. president Bill Clinton that would see the creation of a $30 billion (US) international peace fund for all parties to the conflict. It would be modelled on a 1991 UN Iraqi fund to compensate victims of Saddam Hussein. Kuwaitis, Saudis and Israelis all received redress through that fund, he said.

Urman said JJAC is not advocating a bilateral solution to the Palestinian/Israeli conflict (Israel has denied responsibility for creation of the Palestinian refugee problem). Rather, the group foresees a model based on the Madrid peace conference, a multilateral meeting convened in 1991 in which Canada chaired the working group on refugees. Urman said JJAC would like to see Canada's parliament entertain a resolution similar to the one advanced by Santorum.

Menawhile, Eric Vernon, director of government relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said Congress has played a role in publicizing the issue of "the forgotten exodus."

The advocacy group also included the issue in briefing papers submitted to the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade.

"This is something we will keep an eye on," Vernon said.

STRASBOURG, France — A new report on anti-Semitism commissioned by the European Union Monitoring Center on Racism and Xenophobia (EUMC) identifies most of the perpetrators of anti-Semitic acts as "young white Europeans," influenced by extreme right-wing political ideas.

Other perpetrators were young Muslims and "people of North African origin," the report said, but it said the press has exaggerated the role of young Muslim immigrants in the incidents.

The new report, made public last week in Strasbourg in the presence of European Parliament President Pat Cox and EUMC director Beate Winker, contrasted with controversial findings of last year's EUMC-sponsored study, which the body shelved, citing incomplete data and controversial methodology, after it was leaked to the press in December 2003.

Last year's report predominantly blamed young Arabs and Muslims for rising anti-Semitism. This year, the report said: "Although it is not easy to generalize, the largest group of perpetrators… appears to be young, disaffected white Europeans." The report, including data on anti-Semitism and hostility to Jews in Europe since 2002, concludes, "There were many incidents of Jews being assaulted and insulted, attacks against synagogues, cemeteries and other Jewish property, and arson at a Jewish school."

Jewish leaders in the United States and Europe blasted the report, accusing the authors of purposely avoiding identifying who was responsible for anti-Semitic incidents in Europe.

Israel Singer, chairman of the World Jewish Congress, said that the report's authors were afraid to present the causes of the latest wave of anti-Semitism.

The 344-page report maintains that France had the most significant rise in instances of anti-Semitism, with 313 incidents, a six-fold increase since 2002. In Belgium the number of incidents doubled, while in Germany, the number of anti-Semitic incidents dropped, though increased in severity.

Jewish leaders said the report's defining the perpetrators of anti-Semitic acts as "young white Europeans," was mistaken and misleading, making it possible to keep the real identity of those responsible hidden, and added the majority are Muslims and supporters of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO).

The president of the European Jewish Congress, Cobi Benatoff, said he noticed "a number of contradictions" between the shelved report and the new one, but that he welcomed the latter's publication.

On the other hand, the general secretary of the European Jewish Congress, Serge Cwajgenbaum, said that the new report was "full of contradictions."

Blaming "young white Europeans" for anti-Semitic incidents, he said, directly contradicted police reports that specifically noted the perpetrators were Muslims. "How can you fight anti-Semitism without pointing to the identity of those responsible?" he asked.

Abraham Foxman, director-general of the U.S. Anti-Defamation League, called the report "disappointing."

Jewish community leaders throughout Europe were interviewed anonymously in a 50-page appendix to the report, in which most pointed to "immigrants" or "young people with Arab appearance" as responsible for the incidents. Jewish leaders told Ha'aretz that having their opinions appear in an appendix rather than as an integral part of the report showed that the EUMC did not believe these opinions to have research significance.

The new report recommends that European leaders make clear that they oppose anti-Semitism and racism, and that EU states give teeth to laws designed to stamp out anti-Semitism. The new report also calls for an institutionalized framework to be set up for efficient documentation of anti-Semitic acts. It notes that teachers have a definitive role to play in eradicating anti-Semitism and racism.

Minister for Diaspora Affairs Natan Sharansky said he welcomed the fact that after a long period of denial, the EU has decided to look squarely at the problem of anti-Semitism.

"The report proves what we have been saying for a long time: collaboration between the extreme right and Muslim elements in Europe creates a dangerous synergy," Sharansky said. "I call upon Europe's leaders to adopt the conclusions of the report and work harder against this affliction."

Israeli President Moshe Katsav said Israel and Jews have been disturbed for some time about the upsurge in anti-Semitism in Europe, adding that the issue is brought up in all meetings between Israeli and European leaders.

Katsav said anti-Semitism is a danger to democracies worldwide.

"In every country in which synagogues are torched, it will not be long before the parliament is stoned and democracy is in danger," he said. "Any attempt to link the upsurge in anti-Semitic acts to the conflict in our region, in effect, constitutes support for terrorism."

Next month, Katsav will travel to Berlin for a conference – a joint initiative with German President Johannes Rau, with the participation of OSCE heads of state – on ways to combat anti-Semitism.

Avner Shalev, the chairman of the Yad Vashem Directorate, called the EU report "important," but said that "at times the analysis shrinks from drawing firm and soul-searching conclusions.

"We hope that [EU] members… will look squarely at the problem of anti-Semitism in their midst and engage in deep self examination regarding its manifestations and motivations, and the underlying factors for both."

He urged EU nations to step up educational efforts against anti-Semitism.

The report "recognizes that one of the key means to combat anti-Semitism is education, especially education about the Holocaust," and Yad Vashem is ready to offer its expertise in this area to EU members, Shalev said.

Argentine neo-Nazis face barriers in new try for legal status

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — An Argentine political group that espouses Nazi ideology faces new hurdles in its decade-long battle to win accreditation as a legal political party.

Three weeks ago, electoral prosecutor Jorge Alvarez Berlanda recommended that the accreditation petition from the New Triumph Party, known by its Spanish acronym PNT, be denied. Berlanda's recommendation will now go to an electoral judge, who will have the final say on the matter.

Started in the early 1990s by Alejandro Biondini, the PNT promoted the swastika, used the stiff-arm Nazi salute, celebrated Hitler's birthday and espoused a political ideology similar to that of far-right French leader Jean Marie Le Pen.

After a PNT leader died under mysterious circumstances, party officials said the leader was a victim of a Jewish "ritual crime."

Since 1997, Biondini's group has maintained an anti-Semitic Web site that links to Nazi sites and Holocaust-denial sites. Biondini himself makes comrades call him "Fuehrer."

The PNT has been trying to gain political accreditation for years. In 1991, the party argued the swastika it used was not a Nazi emblem but a solar symbol.

Three years later the group faced charges of violating a national anti-discrimination law.

Biondini made some changes in the party, but many organizations, political parties and government officials say the party's ideology remains unchanged.

"They are substantially Nazis and formally Argentine nationalists," said one Argentine judge, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Last July, Biondini presented an official petition for legal accreditation. The PNT did away with the swastika and said the party rejects any form of racism or anti-Semitism.

Becoming a legal party would allow the PNT to participate in Buenos Aires' municipal elections, which would eventually lead to its participation in national elections, including free on-air TV time to promote its political message.

Prosecutor Berlanda's March 16 recommendation mentioned several calls from concerned parties to reject the PNT's petition, including requests by the Justice and Human Rights Ministry, the DAIA – Argentine Jewry's political umbrella group – several political parties, the National Institute Against Discrimination, the Simon Wiesenthal Center and the Association of Lawyers of Buenos Aires.

The prosecutor said he agreed with the recommendations.

"The material attached shows an exaltation of violence, hatred for the national and international Israeli community and the assertion of Adolf Hitler as a leader, frequently using Nazi symbols or similar ones," the recommendation reads in part.

Experts say the PNT's support base is small, though some say the group has links to the army and the nationalist arm of the Peronist party, which is associated with the ideals of former Argentine president Juan Peron.

GABI'S DRESSER BECOMES THEATRICAL DRAMA

Toronto children's writer Kathy Kacer makes her playwriting debut with an upcoming production of a script she prepared from her award-winning novel, The Secret of Gabi's Dresser, which Second Story Press published in 1999 as part of its Holocaust Remembrance Series for Young Readers.

Kathy Kacer

The story focuses on a young Jewish girl in Czechoslovakia who hides in her mother's dresser as Nazi soldiers search the house. The book won both a Jewish Book and a Silver Birch award.

Produced by Te-Amim Music Theatre as its first drama, the play is directed by Mark Cassidy and features cast members Jill Morrison, Alan Lee, Alan Price, Nadine Rabinovitch, Blair Keyzer, Renee Strasfeld and Loretta Walsh.

Angels include Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman, Eva and Peter Friedmann and the Ontario Trillium Foundation.

School performances take place at the Al Green Theatre in the Miles Nadal JCC the week before and after the play's premiere there on April 17 and 18. Discussions with Holocaust survivors follow the school group performances.

Te-Amim founder-director Helena Fine is herself the daughter of Czech Holocaust survivors who some years ago presented a production of Brundibar, the children's opera from Theresienstadt.

"This is a story that any school-age student can identify with," Fine said. "In a sensitive and appropriate way, it explores essential values for children, the importance of friendship, and the choices we face in life and family. It also makes the Holocaust experience and that era much more real to people of different backgrounds."

Adults $20, children $15. Saturday, April 17, 8 p.m. and Sunday, April 18, 1 p.m. A $5 preview takes place Thursday, April 15, 2 p.m. 416-504-PLAY (7529). www.Te-amim.com.

Jewish Gospel Singer: A sensation when he first performed at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival several years ago, Jewish African-American singer Joshua Nelson is returning to Toronto in May to give a performance of his electrifying Jewish gospel-style music.

Nelson traces his roots to West Africa and was raised by his mother and grandmother in a strictly observant Jewish home. The dynamic, Grammy-nominated performer is known for his rich voice and charismatic personality and for the enduring effect he usually has on his audiences.

His appearance is being co-sponsored by five organizations – Associated Hebrew Day Schools, United Synagogue Day Schools, the Toronto Heschel School, the Bathurst JCC and the Koffler Centre for the Arts – as "a collaborative effort to build and enhance community spirit," according to spokesperson Trevor Kahn.

Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, 470 Glencairn Ave. Tickets $18. Wednesday, May 12, 7:30 p.m. Automated hotline, 416-224-8737, ext. 1752.

A fairy tale ending for author of children's books

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

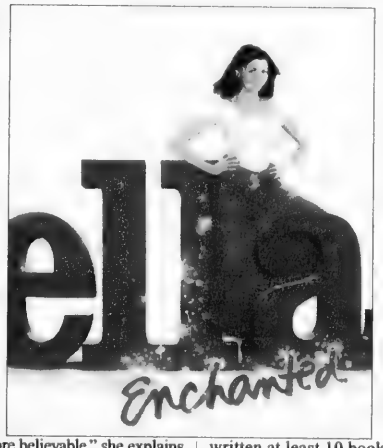
For New York-area author Gail Carson Levine, fairy tales sometimes do come true.

The highly successful children's author, who gave a reading recently at Toronto's Bialik Day School, is the creator of Ella Enchanted, a young person's novel that has been turned into a movie by Miramax Films. The film stars Anne Hathaway and opens April 9.

If being courted by a major Hollywood production house doesn't seem like the perfect fairy tale ending for a novelist, Levine has also seemed to live out every writer's fantasy by getting that first novel written and published

Previously a bureacrat in the state government for 27 years, she faced a daily two-hour commute to work each way from her home town of Brewster, N.Y., which is situated some 60 miles from New York. Seeking to use her time productively, she wrote Ella Enchanted on the commuter train.

Thus, she seems to qualify as one of those isolated "kitchen-table" women writers – the list includes such dedicated souls as Margaret Mitchell and Maeve Binchy – who persevere in solitude for years against great odds and ultimately triumph when their works set the public's imagination on fire.



Levine must also believe in the power of fairy tales because Ella Enchanted is based on one. "The story more or less follows Cinderella – there's even a pair of glass slippers and a pumpkin coach -- but I tried to make it more believable," she explains.

The title character is subject to an unusual curse, being obliged to obey all commands directed at her. Like Cinderella, Ella inhabits a rich fantasy realm containing princes, ogres, wicked stepsisters and even a fairy godmother who protects her.

The tale's happy ending may be fit for a princess but not all is a bed of roses for Ella along the way, Levine explains.

"What you want to do as a writer is to make your characters suffer. That's what makes a good story. It can be serious suffering or it can be comic suffering, but the characters need to suffer."

Levine has written at least 10 books for young people over the last decade, including six in a series called The Princess Tales. Having read the first Harry Potter novel, she expresses gratitude to author J. K. Rawlings "for bringing more kids to fantasy and for getting kids to read long books."

Her book Dave at Night tells the story of a boy in a Jewish orphanage in New York and is her only title to reflect a Jewish theme. "It's a fun adventure story," she says.

Ella Enchanted also contains classic storytelling elements that its author says will appeal to readers of either gender. "Once they get past the cover and the title, boys also like it a lot because it's an adventure novel."

Levine is currently putting the finishing touches on a book called The Fairies of Peter Pan, which the publishing arm of the Disney Corporation is due to publish next spring. "They've asked me to write the first book and set up the world," she says. "I've been having a ton of fun doing it."

She also enjoys giving the occasional course at the public library on creative writing for kids. She tells young would-be writers to keep writing, even if they don't finish their stories. "I don't think it matters if they don't finish. As long as they keep writing, they'll get better."

Ella Enchanted is published in softcover by Avon Books, an imprint of HarperCollins. It sells for $9.99.

Israeli film, Broken Wings, is a heartfelt family drama

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The sudden death of a beloved husband and father, and its impact on a brittle middle-class Israeli family, is the theme of Nir Bergman's heartfelt Hebrew-language drama, Broken Wings, scheduled to open here on April 9.

Broken Wings, set in the port city of Haifa, focuses on the Ullmans, still in mourning after the recent passing of the light of their lives.

Dafna, the mother, can hardly function in her new role as a bereaved widow. Her children, Yair, Ido, Bahr and Maya, are not much better off.

Haifa's raw winter landscape reflects the unrelieved bleakness of their situation. The bright Mediterranean sun, which is usually associated with optimism, is conspicuously missing. The sky is a cold cobalt colour.

Having established a sombre mood, Bergman concentrates on character development, Broken Wings' strongest attribute.

Dafna (Orly Zilberschatz-Banai), a midwife in a hospital, has just returned to her duties after an abnormally lengthy period of bereavement. Yet she feels overworked and overextended. The liaison she establishes with a doctor (Vladimir Freedman), a Russian immigrant, lifts some of the gloom.

Yair (Nitai Gvirtz), her oldest son, has dropped out of school, his promising career in scholastic basketball in tatters. His only solace seems to be his girlfriend, Iris (Dana Ivgy).

Ido (Daniel Magon), Yair's younger brother, is having trouble dealing with his aggression. His reckless attempt to set a world free jump record by jumping into an empty swimming pool verges on the suicidal.

Bahr (Eliana Magon), Dafna's youngest daughter, appears to be well-adjusted, but she, too, is vulnerable.

Maya (Maya Maron), Dafna's 17-year-old daughter, is a budding singer and songwriter. Having had a special relationship with her late father, she misses him with every fibre of her being, and vents her anger on Dafna.

Bombarded by anguish, pain and confusion, the Ullmans are a study in grief. But instead of helping each other when their need is greatest, they wallow in self-absorption.

The dysfunctional Ullmans seem doomed, at least until a family crisis reunites them in a spirit of mutual self-help and caring.

Bergman, in his debut as a feature director, handles these wrenching scenes quite deftly. He stays clear of maudlin emotions and Broken Wings is thus stronger and more believable.

The ensemble cast, drawn from some of the finest young talent in Israel, does not let him down. Their respective performances are believable, as if they are improvising as they go along.

Maya-Maron is particularly effective. In one memorable scene, she breaks down as she sings a sad song dedicated to her dad.

Broken Wings is an unusual Israeli movie in that it is completely apolitical. Not a word is mentioned about the endemic Arab-Israeli dispute or the current Palestinian uprising.

A passing reference to the legendary American basketball star Michael Jordan is the closest Bergman comes to flirting with the passions of regional politics.

A Who's Who of Biblical characters

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The Bible is filled with hundreds of characters – good and evil – some playing major roles, others mentioned in passing.

Who's Who in The Bible, An Illustrated Biographical Dictionary (Reader's Digest) is a splendid collection of more than 500 such people from Aaron to Zophar taken from the Bible as well as the Apocrypha.

Even Alexander the Great, whose life story is told in Maccabees 1 is included. Daniel also foretells Alexander's career in Daniel II 3-4.

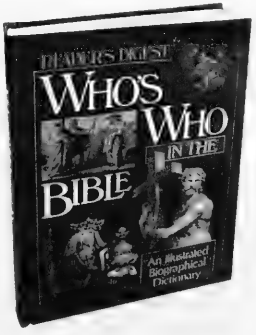
Moses gets the most space with 12 pages devoted to him in this dictionary. Abraham follows with 10, and strangely, God gets six pages.

Along with the major figures, some more obscure personalities like Ittai and Gehazi also get mentioned.

In some instances, the dictionary goes outside the biblical references and offers academic detail.

For instance, in the listing under Esther, the authors explain that some scholars count it as a work of fiction. (Their argument, the books says, is that the name Esther and Mordechai link with the Babylonian deities Ishtar and Mardek, "and may well hint at a Persian legend, which Jews in captivity began to retell."

Other scholars, though, see a basis in history for the story, due to its detailed knowledge of customs and its narrative style.



You also learn an additional six passages were added to the Esther story and today form part of the biblical Apocrypha.

The book is well illustrated, with more than 400 colour pictures, 10 maps, genealogies and many boxed sidebars providing information as diverse as "The Women in David's Life" and a description of the conquest of Canaan.

A fine addition to anyone's library.

Book portrays life and death in intensive care unit

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

As a nurse in the medical surgical intensive care unit (ICU) at the University Health Network's Toronto General Hospital, Tilda Shalof witnesses life and death drama every working day.

Shalof, who is passionate about her chosen profession, is also a writer. At a writers' retreat in June 2002, she began to chronicle life in the ICU from a first-person perspective, describing the experiences of both the patients and her community of co-workers.

She received positive feedback from the other writers at the retreat, she said, and "I knew I had a book."

Last spring, McClelland & Stewart bought the manuscript. A Nurse's Story, Life Death and In-Between in an Intensive Care Unit was published March 16 and Shalof has been on a book tour across the country.

She will be reading at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre April 18 at 10 a.m.

"This is a dream come true in every way, personally to write a book and professionally to do something positive for nursing," Shalof said. "And to be to be taken on by McClelland & Stewart, a publishing house of such a high calibre, far exceeded my expectations. It's the centre of literary life in Canada."

Prior to A Nurse's Story, Shalof had written many short stories and she had completed an 800-page novel, but she had not been able to find a publisher.

But with the outbreak of SARS in the spring of 2003, there was considerable public interest in the plight of nurses, she said.

Dr. Mark Bernstein, chief of neurosurgery at Toronto Western Hospital read excerpts of the manuscript and helped her make a connection with McClelland & Stewart, Shalof said. "Dr. Bernstein got me in the door and I was offered a contract. I was told, 'We rarely take people off the street like you.'"

While the book is a realistic portrayal of the ICU, Shalof did not use any real names. "No one is identifiable. The people described are all composites."

She explained that patients in the medical surgical ICU all have life-threatening illnesses and require continual monitoring. "There's a lot of death. We see the sickest people in Ontario."

The book reveals "compelling secrets about the world of nursing," from the care of patients and contact with their families to death and preparing the bodies for organ donation, she said.

"I had some incredible stories to tell. In the book, I take readers to the bedside and show exactly what happens.

"I don't shy away from controversy. I raise all the ethical issues that patients and families of patients face. It's my hope that A Nurse's Story will help readers understand the world of the hospital better. It's also my gift to my profession and the public.

"There are some incredible recoveries, and at the other end of the spectrum there are many situations where we assist patients and their families in the last days and hours of the patients' lives."

She pointed out that there is also a lot of humour in the book. "There's no doubt that we use humour behind closed doors as a coping mechanism. Although the humour may be outrageous and irreverent at times, we are never disrespectful to the patients."

Shalof stressed that the shift work is demanding. She does 12-hour shifts two to three times a week, and like other members of her team, she has to work weekends and nights. But her colleagues make this gruelling schedule "all worthwhile," she said. "I love the calibre of people. The ICU is a place where doctors and nurses collaborate. Nurses have a lot of say."

Shalof has been involved in other aspects of nursing – teaching and research – but she said she's always been drawn back to hands-on patient care.

"I always want to go back to the bedside. That's where the challenges are. I love taking care of patients."

Shalof, 45, a longtime Toronto resident, is married to Ivan Lewis. They have two sons, Harry, 9, and Max, 6. She has been a nurse for some 20 years. Following her graduation from the University of Toronto in 1983, she worked at a cancer unit at the Tel Hashomer Hospital in Ramat Gan, Israel and at a veterans hospital in New York City. She returned to Toronto in 1987.

Website makes shopping for 'Jewish' movies easy to do

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

One of the biggest complaints I hear when people talk about "Jewish" videos or DVDs is that they can't find them in stores.

A new website was recently created to help people solve that problem.

Israelonvideo.com, set up by Video Service Corporation, has a number of Jewish videos available.

The titles available through Israelon video.com include many children's films that are perfect for the Passover holidays, such as The Seder on Planet Matzah Ball, Animated Haggadah, Passover at Bubbe's, Lamb Chop's Chanukah & Passover Surprise, Shalom Sesame-Passover and A Rugrat's Passover.

Another wonderful movie available through Israelonvideo.com is the animated short Something From Nothing, which was produced here in Canada.

This delightful film tells the story of a young boy and the amazing blanket his grandfather made for him. As the boy gets older, the blanket rips and gets progressively smaller. Each time the grandfather is able to turn the remnants into something wonderful for the boy.

Meanwhile, a family of mice live under the floor boards of the boy's home. The boy befriends one of the child mice, whose name is Mazal, and they quickly become inseparable companions.

Israelonvideo.com also has titles that until now have only been available through SISU Entertainment in the United States (www.sisuent.com): The City Touched by God, The Trojan Horse and The First Israeli in Space.

The last film tells the story of Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon, his training and his tragic flight into space.

A new release now available through this new website is Tel Aviv Stories, an Israeli comedy that tells three stories about unpredictable women and is available on DVD in both subtitled and dubbed versions.

Israelonvideo.com also sells many popular Jewish films such as The Pianist, Adam Sandler's Eight Crazy Nights, The Producers and Fiddler on the Roof. Most of these are available on VHS and DVD.

You can access the complete line of films and videos by visiting Israelonvideo.com, by calling Video Service Corporation at 416-597-8325 or 1-877-341-7577 or by e-mailing them at vidserv@globalserve.net.

FIDDLER ON THE ROOF
Starring Sam Moses & Gabrielle Jones
Set in the Russian village of Anatevka just prior to the Russian Revolution, Fiddler On The Roof is the story of Tevye, a poor dairyman who tries to instill in his five daughters the tradition of his tight-knit Jewish community. Caught in a world where everything is in transition, where traditions are broken, violated and changed, Tevye and his family endure and find a new strength and joy about life. Featuring songs such as "If I Were A Rich Man", "Tradition", "Miracles of Miracles", "Matchmaker, Matchmaker" and "Sunrise, Sunset".

U of T law prof discusses his 17 books – and counting

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Martin Friedland, the University of Toronto law professor and author of an impressive shelf of books, jokes that he's not about to change the "O.C." on his business cards to a "C.C." just because the Governor General recently upgraded his status within the Order of Canada from "Officer" to the much more distinguished "Companion."

Friedland, whose masterful The University of Toronto: A History appeared in 2002 to mark the school's 175th anniversary, is one of only about 400 citizens to receive the companion designation, the country's highest national honour.

Martin Friedland

Honours have been flowing steadily to the 71-year-old Toronto native and former dean of the law faculty. Last year he gave convocation addresses at U of T and York University and received honorary degrees from both institutions. His many other awards and honours include a recent medal from the Royal Society of Canada and a $50,000 Molson prize in 1995.

On a recent sunny afternoon, Friedland spoke with The CJN in his office in the elegantly pillared Joseph Flavelle House on Queen's Park Circle.

Reflecting upon the four decades of achievements that began soon after he was called to the Ontario bar in 1960, he said, "You just do one project at a time," adding that the 764-page U of T tome was "the perfect post-retirement project." He began the massive work at age 65 and it took him four years to complete.

Like each of his books, it was a "struggle" to write, he said. "I knew that it would be difficult to do but that it could be done. I never doubted that I would finish it, but I didn't know how well it would be received."

His determination not to let scholarship get in the way of the story paid off in the form of glowing reviews. He spent six months criss-crossing the country, promoting the book and giving talks about the university's history, which he said is, in part, a microcosm of our national history and the progression of ideas over the last two centuries.

Taken as an oeuvre, Friedland's body of 17 books reflect a wide range of subjects. Most are based on legal themes and have had significant influence on public policy. The first, Detention Before Trial (1965), was a detailed study of pretrial procedures in 6,000 court cases that led to changes to Canada's bail laws.

Similarly, A Place Apart (1995) spurred changes in the area of judicial appointments, while Controlling Misconduct in the Military (1997), which focused on the army's experiences in Somalia, likewise encouraged reforms. Other influential books and papers have focused on legal-social issues as diverse as traffic safety and gun control.

> One of only some 400 Canadians to be named a Companion of the Order of Canada

"All of my books are in different areas. The only time I repeated myself was in the three murder books, yet they're all different because they take place in different countries and involve different legal systems."

A professor emeritus since 1998, Friedland's roving imagination led him to write what he calls his "murder mysteries" – three non-fiction courtroom dramas chronicling intriguing crimes of the 19th-century. Each reflects a deep concern with the seeming arbitrariness of the criminal justice system.

"I was trying to make academic points about the frailty of the criminal justice system by using real cases, so I could show that even in the case of someone who might be hanged, there can be real doubt in the judge's mind about whether he is guilty or not."

In his first "true-crime" book, The Trials of Israel Lipski, which won a Crime Writers of Canada Award soon after its publication in 1984, Friedland revived an obscure but fascinating case involving a Jewish immigrant in London's seedy Whitechapel district.

"That was interesting for me because I learned a lot about Jewish immigration patterns and the anti-Semitism of the time, even the growth of Zionism. I got a feel for the times."

In writing Lipski, Friedland discovered he could generate suspense by not revealing the outcome of a trial until the closing chapters, leaving the reader guessing all the way through whether Lipski will be executed. He used a similar technique in the U of T history, typically beginning a section at a point of high drama, then filling in background and offering analysis.

Eager to do a murder book in a Canadian setting, he spent endless hours combing through old newspapers and transcripts for a good story. Eventually he happened upon a forgotten case that occurred in Valleyfield, Que., in 1895 and became increasingly fascinated. The resultant book, The Case of Valentine Shortis, appeared in 1986.

"I think I demonstrated, certainly to my own satisfaction, that the Shortis case influenced the 1896 election in which Wilfrid Laurier became prime minister. The case taught me a great amount about French-English relations, about the law of insanity and many other things."

While hunting for a suitable murder case set in the United States, Friedland edited Rough Justice, an anthology of essays on crime and literature (1991). His third murder story, The Death of Old Man Rice, was set in Manhattan and came out in 1994. Since then, he's been researching a fourth murder story based in India.

"I've got about three boxes of material here in the office and about 10 more at home. The case is centered in Calcutta, but it may be too complex to tell. There are a lot of false starts in these things."

One such false start involved a Jewish adventurer in British Columbia's Fraser River Valley more than 140 years ago. On a trip to Victoria, Friedland was intrigued to find that the first person buried in the old Jewish cemetery was a murder victim named Price.

"The tombstone said 'Killed in Cayoosh, on the Fraser River, May 1861.' So I thought it would be an interesting case. How did this Jewish man get to the gold-mining town of Cayoosh in 1861? What was his background? What happened to him? But I did a search and it turns out there wasn't enough material for me to proceed with a book."

His current writing project, tentatively titled Criminal Justice in Canada Revisited, is a sort of broad look at the diverse areas of law that he's investigated throughout his career. The volume is to be a kind of summing up of his many past endeavours and an attempt to knit them together into an integrated whole.

"I felt I had an obligation, in a sense, to take all of these individual topics I've worked on and say something intelligent about the criminal justice system as a whole."

It's a moot point whether the project's broad scope is a hint the prolific professor is planning to slow down. But why should he, just when he seems to have reached this new pinnacle of achievement?

As the interview concluded, Friedland spoke of his family's various involvements within the Jewish community and reminisced about his immigrant father, a former womenswear merchant whose universe centred around Queen Street and Spadina Avenue in Toronto's garment district. No doubt the latter would have been proud and thankful at how fully Canada has smiled upon his wise and industrious son.

Canoe trek to raise funds for juvenile arthritis

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

From left: Randy, Kira, Mary and Joshua Gangbar in a relaxed moment at last year's Voyageur trip.

When people think about arthritis, they generally associate it with the elderly. But the condition can also affect young people.

Just ask 15-year-old Joshua Gangbar. When he was three, he was diagnosed with juvenile diabetes, and since then has had to deal with pain, swollen joints, injections, drugs, doctors' appointments, medical tests, operations and physiotherapy.

His family is dealing with Joshua's situation by raising funds for research into juvenile arthritis at the Hospital for Sick Children. And they are doing it in an innovative way – not by art auctions or dinners, but by getting sponsors for a family canoe and camping trip.

"I'm not a fundraiser. I'm a doctor," said Joshua's father Randy. "But the family, Joshua included, does a lot of camping, so that made sense to us."

"I went to [hospital officials] and asked for their wish list, what they [would] really want to help in the fight against juvenile arthritis. They said that what would really help is a full-time pediatric fellow."

This would entail raising some $55,000, far more than the $10,000 the family had envisioned.

Randy decided to go on a special, five-day trek down the French River to the Old Voyageur channel into Georgian Bay and back. They called the project "Joshua's Voyageurs," and established a special fund in that name at the hospital.

"I didn't want there to be any overhead," Randy said. He managed to get equipment, computer services and food donated, and paid for the other costs himself.

They didn't know what the response would be, but they didn't expect to raise some $80,000.

Juvenile arthritis is one of the more common chronic childhood diseases. It affects about one in 1,000 children under age16. It is diagnosed when there is continuous inflammation of one or more joints that lasts for more than six weeks, and for which no specific cause can be found.

The inflamed joints can be swollen, hot and painful, often making it difficult for the child to eat, walk, dress and write.

Sometimes the disease can cause generalized inflammation, which can lead to high fevers, rash, heart inflammation and anemia, deformities and even serious eye inflammation, which in turn sometimes leads to blindness.

Only about half of the children affected grow out of the disease.

His father said Joshua has a moderate case and remains active. However, he has had two surgeries on his jaw, which still doesn't open completely.

> 'We didn't know if he had cancer or just what was going on'

Randy said that when Joshua was three, he began to limp.

"We didn't worry too much at first," he said. But when it persisted, he and his wife, also a physician, became concerned and took him to the Hospital for Sick Children.

Joshua became quite ill – all his joints were inflamed, and he was in a lot of pain.

"We didn't know if he had cancer or just what was going on."

This past fall, the family got the final diagnosis. It was good news because he did not have an acute disease, but bad news because the condition was chronic.

Joshua now gets injections of a long-acting anti-inflammatory medication, and takes Indocid, another anti-inflammatory.

Despite his condition, "he isn't a kvetch and doesn't pity himself," his father said, adding that he is a whiz at video and computer games, plays soccer and goes skiing and camping.

A family faced with this kind of situation can choose one of two paths, Randy said: either wallow in misery or become active. The Gangbars decided on the latter.

Daughter Kira, a student at Montcrest School, convinced her fellow students to change their annual Jump Rope for Heart project to a Jump Rope for Juvenile Arthritis. They raised $12,000 for the cause. Kira has also started to give speeches about juvenile arthritis.

Originally, Joshua's Voyageurs was intended as a one-shot project. But "I couldn't walk away," Randy said. The family is planning another trip this summer. They want to get more corporate sponsors and establish a more secure funding base. The website www.joshuasvoyageurs.org gives information about juvenile arthritis, and has a diary and photographs of last year's trip. For more information, call Gangbar at 416-544-9884.

Jews and the American entertainment media examined in captivating book

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Since the advent of the nickelodeon in the early 20th century, Jews have played a prominent role in the American entertainment industry as exhibitors, producers, directors and, to a lesser degree, actors.

This facet of Americana was recently explored by The Jewish Museum in New York City. And in conjunction with the exhibit, Princeton University Press published a fat, handsome coffee table volume, Entertaining America: Jews, Movies and Broadcasting, written by J. Hoberman and Jeffrey Shandler.

The authors are eminently qualified to analyze the subject. Hoberman, the senior film critic of the Village Voice, teaches in the department of cinema at New York University. Shandler is a professor of Jewish studies at Rutger University. They contribute most of the erudite and informative essays in this book.

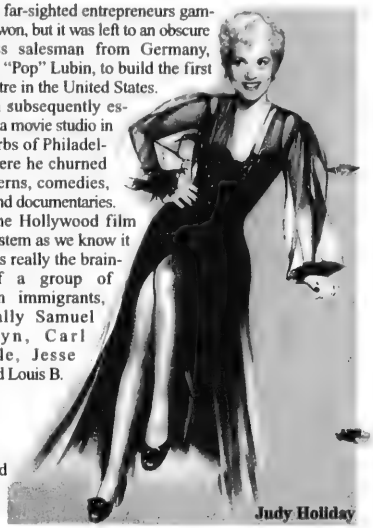
As they remind us, Jews were in the forefront of the formation of the modern entertainment industry in the United States.

Nickelodeons, the cheap entertainment of the day for the working class and immigrants, preceded silent movies. Recognizing the potential of the nickelodeon as a cultural opiate of the masses, garment manufacturers from Marcus Loew to William Fox enthusiastically embraced it.

These far-sighted entrepreneurs gambled and won, but it was left to an obscure eye glass salesman from Germany, Sigmund "Pop" Lubin, to build the first film theatre in the United States.

Lubin subsequently established a movie studio in the suburbs of Philadelphia, where he churned out westerns, comedies, dramas and documentaries.

But the Hollywood film studio system as we know it today was really the brainchild of a group of European immigrants, principally Samuel Goldwyn, Carl Laemmle, Jesse Lasky and Louis B. Mayer.



Judy Holiday

After talking pictures supplanted silent movies, the industry was dominated and shaped by moguls, producers and directors such as Jack Warner, Harry Cohn, Irving Thalberg and David Selznick.

In front of the camera, Theda Bara (born Theodesia Goodman), the daughter of Polish Jews, was one of Hollywood's first stars, appearing in 38 films before her popularity faded in 1919.

Bronco Billy Anderson, the original movie-star cowboy, was in fact Max Aronson, a travelling salesman from Arkansas. He retired in 1915, just as Charles Chaplin (who was not Jewish) was on the ascent.

During the 1930s, Sophia Kosow, otherwise known as Sylvia Sidney, loomed large in movies, mainly in City Streets and Madame Butterfly.

And in the 1940s and 1950s, after the heyday of the Marx Brothers, who elevated comedy to an art, Judy Holliday (Judith Tuvim) wowed fans in a slew of films, particularly Born Yesterday.

John Garfield (Jacob Julius Garfinkle), who achieved fame in The Postman Always Rings Twice and Gentleman's Agreement, died of a broken heart, victimized by the McCarthyist witch hunt.

And where would broadcasting have been without the likes of William Paley (CBS) and David Sarnoff (NBC)?

Radio, which peaked in the 1930s and 1940s, enabled vaudeville performers like Jack Benny, George Burns, Fanny Brice, Eddie Cantor and the inimitable Gertrude Berg to reach a national audience.

Berg, the most recognizable Jewish matriarch in the American popular imagination, enjoyed a 35-year career in The Goldbergs, which rivaled that of the iconic Amos 'n' Andy.

For all their success, Jewish entertainers could not stem the tide of anti-Semitism protesting the visibility of Jews in radio and on screen.

Examining this issue at length, Hoberman and Shandler cite the anti-Semitic diatribes of auto manufacturer Henry Ford and the accusations of a succession of now-forgotten scribblers who claimed that Jews were undermining America's moral fibre and lowering esthetic standards.

In comprehensive fashion, the authors also look at more recent developments in the industry – studying the rise of Barbra Streisand and Roseanne Barr (Barsky), offering analyses of the film Exodus and the TV sitcom Seinfeld and charting the place of the Holocaust in American cinema.

In short, Entertaining America stands as a valuable, captivating resource in tracing the relationship between Jews and the billion-dollar entertainment media.

Aspirals gymnasts show well at Valentine Classic

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Nine-year-old Ilana Enoukov earned a gold medal in a free routine in level two of provincial competition at the fourth annual Valentine Classic at St. Elizabeth High School in Thornhill.

Enoukov was one of 15 competitors representing the Toronto Aspirals rhythmic gymnastics club at the season-opening event. The club also had 12 performers gain public exposure through intermission routines.

Ilana Enoukov

Israel-born Enoukov and Mariya Zekel were among the top Jewish athletes at the competition. Zekel, 11, placed fourth in a level five free routine and sixth overall with ball and ribbon.

Dalia Kagramanov of Richmond Hill finished fifth overall and fifth using the ball apparatus in category four.

In rhythmic gymnastics, competitors use ropes, hoops, balls, clubs and ribbons as extensions of their bodies in routines set to music. The performances take place on a carpeted mat that is 13 x 13 metres.

Sima Studin, the general manager and president of the Aspirals, says young athletes develop in ways that go far beyond excellence in rhythmic gymnastics. Many gain confidence and often perform better in school.

Aspirals, one of the largest clubs of its kind in the province, caters primarily to girls from ages four to 16. It also offers a small gym program for kids three-to-five years old run at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, its home base for the past seven years.

Aspirals also operates out of a newly formed centre in High Park, with other locations in Thornhill, Richmond Hill, Aurora, and Woodbridge.

A rhythmic gymnast growing up in Ukraine, Studin reinvolved herself in the sport in Canada when it captured her daughter Rebecca's fancy.

"She got interested at age five and we took it from there," Studin said of Rebecca, who competed with the Aspirals at the senior national level before retiring seven years ago at 16. She remains involved today as one of the centre's coaches and its choreographer.

Aspirals' unique coaching philosophy caters to each child individually, working in small groups to help everyone reach their potential.

"We believe active kids become active adults and we try to promote that," said Studin, whose members practice anywhere from one to 15 hours a week, depending on their level and interest.

As part of the Valentine Classic, participants collected more than 100 articles of warm clothing for the needy at Firgrove Public School, an inner city school.

The Toronto Aspirals will host an invitational competition at the York Stars club in Markham on April 23 before travelling to Brock University in St. Catharines for the provincial championships in May.

FLIP OVER FOR ANSWERS TO CROSSWORD.

Two for Bridge

By ERIC KOKISH
and BEVERLY KRAFT

Beverly: "With two boards to go, it seemed certain that Italy, ahead by 21 IMPs, would win the 2003 Bermuda Bowl. However, on the penultimate board, Italy's Bocchi/Duboin (uncharacteristically) went wrong and presented 10 IMPs to their desperate American opponents.

"It was exciting watching the action 'live' on my computer, thanks to the efforts of Bridge Base Online and e-bridge. Thousands of us watched these free web-casts from home. I had just returned from Monte Carlo after our Canadian women's team had lost in the quarterfinals to USA2, but Eric was still there, fulfilling his dual role as coach of USA1 and Vugraph commentator. There had been many lead changes and a lot of tired Bridge through the first 127 deals of the match and I had felt Eric's pain as his team repeatedly missed opportunities down the stretch. Tell us about the incredible ending, Kokes."

Eric: "There was a definite sense of Italian fear in the Vugraph theatre, mingled with hope from the beleaguered American supporters. Italy's lead was down to 11 IMPs and anything was possible now.

"With only E/W vulnerable, the Americans needed to make a non-vulnerable game in one room and collect a non-vulnerable two-trick set or a doubled one-trick set in the other to tie, or gain the equivalent of a full vulnerable game swing to win.

2♥	3♦	Pass	Pass
3♥	Pass	4♥	All Pass

(i) Precision, 2+♦ (ii) Hearts and spades

"The Closed Room result was a poor one for Italy. Bocchi/Duboin over-reached to 4♦, after stopping at 2♥ and went four down for -400.

"Suddenly, all the Americans needed to tie was +100 from Hamman/Soloway, +200 or more to win. But how could they achieve any plus score with the E/W cards? N/S were unlikely to get higher than 3♦, and if E/W competed to 3♥, the terrible breaks would be impossible to overcome.

Open Room

West	North	East	South
Hamman	Lauria	Soloway	Versace
Pass	1♦	2♦(i)	Dble(ii)
2♥	3♦	Pass	Pass
3♥	5♦	Dble	All Pass

(i) Hearts and spades; (ii) Cards

"Sure enough, Lauria/Versace stopped at 3♦. The Americans could not win and were unlikely to tie by passing out 3♦, but Hamman kept his team's hopes alive by protecting with 3♥.Now all Lauria had to do to give Italy its first Bermuda Bowl in 28 years was . . . pass.

"But he didn't know that, of course, although he believed the match was very close. Had he competed to 4♦, we might still be playing, but Lauria boldly jumped to 5♦, ironically paralleling Bocchi's decision to bid game when his side had stopped in a partial.

"Soloway doubled and led the ♣A, Hamman contributing the neutral seven. While Soloway was deciding what to play next (two rounds of trumps would have led to -300 or -500 and an American victory), Versace left the room, leaving Lauria to play both his own cards and dummy's. Soloway switched to the ♥Q. Lauria won the ace and returned the ♥J, ruffing East's king in dummy. Declarer ruffed a club with the ♦8 and ruffed the ♥3 with the ♦J, hoping to fell the 10 in West. Now Lauria was 'sure' to go two down, reducing the Italian supporters to a near-catatonic state. Lauria reached over to dummy to lead the king of spades, jack, deuce, ace.

"Everyone 'knew' that Soloway would cash the ♥10 and that the ♦A would provide the second undertrick for -300. However, Hamman had given Soloway the wrong count in hearts. On that basis Lauria was out of hearts, so it couldn't hurt to play a spade as Hamman might be ruffing it, and if he couldn't, it wouldn't matter.

"When Soloway played a spade, the Italian supporters who had not given up had something to cheer about as Lauria would be able to discard his heart loser on the ♠Q and escape for -100. The match would be tied and the teams would play another eight boards to break it!

"But that is not what happened. Lauria, either because he was expecting Soloway to cash the ♥10 or because he didn't see what Soloway had played, reached out and detached the ♠7 as his discard from dummy. We saw it happen on the Bridge Vision screen and heard the card caller name that card on the microphone. After West followed suit with the ♠10, Lauria saw what had happened. He tried to replace the ♠7 with the king, but the Tournament Director, after confirming the facts, ruled that the ♠7 was a played card, as declarer had detached it with the intent of playing it. It was an unfortunate mental error, but an error nonetheless, and the ruling was a clear decision on a point of law. So Lauria had to lose the ♥3 after all and was down 300. The Americans gained 12 IMPs, just enough to win the Bermuda Bowl by a single IMP, 304-303."

Beverly: "It's over now, sweetie, you can exhale."

ספרותנו

יעל זליגר

בגדאד אחמול, מאה: ששון סומך, 2004

בגדאד אחמול הוא סיפור אוטוביוגרפי של ששון סומך שנולד בבגדאד, בירת עיראק חי בה עד גיל 17. זו איננה יצירה ספרותית אך פרקי הזכרונות מרתקים; תמונה מופלאה של חיי הקהילה היהודית בבגדאד בשנים שקדמו להתחלותה. פרקים אחדים פורסמו בעבר במוסף הספרותי "הארץ", אך עתה הם מופיעים במקובץ, בתוספת רישומים שלא התפרסמו עדיין. בסוף הספר בחר סומך להביא שורה של צילומים שתורמים להמחשת האווירה בבגדאד היהודית בשנותיה האחרונות.

ששון סומך הגיע ארצה ב- 1951. בשנת 1968 סיים דוקטוראט בחקר הספרות הערבית באוניברסיטת אוקספורד. לאחר מכן שימש כשלושים שנה פרופסור לספרות ערבית חדשה באוניברסיטת תל-אביב. כמו כן פרסם ספרים רבים בחקר יצירתו הספרותית של השלום הערבי. בפתיחה מספר סומך שכאשר הגיעו יהודי עיראק בשנים 1950 – 1951 בהמוניהם לישראל, המושג "יהודי" היה בתודעתם מי ששייך לקהילת יהודי בבל ומדבר בדיאלקט היהודי, הייחודי לבגדאד ולדרום עיראק. יהודי בגדאד היו גאים בוותק שלהם בארץ נהריים ובעברם השופע יצירה תרבותית ורוחנית.

לסומך זכורונות מאוד נעימים מילדותו בבגדאד; "מה שמאכלס את זיכרון ימי הילדות שלי הם הכוכבים הבגדאדיים המנצנצים לרוחב השמים ולאורכם בלילות הקיץ. כי-על-כן, במשך חודשי הקיץ החמים והיבשים עולים תושבי בגדאד לגגות הבתים, שם הם נמים את שנתם..." את ימי חופשת הקיץ היה מבלה בקריאה בלתי פוסקת של ספרים, בערבית ואח"כ באנגלית.

אמו של ששון באה ממשפחה מיוחסת ולמדה בבית ספר "אליאנס". היא הייתה אשה יפה ומהדורה ולשונה אנגלית וצרפתית. אביו, בן-דודה של אמו, היה משכיל ועבד כפקיד בבנק בריטי.

עוד מספר לנו ששון סומך על חבריות, נערים ונערות וכן על אהבתו למתקרי לשון ולשירה.

אני מאוד ממליצה על הספר בגדאד אחמול בעיקר לקוראים שאינם יודעים הרבה על פרק זה מההיסטוריה שלנו.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman

Judaism has always regarded the misuse of public funds to be a most grievous sin. Whereas Jewish law stipulates that a worker be given opportunity to correct his inefficiencies and be given ample warning before dismissal, one is mandated to remove immediately and without warning those who violate the public trust. Additionally, due to the difficulty of properly reimbursing those who were wronged, it is doubtful whether tshuvah (repentance) is even possible. It is for this reason that when electing public officials – be they in our shuls, schools or on government benches – we should follow the advice of Yitro and seek "men [or women] of accomplishment, God-fearing people, men of truth, people who despise money" (Exodus 19:21). It is because of the extreme importance and difficulty of properly serving the public that every Shabbat we offer a blessing to "those who involve themselves in the needs of the community faithfully."

The nature of public work is such that hard painful decisions are often necessary, decisions that will inevitably hurt some people. While the faithful public servant is exonerated, as such consequences are a necessary by-product of the mitzvah of serving the public, absent the pure motivation of "acting for the sake of heaven" one must bear full responsibility for the pain caused. This is truly a heavy burden and public life should be avoided by those who cannot meet this standard.

The Shulchan Aruch rules that one should not initially appoint those who have a shady reputation, even if they relate to events of years past. The stakes are too high to hope that the rumours are not true and that the person has truly changed. While this ruling is codified in the laws of appointing religious functionaries, it appears that the same rules would apply to all public servants. However, once a person is already serving in a public capacity, they cannot be removed on accusations alone. Hard evidence – that is, the testimony of two honest witnesses – is necessary. The Chafetz Chaim, a man who spent his life stressing the importance of not speaking or even believing lashon hara, adds that a credible persistent rumour of wrongdoing, provided it comes from those who have "no axe to grind" may also be grounds for dismissal. However, for a sitting public servant who has done tshuvah for past wrongs and is currently performing properly, dismissal would not be allowed.

Gov.'t plans to fight racism

Cabinet drafting 10-point program

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Liberal MP Art Eggleton dropped the hint at the recent Toronto rally against anti-Semitism and later confirmed it to The CJN: the federal government is about to unveil a sweeping, multi-point action plan to fight racism and educate Canadians about its dangers.

Designed in part to counter growing anti-Semitic hate crimes in this country, the plan, still in the final stages of cabinet approval, will promote anti-racism messages through advertising, earmark funds for community-based programs and request that police forces establish special hate crime units, if they don't already have them.

'Effective and comprehensive approach'

The 10-point blueprint will mark an "effective and comprehensive approach," federal Justice Minister Irwin Cotler told reporters last week, only days after appearing at a press conference to denounce the firebombing of a United Talmud Torahs school in Montreal, where he had been a student.

Cotler, who had clearly appeared shaken by the Montreal attack, said the plan "has a panoply of initiatives. It has an education component. It has a legal component and it has an inter-cultural dialogue component" in order to "mobilize a constituency of conscience in this country."

Justice Minister Irwin Cotler surveys the damage at the United Talmud Torahs elementary school in St. Laurent from the fire bombing in the early hours of Apr. 5. Visibly shaken, Cotler vowed to bring " the full force of the law to bear" on those who commit such "cowardly acts of racist hate crimes. We will not be silenced, we will not be intimidated. And we will act." Please see story on page 20.

New Shul in Okanagan

KELOWNA, B.C. — A new shul, Congregation Succot Shalom, held its first event, a seder on the first night of Pesach, at The Laughing Moon, a Kelowna restaurant owned by a local Jewish couple. The shul, which is Conservative in its practices, will hold services in members' homes until a permanent location is found. Sam Larry, a longtime community activist, is its religious leader.

Israeli Bid For Hollinger

TORONTO — A consortium led by Israeli billionaire Chaim Saban, creator of the Power Rangers children's TV series, is trying to buy all the assets of Hollinger International, which owns the Jerusalem Post and Britain's Daily Telegraph, the Times of London reported last week. The consortium includes German media magnate Axel Springer, publisher of German tabloid Bild, and is supported by the venture capital firm Hellman & Friedman. Saban and Springer face a competing bid from New York-based buyout firm Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. KKR reportedly has close ties to Conrad Black, Hollinger's former CEO who was forced out amid allegations that he received unauthorized fees from the company. A successful bidder is expected to be named next month.

WORLD

Vienna Jews Vulnerable

VIENNA — Jews in Vienna have been increasingly confronted with physical attacks over the past two years, according to the Austrian Jewish community. In a statement on the European Union Monitoring Centre's report on anti-Semitism, released earlier this month, the Jewish community expressed concern that the report found the "taboo against anti-Semitism" had been greatly weakened in Austria. The statement said that in addition to abuse and insults, there had been a rise in reports of anti-Semitic graffiti, offensive letters and vandalism. It said Orthodox Jews had been most affected by both physical and verbal attacks.

Seder in Rio

RIO DE JANEIRO — Some 100 Christians and several Jewish leaders attended a joint Passover seder in Rio de Janeiro. The April 1 seder was held in Rio's largest synagogue and led by Brazil's only woman rabbi. Rabbi Sandra Kochmann, assistant spiritual leader of the 1,000-family Reform temple ARI, discussed the meaning of Pesach and each of the seder foods and prayers. Father Jesus Hortal, the rector of the Pontifical Catholic University, explained the meaning of Easter and distributed chocolate eggs. "We must build bridges of understanding," said Rabbi Sergio Margulies, ARI's senior rabbi.

Seder in Kosovo

PRISTINA — The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee sponsored a seder on the first night of Passover for the few Jews who remain in Kosovo and Jewish soldiers stationed there. The seder was moved from Prizren, where Kosovo's two Jewish families live, to Pristina because of security concerns. Ethnic tensions have recently flared anew in Kosovo, leaving 28 dead and 600 wounded.

Apologize, Envoy Told

KIEV — The Israeli ambassador to Kiev should apologize to Ukrainians or leave the country, a Ukrainian lawmaker said. In an article earlier this month, Socialist lawmaker Ivan Bokiy wrote that Ambassador Naomi Ben-Ami's involvement in a recent meeting that condemned anti-Semitic articles in the Silski Visti newspaper was an act of interference in Ukraine's domestic affairs. Bokiy said the Israeli envoy was in effect helping the Ukrainian government to silence independent media. In the same article, the lawmaker, who is known for his anti-Semitic remarks, compared "Chabad Zionism" to fascism. A Kiev court ordered the paper to stop publishing because of its anti-Semitism, but it continues to publish using legal loopholes.

Intern for Sharansky

NEW YORK — The North American Jewish Student Alliance (NAJSA) is seeking one person per semester to intern in the office of Natan Sharansky, Israel's minister for Jerusalem and Diaspora affairs this summer and fall, as well as in spring 2005. Those interested in the internships, jointly offered by the Jewish Agency's Israel Program Center-Internship Program, can apply at www.najsa.org. NAJSA is a student-run, democratic, non-denominational organization that accepts all Jewish students in North America.

Passion Breaks Box Office Record in Italy

ROME — Mel Gibson's controversial film on Jesus' last hours broke all box office records for a first-night showing in Italy, its distributor said last week.

The Passion of The Christ took in 1.22 million euros (about $1.5 million US) last Wednesday, beating the 1.11 million first-night takings for Lord of the Rings: The Return of the King, it said.

The film opened last week across Europe and the Middle East and is reportedly also doing very well in the largely Catholic countries of Ireland, Portugal, Poland and Croatia. It is also breaking box office records in Arab countries. Only a few states, including Bahrain and Kuwait, are not showing it.

In Italy, no viewer restrictions have been imposed on the violent film about Jesus' crucifixion.

It has stirred controversy in many countries where it has been shown, with critics denouncing it as anti-Semitic and a distortion of Christian teaching. Gibson belongs to a conservative Catholic sect that rejects 1960s-era reforms to Catholicism absolving Jews of responsibility for Jesus' death.

Incoming Toronto Star publisher has big plans

'I believe in the legitimacy and necessity of Israel'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For a man who doesn't even see himself as a journalist, Michael Goldbloom hasn't fared too badly in this rough-and-tumble profession.

"My experience in journalism is quite limited, and I don't consider myself to be a journalist," Goldbloom, the incoming publisher of the Toronto Star and the former publisher of Montreal's only English language daily, the Gazette, said in a recent interview.

Currently the Star's deputy publisher, a job he has held for almost a year, Goldbloom officially assumes his new position on May 5 at the annual meeting of Torstar Corp., the Toronto-based company that owns the Star, Canada's largest daily in terms of paid circulation.

Now 51, Goldbloom comes on board, as the paper's first Jewish publisher, with Toronto still embroiled in a no-holds-barred newspaper war and with some Jewish readers claiming that the Star – which is small-L liberal in its orientation – is anti-Israel.

Taking his mandate seriously, Goldbloom observed: "A newspaper is a public trust and a unique enterprise in a democratic society."

The son of Victor Goldbloom, a pediatrician-turned politician who represented the Montreal district of D'Arcy-McGee as an MNA, and Sheila Goldbloom, a retired McGill University professor of social work, he is a soft-spoken, deliberate person of many parts.

While attending Harvard University and McGill, where he respectively studied modern European history and literature and law, Goldbloom was a summer reporter and a weekly columnist at the Gazette.

Shortly after graduating from McGill, he wrote editorials on legal, constitutional and political issues for the newspaper for about a year.

For a decade, from 1981 to 1991, he practised labour law in Montreal. And between 1991 and 1994, he was president and chief executive officer of the YMCA in Montreal, where he resolved a serious financial crisis and revitalized volunteer and staff leadership.

In his third year at the Y, a headhunter told him the Gazette was seeking a bilingual publisher who understood the unique character of Montreal and Quebec.

As Gazette publisher from 1994 to 2001, Goldbloom placed new emphasis on explanatory journalism and increased profitability. But when the Aspers of Winnipeg purchased the daily, Goldbloom said, his days were numbered.

"We had a divergence of views on how to run the paper," he said. "They wanted me to leave, and that was the best thing for me to do."

Goldbloom, a founding member of the English rights group Alliance Quebec, subsequently spent time as a visiting scholar at the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada.

Fighting the illness

From the editor's desk

Last month, York University professor Martin Lockshin spoke to a large gathering of high school students in Toronto who had come together in a North York park to rally in solidarity against the rash of anti-Semitic incidents that had uncharacteristically broken out in their city.

"Anti-Semitism is a vile illness, a scourge that affects gentile society," Lockshin told the gathering. "While we Jews are the targets of anti-Semitism, it is the non-Jews who are affected by the illness. It is the non-Jews of conscience who must lead the fight against the illness that affects non-Jewish society. Anti-Semitism is a problem of gentile society, not of Jewish society. Progressive and liberal gentiles should be the ones leading the fight against manifestations of anti-Semitism in Canada, in Europe, and against the meteoric rise of anti-Semitism in Arab countries."

Alas, "non-Jews of conscience" and "progressive and liberal gentiles" in Canada are now being tested. And, in Prof. Lockshin's words, it is they who must now lead the fight against the vile illness that so infects individuals that they try to burn down a school.

And they must do so urgently.

For the horrific firebombing last week of the library at the United Talmud Torah Schools in St. Laurent has introduced a new, ominous element in the nature of the anti-Semitic threat in Canada's largest Jewish communities: violence against people and not just property.

It is therefore deeply gratifying that the elected leaders of all levels of government in Ontario and Quebec appear to be rising to the test.

The National Assembly last week unanimously condemned the firebombing. Premier Jean Charest set the tone and the content of the debate.

"Since Sept. 11, 2001, the world has entered a period of political instability. We must say it, recognize it. Sadly, our newscasts are often a continuation of tragedies that are motivated, in fact, by hate and intolerance… I hope, together as witnesses of these acts of intolerance, of lack of respect, we will always have the chance, the courage to rise up and say: No, this doesn't represent who we are."

Parti Québécois leader Bernard Landry also invoked images of the horrors of the Nazi regime and the silence and inaction of the civilized world that preceded them.

"To burn books," Landry said, "in all circumstances is a crime against the best of what is inside of men and women – a crime against the spirit, a crime against humanity."

A day earlier, Prime Minister Paul Martin compared the attack to cancer, which he urged "we must all utterly condemn and draw together to fight."

But the true measure of the resolve of our "non-Jewish leaders of conscience" in the fight against the illness that we know as anti-Semitism will be in their deeds.

Their words are vital and thus very welcome. Moreover, they set forth the examples that create the policy climate in which remedial steps can be taken to combat the illness.

But without palpable remedial steps that include security and law enforcement measures, educational initiatives and ecumenical courage, the illness will not be checked.

This particular strain of the illness, we know, is being fed by the lies and deceptions about Israel, Jews and Judaism emanating from radical, fundamentalist Jihadist haters and their followers.

And it has already attacked the Canadian body politic.

A weekly publication such as The CJN must always contend with production challenges that militate against our ability to bring as up-to-date as possible a record of the news and events of the preceding week to our readers.

The Passover and Easter holidays this year presented our staff with very severe production challenges. Normally, we have five full working days to produce an edition of the paper. But due to the fact that Yom Tov Pesach fell on Tuesday, Wednesday and the following Monday and Tuesday, and that Easter fell on the intermittent Friday, we were left, essentially, with only one day – Thursday April 8 – to lay out and produce the issue you are reading right now.

That would have been very difficult, though not impossible, to achieve.

Therefore, to avoid that predicament, we actually began production of the this issue during the production schedule for the preceding one. But, instead of going to press on April 12, a usual Monday press date, we had to go to press on Thursday, April 8. Thus, none of the news reported in this issue will have occurred after April 8.

I am pleased to introduce a new weekly column by Avrum Rosensweig on the Inside Back page of the paper.

Rosensweig has already developed a considerable following through his monthly contributions to The CJN. Thus, we have asked him to provide our readers with more of the poignant, edgy, street-smart, sassy, creative and local insights for which he is widely known and admired.

MOTHER AND CHILD REUNION:

This young immigrant soldier and her mother were reunited in Israel this Passover through a program that brought 30 Jewish men and women from the former Soviet Union to the country, where their children are serving in the Israel Defence Forces. The Keshet program, sponsored by the Jewish Agency for Israel and funded by the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, marked the first time most of the parents had been to Israel.

Rabbi defends authenticity of modern Orthodoxy

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Jacob Schacter has some advice to offer modern Orthodox Jews who may feel marginalized within the greater Orthodox community.

"Some… have a sense that modern Orthodox ideology is less genuine or less authentic than ideologies to its right," the dean of the Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik Institute in Brookline, Mass., said in an interview while on a recent visit to Toronto as scholar-in-residence at Shaarei Shomayim and Beth Jacob V'Anshe Drildz Congregations.

Rabbi Jacob Schacter

In an informal Shabbat discussion on "Challenges to the Contemporary Orthodox Community" – one of four talks at Shaarei Shomayim alone – Rabbi Schacter said he was left with "the sense that there's a lack of appreciation of the genuine and profound authenticity" of modern Orthodox ideology among some of the movement's members.

"It is incumbent upon them to educate themselves," he said.

Although the issue is not exclusive to Toronto, Rabbi Schacter said it seems to him it may be felt more intensely here, because of the strength of the right-wing Orthodox community in Toronto relative to many other cities in North America.

The rabbi, a Bronx native who was raised in a modern Orthodox home, was ordained in a haredi yeshiva in 1973 and earned a PhD in Jewish Studies from Harvard University in 1988.

"I learned a lot from my years in yeshiva," he told The CJN. "I have a tremendous amount of gratitude for everything I learned there," he said. He noted that he is still very much in contact with the haredi world and was warmly received by his former rosh yeshiva in a visit just last month.

Rabbi Schacter, who was a pulpit rabbi for more than 20 years, said, "what we are trying to do [at the institute] is to project the values and ideology of Rabbi Soloveitchik, which at its core...[gives] validity not only to immersion in traditional Judaism and Jewish law, but also to understanding and appreciating the value of the culture of the world around us."

Cautioning that it has to be "filtered properly," Rabbi Schacter said there is much in western culture that "we should embrace and integrate into our understanding of what it means to be a better Jew and a better human being. The core of modern Orthodoxy is the value of the culture around us."

Each generation chooses what it considers to be meaningful, said the rabbi, following his Sunday morning talk at Beth Jacob about the 12th-century sage Maimonides. "What Maimonides considered to be helpful to him in a cultural context is not necessarily helpful to us, but the notion of seeking value in a cultural context is a very important one."

"Today, Jews across the board… are continually struggling with the challenges of living as Jews in an increasingly secular world," said Rabbi Moshe Shulman, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim, in a news release prior to the event. Rabbi Shulman and Rabbi Jay Kelman, spiritual leader at Beth Jacob, both took part in a recent conference at the institute that is part of an ongoing program for pulpit rabbis.

The institute, said Rabbi Schacter, is "designed to develop a Judaism that's very compelling and exciting for contemporary Orthodox Jews."

Among its students is a group of Reform, Reconstructionist and Conservative rabbis who study with Rabbi Schacter about six times a year, following the request of a local Reform rabbi who had attended an institute event. "There's no agenda," Rabbi Schacter said. "It's Jews getting together to study Torah."

For Rabbi Schacter, who is close to completing a book on Rabbi Soloveitchik's teachings on Tisha b'Av, the late modern Orthodox leader – who referred to himself simply as a melamed (teacher) – is a role model. He first met him at age six, was married to his wife by him, and attended his classes both as a graduate student and in later years.

"He spent most of his time teaching Talmud. That, I'm sure, is what he would want to be remembered for."

But Rabbi Schacter remembers him as much more than that. In a talk he gave last year, he recalled among other things Rabbi Soloveitchik's "dazzling intellect, his original mind, his charismatic personality, his spellbinding oratorical skills, his charming sense of humour [and] his overwhelming fealty to the mesorah [tradition] combined with openness to the best in the world around him."

CORRECTION

The article "Canoe trek to raise funds for juvenile arthritis" (CJN, April 8) incorrectly stated that the family of Joshua Gangbar received a final diagnosis of his condition this past fall. In fact, the family received the diagnosis 12 years ago, when Joshua was three years old. As well, in the second paragraph, Joshua's illness was incorrectly identified as juvenile diabetes. The CJN regrets the errors.

Western media downplay divisions among Arab states

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Two items this week:

First, on March 29, the Arab League unexpectedly cancelled a summit meeting scheduled for the next day in Tunis. The cancellation received very limited attention in much of the western media, while reports of a pending corruption indictment against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon got inordinate coverage. This shows that the major western media outlets pay relatively little attention to important developments in the Arab world.

For example, on March 29 – the same day the Arab League meeting was cancelled – the Globe and Mail ran Matthew Kalman's article, "Sharon faces corruption charges," on the front page. There was no coverage of the summit, not even a mention in the "World Brief" section. The Globe did, however, run an editorial on the topic the next day.

The National Post, on the other hand, ran both stories. Alongside a Daily Telegraph item about Sharon's mounting legal problems, Siri Agrall reported in "Democracy Divides Arab League," March 29, that the summit foundered when a number of member countries turned down a proposal to endorse democracy and reject "extremism, fanaticism, violence and terrorism."

The francophone electronic media in Canada gave the cancellation a lot more attention than the anglophone press did, perhaps a reflection of France's greater interest in North Africa. This made the paucity of English language coverage even more noticeable.

The New York Times gave the summit front-page coverage. In "Summit's Collapse Puts Arab Leaders in Disarray," March 29, Neil MacFarquhar wrote that while the exact reasons for the collapse were in dispute, there was widespread agreement that it was an embarrassment. Not only did it highlight the deep divisions among Arab League members, but also underscored the great reluctance of the Arab world to openly face the challenges of genuine reform.

Among other countries of the 22-member Arab League, Egypt, Syria, Lebanon and Saudi Arabia used Israel's killing of Hamas founder and leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin as a reason to avoid being seen to side with U.S. President George W. Bush's call for democratic reform in the Arab world. Reportedly, they stated that talk of democratic reform was "unwise" at this time.

But Saudi Arabia had already clamped down on a nascent reform-minded organization well before Israel's operation against Yassin. It arrested a number of liberal advocates, including reformers striving for individual freedom of expression and assembly. Riyadh's decision to not support the summit's liberal ideals was clearly consistent with its own repressive policies, and had nothing to do with Israel's actions. Israel, as usual, was simply a convenient excuse for the Arabs to avoid dealing with genuine reform.

The second item concerns CBC-TV news coverage of the abuse of Palestinian children recruited for suicide bombings.

On March 16, CBC TV News' Adrienne Arsenault reported at length about an 11-year-old Palestinian boy, Adbulla Quraan, who was caught unknowingly carrying a bomb at an Israeli roadblock in the West Bank. Arsenault said: "To recruit children is not unheard of here [in Nablus]," but using an 11-year-old child "is a dark first."

On March 25, Arsenault did a related story about Husam Abdu, a diminutive 16-year-old caught at an IDF checkpoint wearing an explosive belt. Arsenault described his "enraged" family, but caught something rarely heard in the western media. She quoted the mother on camera who said in Arabic: "If I lost him, I wouldn't blame him. Israel and America are to blame."

Arsenalt then commented: "That's a frequent comment here, when cameras are on. Talk of the role of militant groups in all this is only whispered. One teenager trying to speak with us is interrupted by a man who warns him: 'Be careful what you say. Words can get us in trouble.'"

It's rare that journalists will touch on the intimidation Palestinians face in trying to speak openly to western reporters. But if the tragic misuse of children is to be exposed fully, it will be necessary for other journalists to describe honestly such tactics.

ORT Canada campaign to renovate Netanya school

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

ORT Canada is set to launch a $10-million fundraising campaign to rebuild and revitalize a 54-year-old school in Netanya, Israel.

ORT Canada president Renette Berman says ORT Yad Lvovitch, one of the organization's earliest schools in the country, has been identified by ORT Israel as one of its three schools in desperate need of help.

The school currently houses about 1,600 students from grades 7 to 12, including 120 who live in dormitories, "which are utilitarian to the extreme," says Berman.

"These students, many of whom are culturally and economically impoverished, are learning in a more than 50-year-old building, which has asbestos in the roof. As well, many classes are directly above the cafeteria, so students breathe in the smell of cooking all day."

ORT is the world's largest private non-for-profit technological and professional training organization. Netanya, which is located seven kilometres from the West Bank and Gaza Strip, has been a target for many terrorist attacks, and Berman says ORT Yad Lvovitch has been directly affected.

"Two of its students were killed in the Tel Aviv Dolphinarium disco bombing, a recent graduate was shot dead in a drive-by shooting and a car bomb exploded outside the school."

The group is partnering with the city of Netanya, which is investing in a new gym that will also be used by the community, says Berman.

ORT offers students one of the best programs in science and technology, but it does not feel that this is enough, she says.

"Each student is involved in a community initiative, including the Sunflower Project, which has students volunteering with children in pediatric oncology wards, and peer tutoring.

Students at ORT Yad Lvovitch in Netanya will soon have a new building thanks to ORT Canada's $10-million fundraising campaign that was recently announced. The money will be used to rebuild and revitalize the 54-year-old school.

"Not only have students gained first place in electronics, mechatronics and advanced technology competitions, the school team has won the world championship in school football and has been runner-up in the world championships of school basketball," she says.

"With a lack of funds and a diversion of funds, education in Israel is in a crisis. This project is one of hope and renewal. People are immobilized by the current climate in the country, and this is a tangible effort to focus on education."

Because of the lack of equipment and the state of its buildings, the school is currently having trouble attracting middle class students, she says.

"To get an equally balanced student body we need to rebuild the school."

The organization plans on leading missions to Israel, which will focus on the school.

"Participants will interact with the students, and will see first-hand ORT's teaching methods.

"On the other hand, students are energized by these visits. There is a mutual admiration. ORT schools prepare for months for our visits, and when we arrive the excitement is palpable.

"I am working seven days a week to try and bring what ORT does in Israel and the world to Canada, and to bring what Canada does to Israel and the world," says Berman.

ORT has educated about one-fifth of the students in Israel, as well as students in 50 or 60 other countries where there are ORT schools, she says.

"People who support ORT need to know that their energy is being translated into tangible results."

More than a school, society itself attacked

Jews need no reminders of the relevance or theological imminence of history. After all, our holidays canonize historical events, enshrine them into collective, national memory and imbue their celebration with rich hermeneutic symbols and deeply religious ritual. We are a people of living memory that knows well, through the prism of heightened retrospective recall, how to filter and react to current events.

Thus, when one of the United Talmud Torahs (UTT) schools in Montreal is firebombed and its library of books and other precious materials destroyed on the eve of Passover, less than two weeks before Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah, we know what that means. We know the hatred that lies in the heart of the craven individual whose hands hurled the firebomb.

But does the rest of Canada? Do other Canadians understand the relevance for our own way of life close at home of the hatred that originates so far away and that sows terror in the free, unguarded fields of open, democratic societies such as ours?

As reported by various media, the note left behind by the bombers of UTT left no doubt that the attack was a hate crime warning to the Jews of Montreal.

"Our goal," the note is alleged to have said, "was only to sound the alarm without causing deaths… but this is just a beginning. If your crimes continue in the Middle East, our attacks will continue."

But, in their ignorant, blind hatred, the bombers failed to understand that a Jewish school in Montreal is a school attended by Canadians in Montreal. The bombers do not seem to grasp that they did not target "merely" Jews; they targeted Canadians. They did not attack a school; they attacked an entire society.

Like their elected counterparts who immediately responded to the anti-Semitic attacks in Toronto last month, Montreal-area officials also spoke very clearly and forcefully after the UTT attack making those very points to the craven attackers, to the Jewish community and to the community at large.

"We must all utterly condemn this cowardly and racist act, and draw together to fight such an abomination which, like a cancer, undermines the harmonious relations among diverse communities," Prime Minister Paul Martin said.

"Burning a school is in itself a vile act, because it touches the future of our society, but when it is done in the name of racism and intolerance, every Quebecer must stand up and denounce it to ensure this never happens again," said Quebec Premier Jean Charest.

Our society is too precious to surrender it to the vile individuals who have absolutely no regard for, nor understanding of, our way of life and freedoms. For terrorism is not only their tactic, it is their very credo.

History has taught Jews that not surrendering those values, means we will have to fight for them. Canadians and all freedom-loving peoples must learn this lesson too.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO…

Treaty with Egypt a mistake

Your comments about the 1977 Camp David peace treaty with Egypt are terribly irresponsible and astonishing in light of the current situation of Jews throughout the world ("A great moment," Editorial, CJN, March 25). The so-called Camp David "peace treaty" represented an increase in Israel's policy of appeasing its Arab neighbours. The Israeli government acted against the advice of its military and security experts, against Jewish law and against all common sense. The surrender to Egypt signalled to our enemies that all is negotiable in exchange for a promise and a piece of paper. Today's terrible situation is a consequence of the circumstances set into motion by that ill-conceived capitulation. Successive Israeli governments have acted with increasing irresponsibility against the interests and security of the Jewish people.

Mindless and absurd comments such as your statement "It was one of the great, shining moments in modern history" are no better than the comments of journalists biased against Israel. It is imperative that we openly criticize an Israeli government that has betrayed the interests of the Jewish people. Blind support such as yours only encourages more irrational governmental behaviour and suffering.

Boosting tourism to Israel

Each week, it seems more and more people in North America shrink from the idea of travelling to Israel.

My daughter Sabrina, who had already been lucky enough to go on a Birthright Israel trip, and I went there during her reading week break in mid-February.

We took city buses and wandered around Tel Aviv and Jerusalem as well as towns in the north. Every day was better than the last – except for Sunday morning, Feb. 22, the day we were to leave. A bomb exploded on a city bus, just a few minutes from our hotel near the Old City.

After our initial horror and anguish for the victims, we did what the Israelis must do on a daily basis. We adjusted.

We continued our visit, walked all around Jerusalem, visited the markets and finished our last day there. My cousin e-mailed my husband to let him know when we were safely on the plane home.

Israel was amazing, surprising and wonderful. Today, its future is more uncertain than ever.

And I can't wait to go back.

Agrees with Kirshner

I read with interest Sheldon Kirshner's review of Postville: A Clash of Cultures in Heartland America by Stephen Bloom ("Cultural dissonance roils small town Iowa," CJN, March 18). I certainly agree that Bloom's book is one-sided and uncharitable to the community, both Jewish and non-Jewish.

I discovered Postville last summer while driving through central Iowa. I found a small mid-America town with the usual rural population, as well as a community of Chassidim who had come there to re-open an abandoned slaughter house and meat-packing facility to produce kosher meat. With them, they brought Jewish schools, a mikvah, an excellent kosher restaurant, and prosperity. The Chassidim I met were proud of their community and invited me to stay over on Shabbat. They had an amiable relationship with the community.

Bloom writes about the strange ways and outlandish garb of the chassidic community. There are several communities of Amish people in the Postville area who also dress distinctively and speak in a Germanic dialect. Postvillians are well-acquainted with people who dress differently.

It is sad the author was so biased.

Family values may lead to peace

In standing in solidarity with Jews against anti-Semitism, Rev. Samuel Bianco and Rev. Damian MacPherson refer to Jews as their "elder brothers and sisters" (Letters to the editor, CJN, March 25).

Why don't we similarly appeal to Arabs to resolve Jews' and Arabs' differences using family values? In the Bible, it worked for Abraham and Lot, and for Jacob and Esau. Isaac and Ishmael buried their father together. Let us appeal to Arabs to bury our differences and live in peace.

"Recipes" for raising children

I am seeking stories from the Jewish community about how we are raising our kids to be Jewish in the 21st century for a book I'm planning to write called Recipes for Raising Jewish Children. I welcome stories with "recipes" or stories by themselves. The word "recipes" refers to food and is also a metaphor for the act of raising kids. In addition to parents, grandparents and educators are welcome to share their perspectives. Please include your contact information so that I can inform you of the receipt and status of your submission.

A milestone and memories at Holocaust museum

The following are reminiscences from the 10th anniversary of the opening of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., in November 1993.

By BERNICE EISENSTEIN

I meet a woman who is here at the gathering and she tells me her story of the family she lost, of her internment in Auschwitz. As I leave her, she kisses me, and she says, "Say hello to your mother from Auschwitz." Greetings extended through me from one woman to another who have never met and never will, but who are the same.

She is just one of the people I have been honoured to meet in Washington.

I see another woman and I go up to her. "Did you know my father? Did you know Ben Eisenstein?"

She opens her eyes in surprise and recognition. "Your father ran a canteen in Bergen-Belsen after the war. I knew your father well. My husband was his friend. I see his face now."

She lets me take her into my arms so that I can hold on to this moment, hold her memories of my father whom I have missed for more than a decade. I take her picture so that later, at home, and when I am ready, I can do a portrait of her, and then in my own way, I can recreate what I have learned.

I came to Washington for the weekend, Nov. 1 and 2, to join 7,000 others at the tribute organized by the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum to celebrate its 10th anniversary. The museum has called it a "reunion of a special family," and that is what I found – family.

I have always avoided crowds and adhere to the philosophy of Groucho Marx: never join anything that would have me for a member. But this was different. This will always be different.

My parents are survivors of the Holocaust, survivors of Auschwitz, and I grew up in Toronto only knowing "The Group," my parents' friends, who, like them, had survived the war, all marked with numbers on their left arms, "Greenies" in this New World, refugees who made Canada their home. Today they are old, and their presence has been reduced since many have died.

I went to Washington to meet people for the first time, knowing that I would never see them again. A child of survivors hears a Yiddish mantra all through the years of being raised – "Gedenk, Remember!" The word is spoken as an imperative. And its echo marks us with a responsibility that takes a lifetime to understand. Remember what?

We remember the stories our parents have chosen to tell us, or are able to tell us. More often we hear about life just after the war, about Bergen-Belsen, the displaced persons camp they lived in until they could leave Europe.

And sometimes, at a family gathering, at a dinner, on a Jewish holiday, there are stories about a parent's experience in the camps. We learn about typhus, lice, selections, beatings, hunger, who was helpful, who was not. We learn that there were Germans who helped Jews, hid them, brought them food; and we learn about the madness of liberation, the disbelief – there was nowhere to go, there was no home to return to.

Without our parents' knowledge, or even their understanding, these stories have given birth to the sensibility of how we, the children of survivors, perceive the world. There are nightmares, fear of enclosure, discomfort when hearing German or Polish spoken, even if the words spoken are of a gentle nature.

We have questions that go unasked or unanswered or partially responded to before the interruption of tears: What were your parents, our grandparents, like? What did you do to try to save your sisters, your brothers? How could you start another family, marry and have children, after losing the first seeds sown before the war? How can you still believe in the idea of goodness and kindness and freedom after you have been stripped, shaved and engraved? After you have been made into ashes.

This is our legacy, our inheritance. Each survivor is marked as a Lamed-vav (the Hebrew numerology for 36). According to ancient Jewish tradition, the world reposed upon 36 Unknown Just Men who bear the sorrows and sins of the world, the Lamed-vav, who are indistinguishable from other men and often do not even recognize themselves in the role that has been placed upon them.

"The Lamed-vav are the hearts of the world multiplied, into which the griefs of humanity are poured into one receptacle," André Schwarz-Bart write in his book, The Last of the Just.

There is a chassidic tale, Schwarz-Bart tells: "When an Unknown Just rises to Heaven, he is so frozen that God must warm him for 1,000 years between his fingers, before his soul can open itself to Paradise. And it is known that some remain forever inconsolable at human woe; so that even God himself cannot warm them. So from time to time the Creator sets the clock of the Last Judgment forward by one minute."

Perhaps the Last Judgment will never occur, since I now believe that the clock is constantly being adjusted, minute by minute, inconsolable soul to inconsolable soul.

The survivors I knew did not want their children to stand beside them in their remembrances of what had been done to them. As parents, they did not want their children to know the full price that had been exacted on their lives. Yet as children, as adults, we are told to remember. And so we become uninvited guests, gatecrashers passing underneath the sign: Arbeit Macht Frei. And we look to reunite with family members we have not met, and to take the hand of a parent and whisper in their ear, "We are here, we have always been here with you."

The Holocaust Museum welcomed nearly 7,000 people for its anniversary – 2,000 survivors, their children and grandchildren, their liberators and those who lost family members in the Holocaust. The walls of the museum encircle a profound experience, of emotion and education, and carefully and eloquently guide its visitors through the story of the Holocaust.

I hear this building speak to my parents, to all their friends, and to me and to my children and to the world, when I am in the Hall of Remembrance, the last room to enter after touring the museum: "Only guard yourself and guard your soul carefully, lest you forget the things your eyes saw, and lest these things depart your heart all the days of your life, and you shall make them known to your children, and to your children's children." These words inscribed on the wall are from Deuteronomy have presided over our centuries, unheeded, and we have been deaf to their instruction. I am made small within the grief that I feel.

I leave Washington the next day. As the bus enters the Lincoln Tunnel, just before arriving in New York City, I see a banner hanging over one of the arched entrances – "Never Forget." Surprised, I look again and see a date: 9/11. We have indeed forgotten if these two words become a repeated refrain that is constantly updated.

As children of survivors, we remember. And we will forever try to warm the souls of our parents so that one day there is no shame in our hearts for having looked away, for our inability to imagine something other than what has always been.

Bernice Eisenstein is a freelance editor and illustrator in Toronto.

Some 7,000 people attended the museum's 10th anniversary. The activities of the day were varied. Some lit memorial candles in the Hall of Remembrance; some danced in inter-generational celebration; and others, below, viewed the displays on contemporary genocide and crimes against humanity.

Opinions

The interview

I'm used to asking personal questions, not answering them. As a rabbi, I prepare for weddings or funerals with personal questions about the couple's aspirations or the deceased's character. So I probe personal lives, doing my job, searching for speechworthy material. But I must admit that it was unsettling when I finally found myself on the receiving end of personal questions.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

It was a school project: two high school students were interviewing me. They wanted to know about my heroes, my interests and what inspired me to become a rabbi. And I found it difficult to give answers. It's always awkward to open up about personal matters, even if they're trivial. But remarkably, I didn't have immediate answers. I had never thought much about these questions before.

We don't ask ourselves serious questions, and that's a shame. Good questions are the difference between mediocrity and excellence. Indeed, the right question can be revolutionary. Theodor Herzl asks: "Can we wait in pious resignation till the princes and peoples of this earth are more mercifully disposed towards us?" As a result of this question, we have a State of Israel. Martin Luther King asks: "Will we be extremists for the preservation of injustice or the extension of justice?" As a result, the civil rights movement grows, and racism slowly begins to crumble. Simple, sincere questions can start revolutions.

What makes questions so powerful is the way they strip away the veneer of falsehood. Incessant logic has a way of exposing the corrupt realities hidden beneath phony explanations. Good questions persist until they finally get a genuine answer.

Unfortunately, our predisposition is to ignore and accept. Anyone who has fallen victim to fraud (as I have) knows that you always look back and wonder: "Why didn't I ask any questions?" Just a little more scrutiny and you would have figured it out. But we're simply not in the habit of asking questions, even of relative strangers, and we blindly accept the status quo.

And the last person we'd ever ask questions of is ourselves. We have excuses (lies, actually) to explain why we are lazy and disengaged. Our true priorities get submerged under self-deceptions such as "I'll do it when I have a chance" and "It's not my responsibility." We unquestioningly smother our souls in phony excuses and, as a result, remain mediocre.

The Talmud says that after we die, we are interviewed by an angel who asks us whether we lived a life focused on family, ethics, spirituality and hope. The truth is, we need to ask these questions while we're still alive. And that's exactly the point of the Talmud: it's a terrible shame to wait until you're interviewed, whether by angels or teenagers, before thinking seriously about life.

Birthright links Jewish past to the future

During my six Birthright Israel trips since February 2000 on which I accompanied nearly 1,000 Montrealers to Israel, I have repeatedly witnessed the Birthright volcano.

Take a random group of 40 Jews, aged 18 to 26. Throw them on a bus for 10 days. Unleash them in Israel, and boom! Participants transform from a bunch of North American slackers into a wonderfully raucous group of Jewish singers and dancers, ayi-yi-yi-ing their way through the Holy Land. The energy unleashed so easily, and the frequency of this apparent miracle, indicate a yearning for authentic, inspiring Jewish experiences – and Birthright Israel's consistent ability to answer that need.

Gil Troy in Montreal

To date, 58,229 young Jews, including 29,668 Americans and 8,154 Canadians, have received what the visionary philanthropists Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt conceived of as a gift from one generation to another. Canada's happily disproportionate representation has galvanized the community during these trying times.

Again and again, I have seen the Birthright bounce: Birthright alumni embracing Judaism individually, championing Israel on campus and even revitalizing institutions as Jewish communal professionals, having redirected their careers thanks to the program.

In Montreal, a Birthright alumna started a student "ghetto shul" at McGill University, and many Birthright returnees are among the 100-plus students – religious and non-religious – who celebrate Shabbat together there weekly.

Social science research confirms these anecdotal impressions. Social psychologists at Brandeis University discovered that by every measure, from enhanced Israel identification to greater commitment to marrying Jews, Birthrighters return home inspired, engaged and often ready to change themselves and the community. The percentage of participants who feel connected to the Jewish people jumped from 38 per cent before the trip to 63 per cent one year later, compared to only 45 per cent of non-participants. Similarly, those feeling connected to Israel jumped from 22 per cent to 48 per cent, even one year later.

During the college and post-college years, Jews are most likely to distance themselves from the community, precisely when they are making life-shaping decisions, choosing a spouse, a career, even a cause. Rather than trying to guilt these young seekers into staying within the fold, Birthright offers a positive Jewish experience at this critical moment, speaking to young Jews in their language.

Birthright also recognizes that you cannot excite people for 10 days and then abandon them to the same community that failed to inspire them before. The program is now concentrating on follow-up, encouraging the broader community to welcome this important age group and smoothing the transition from Birthright pilgrim to happy, proud, creative, committed Jew.

This fall, I spoke at the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities meeting in Jerusalem. I was asked for practical suggestions to enhance Jewish campus life.

"I have a brilliant idea," I responded. "Why don't we send students aged 18 to 26 who have never been on an organized Israel tour to Israel for free? Why don't we call it Birthright, and rather than having a three-way partnership between major philanthropists, the federations and the Israeli government, why don't we fight each other for the honour of funding it exclusively?"

People chuckled, but I was serious. It shocks me that having triumphed brilliantly in its initial five years, Birthright Israel had so much difficulty securing its second round of funding for another five years. I am dismayed that Canadian Jews have not paid their fair share. In truth, the Canadian federations have been exceptionally supportive, but despite so many Canadian participants, no Canadian mega-donor has joined Bronfman and the heavily American cast of financial angels he and Steinhardt assembled.

Moreover, as word of Birthright's financial plight spread last fall, I could not understand why satisfied returnees, pleased parents and appreciative members of the Jewish community did not bombard Birthright with their own donations.

The not-so-wise men of Chelm once noticed that many people were falling off a rickety bridge. The resident "geniuses" responded by building a hospital in the ravine. For too long, the Jewish community was equally "wise," responding to the so-called continuity crisis with short-term, emergency band-aid solutions. By contrast, Birthright uses the Israel experience to build a vibrant bridge linking Jewish students with our history as a way of developing their future. We should all rush to help finance that bridge, keeping it open, welcoming and strong.

A Shoah remembrance

This is the story of two women named Alice who met in a villa on the shores of Lake Geneva in 1939 under the shadow of Nazism. One was a Quaker and a world-renowned suffragist, the other a Jewish refugee fleeing Germany. The meeting would have profound consequences for both of their lives.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Alice Paul was a political activist who championed the rights of women globally. This singular mission brought her to Geneva in 1938 to chair the newly constituted World Woman's Party (WWP), an organization formed to combat injustice against women.

Alice Muller lived with her husband and two small children in the German city of Karlsruhe. Her husband taught classical languages and English in the local gymnasium, or high school. Under the Nazi racial laws, Mr. Muller was dismissed from his position in 1936.

The year that Alice Paul launched the WWP in Geneva was also the year of Kristallnacht, the Night of Shattered Glass, in Germany. On Nov. 9-10, 1938, the Nazis destroyed synagogues, Jewish homes and Jewish-owned stores and businesses, under the approving eyes of police and militia. Along with many other Jewish men, Mr. Muller was arrested by the Gestapo and deported to Buchenwald. He was released three weeks later, on the condition that he leave Germany by the close of the year.

On Dec. 31, 1938, the family fled to a small mountain village in Switzerland. Fearing deportation back to Germany, they came to Geneva in 1939, hoping to interest the League of Nations in their case.

And so it was that the two Alices crossed paths – one whose life was dedicated to winning for women the rights denied them simply because they were women, the other who had been denied rights simply because she was Jewish. Moved by the plight of the young Jewish woman, Alice Paul offered lodging to the Muller family at her home in the Villa Bartholoni, the WWP headquarters.

Always interested in women's rights, Alice Muller worked for the WWP while in Geneva. Under Alice Paul's direction, the villa became a temporary haven for other Jewish refugees from Nazism, whom she helped obtain passage to North America. Alice Muller credited Alice Paul's intervention with rescuing the family from the genocidal net, and helping the Mullers retain their sense of dignity.

Decades later, the Mullers would have the opportunity to redeem the life and dignity of Alice Paul. In the early 1970s, Alice Muller's son noticed a small newspaper article about an aging suffragist living in obscurity in a nursing home. Alice Paul, then in her 90s and destitute, felt she had become useless.

The Mullers arranged for Alice Paul to move back to the city of her birth, Moorestown, N.J. There, in the assisted living centre where she lived until her death in 1977, the aging activist once again received visitors – the Mullers and others – who remembered her and valued her life's work.

Alice Muller died last month, leaving behind grandchildren who would not have come into this world if the Nazi genocide had succeeded in murdering her and her family.

Several years before her death, Alice Muller spoke proudly of another set of grandchildren – her Vietnamese grandchildren – a family of Vietnamese refugees whose welfare and well-being she made her personal responsibility. She described this as a way of repaying Alice Paul.

Like all Holocaust survivors, Alice Muller is the exception rather than the norm. Most of the Jews of Europe perished under Nazi atrocity. We can never think about the Shoah without feeling a sense of overwhelming loss and meaninglessness.

The story of Alice Muller and Alice Paul reminds us of the possibility of good, even under the shadow of genocide. A chain of good acts set into motion in Geneva in 1939 takes on its own dynamics. In the Jewish tradition, we say mitzvah goreret mitzvah – a mitzvah, a good act, leads to another mitzvah. Alice Paul to Alice Muller. The Muller family to Alice Paul. Alice Muller to the Vietnamese family, and so on.

The Kirshner File

Warsaw's wartime secret city harboured Jews

It was like no other city in the annals of recorded history, a unique and extraordinary phenomenon.

In 1940, as part of their master plan to exterminate Poland's venerable, three million-strong Jewish community, the Nazis crammed more than 400,000 Jews into the Warsaw Ghetto, the largest one in German-occupied Europe.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But approximately 28,000 Jewish residents of Warsaw found refuge on the Aryan side of the city.

These individuals, who went into hiding, were generally known as "cats." They formed what Gunnar Paulsson describes in his groundbreaking scholarly book, Secret City (Yale University Press), as the biggest "clandestine community of Jews anywhere in Europe."

This intriguing topic – the theme of Roman Polanski's masterful film, The Pianist – has not been comprehensively addressed. Historians have disposed of it in a few monographs and chapters in books. Even Israel Gutman, the author of The Jews of Warsaw, a classic work of scholarship, glossed over the fate of these escapees. But now, with the publication of Secret City, their story is finally told at length.

Paulsson, the son of a Holocaust survivor, has delved deeply into the subject, having scoured memoirs, diaries and the archives of Jewish and Polish organizations that assisted the fugitives.

One of his findings may jolt readers. Despite the deep-seated anti-Semitism that pervaded pre-war Polish society, a surprising number of Poles helped Jews, often at risk to themselves. On balance, however, the majority of Poles remained neutral as the greatest tragedy to befall the Jewish people unfolded.

It is hardly astonishing that most Poles stayed on the sidelines. Prior to Germany's invasion of Poland, Poles and Jews rarely mixed socially and constituted two separate solitudes. Anti-Semitism was widespread, the product of ingrained prejudices and superstitions.

The Catholic church and nationalist politicians and intellectuals reinforced commonly held attitudes about Jews as aliens. Even progressive Poles perceived Jews as outsiders. Pogroms, the violent expression of Judeophobia, widened the chasm.

The widespread perception that Jews were strangers had something to do with the fact that the Jewish community in Poland was probably the least assimilated in Europe.

Most Jews regarded themselves as members of a national rather than a religious minority and considered Yiddish their mother tongue. With the advent of Polish independence in 1918, an increasing number of Jews became Polonized. By 1939, the year of Germany's invasion, Warsaw was home to some 50,000 fully acculturated Polish speaking Jews. Of these, Paulsson estimates, 25,000 were fully assimilated.

These factors were of no small importance once the Germans closed the ghetto in 1940.

Despite the religious, cultural and linguistic barriers that separated Poles and Jews, the two communities maintained lines of communication, some of which were quite intimate. Without these links, the so-called secret city could not have existed.

The secret city crystallized around three distinct groups. The first consisted of Jewish assimilants and converts who had lived outside the ghetto area before the war and had personal and professional ties with Poles. The second was composed of Poles and Jews who forged contacts during the ghetto period, mainly through illegal trade. The third was made up of Jewish and Polish activists in fraternal political parties and social organizations.

At first, the only Jews who could be found on the Aryan side were the most integrated and assimilated. Many of them helped less fortunate Jews stuck in the ghetto. Jews began escaping from the ghetto toward the close of 1942, following the great deportation of that awful summer.

With few exceptions, the escapees possessed "good looks" – stereotypical Polish as opposed to Jewish physical features – and had Polish friends and/or acquaintances who were prepared to help them. Paulsson claims that 70,000 to 90,000 Christians, or about one-twelfth of Warsaw's population, came to the aid of Jews. By doing so, they risked their lives, knowing that the penalty for helping Jews was capital punishment.

Jews lucky enough to leave the ghetto had to run a gauntlet of roving German patrols, informers, blackmailers (szmalcowniks) and rapacious landlords.

From 1939 onward, Jews were easily able to obtain false identity papers because the Germans had not yet issued their own documents. But after 1941, the Nazis cut off this avenue of escape by introducing new forms of identification.

Frequently, Jews were tricked into paying exorbitant sums for crude forgeries. Zegota, the Council to Aid Jews, solved this problem by providing foolproof IDs to Jews.

Circumcised men could obtain medical certificates stating they had undergone a special procedure to correct phimosis, an abnormal development of the foreskin. Still others could submit to plastic surgery, or pass as Tartar Muslims or Karaites. The vast majority of Jewish men did none of the above, gambling they would not be closely examined.

Women, who were much more difficult to unmask as Jews, had to be prepared to answer detailed questions about the Catholic religion.

The absence of money was a major problem for Jews on the run. But they could overcome it by tapping into stipends supplied by Zegota and Jewish organizations such as the Bund. In many cases, though, Jews were left with no alternative but to sell their possessions or live on the charity of Polish hosts.

Pre-war anti-Semitism dissuaded countless Jews from leaving the ghetto. Still other Jews, living on the Aryan side, were tricked into applying for German "amnesties" that were nothing more than schemes to ensnare them.

Street scene in the Warsaw ghetto

In the classically cruel 1943 Hotel Polski scam, for example, 3,500 Jews were promised freedom, only to be summarily arrested and shipped to Auschwitz.

Incredibly enough, a handful of Jews survived as labourers in Germany. "Germans were generally not sensitive to the many nuances of language and behaviour that distinguished Polish Jews from non-Jews, so that it was easier to pass as a Pole in Germany than in Poland," Paulsson writes.

Apart from the usual informers and blackmailers, the Blue Police – formed by the Germans in 1939 – were the most dangerous Polish adversary Jews faced in the secret city.

Universally regarded as a collaborationist force, the Blue Police performed ordinary policing duties, aside from guarding ghetto gates and flushing out Jews in hiding. In some instances, the Blue Police arranged the escape of Jews from the ghetto.

Although Catholic priests played a baneful role in perpetuating pre-war anti-Semitism, the church partially redeemed itself by placing hundreds of Jewish children in convents, possibly out of guilt or a desire to convert them.

According to Paulsson, the 1944 Warsaw uprising brought the secret city to an end. The army of szmalcowniks and the Blue Police suddenly disappeared and the Nazi apparatus of repression faded away.

But the uprising, crushed by the Germans, presented Jews with fresh challenges. All too often, for instance, Poles accused Jews of being German spies. Tragically, scores of Jews were murdered by Poles who assumed they were German agents.

Jews who volunteered for the AK – the underground Polish Home Army that spearheaded the rebellion– were usually rebuffed. Jews who passed as Catholics did not have such problems, stoking suspicions that the AK did not welcome Jewish volunteers.

Nonetheless, hundreds of Jewish fighters participated in the revolt, which claimed the lives of 4,500 Jews.

When the uprising broke out, 17,000 of the 28,000 Jews who had found a haven in the secret city were still alive. By the time the Red Army marched into Warsaw, 11,500 Jewish survivors were left in the capital.

Paulson believes that even fewer Jewish survivors would have made it through the war had it not been for the pre-existing network of connections linking Jews and Christians.

Jews also benefited from the unspoken rule of minding one's own business in German-occupied Poland. As a result, Poles, even openly anti-Semitic ones, thought twice before denouncing Jews.

Jewish fighters who escaped from the smoking wreckage of the 1943 Warsaw Ghetto uprising obviously benefited from this widespread attitude.

In general, the vast majority of Poles, including rabid anti-Semites who sought to disenfranchise Jews and strip them of their Polish citizenship, deplored the systematic extermination of Jews.

But this is really a moot point, given the fact that 98 per cent of Warsaw's Jews perished during the Holocaust.

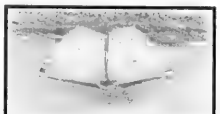
Truth: our greatest weapon against deniers

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

About a year and a half ago, Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel claimed refugee status in Canada when he was deported from the United States. He had lived in Canada earlier, but was refused re-entry and was held on American soil before being allowed to cross the border to Canada where he was detained.



Zundel was accused of desecrating the memory of the dead, inciting hatred against Jews and possessing illegal Nazi paraphernalia.

Canada has hate-crime laws and Zundel mocks these laws. I have long given thought to Canadian hate laws, which are not, in fact, unique to Canada. They began in France and quickly spread to Germany, Switzerland, Israel, Italy, New Zealand, Sweden, Australia, Britain and Canada.

They have been used to confront behaviours that governments do not like, but today they are closely linked with Holocaust denial. Groups of pseudo-historians – Fred Leuchter, David Irving, Mark Weber and Zundel – deny the Holocaust through websites, books, public lectures, newspaper ads, university programs, pamphlets and op-ed pieces.

They deny that six million Jews were murdered. They deny that the Germans ever constructed gas chambers for murder, and they deny that the Germans ever constructed crematoria for the genocide of millions. These claims are the foundations of Holocaust denial.

So what would you do if someone asked you to prove the Holocaust happened?

Let's say you provide survivors' reports that they had heard of the gassings at Auschwitz. The denier would say the survivors exaggerate their memories. Another survivor tells another story, different in its details but with basic similarities, saying Jews were gassed. The denier would respond that rumours floated through the camps and many survivors incorporated them into their memories.

An SS guard confessed that he actually saw people gassed and cremated. The denier claims the Allies forced the Nazis to confess.

And what of the camp commander's autobiography, written after his trial, conviction and sentencing to death when he had nothing to gain by lying? Only Holocaust deniers pretend to know why anyone would confess to crimes he never committed.

But there is more.

We have blueprints of gas chambers and crematoria. Deniers say the chambers were used for delousing and the crematoria for the disposal of those who died from shortages resulting from the Allied bombings.

They tell us that no written order has ever been found linking the order to kill Jews to Adolf Hitler himself. But no written order has ever been found linking Hitler to the start of World War II, either.

There is, in fact, a great amount of evidence that tells us what happened.

Indeed, as a society, we are attracted by "science" and "fact," but these "historians" use such words to debase fundamental truths. There are times when truth can be denied by many people and yet that truth endures. The greatness of truth is that it cannot be diminished. It may be ignored, denied or even warped, but as we understand on Yom Hashoah, the real power of truth is that it comes from within, even when it is challenged from without.

With such strength, we do not need the world to substantiate these truths, because our faith teaches that truth will not be extinguished – lies will fail and truth will stand. The tenacity of the Jew is proof enough of this "truth."

Will hate laws stop people from believing these lies? Do we think throwing people into jail for Holocaust denial will convince people they are wrong?

I believe it makes them martyrs and disables our greatest tool against them – not jails or laws, but facts, truth, proof and science, which all converge to prove the Shoah. For then we can say, "It is true because any thinking person can see it for themselves."

Let them say what they wish, let them argue and debate, and in the end, we will do for the six million what these criminals would never have wanted: we will ensconce their memories and lives in the annals of truth and use their memories to accomplish what they would have wanted – to use thought and education to make us better people, to make better thinkers and to make a better world.

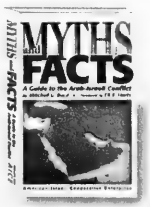
Rabbi Flanzraich is spiritual leader of Beth Sholom Congregation in Toronto.

MYTH:

Israel's policy of assassinating Palestinian terrorists is immoral and counterproductive.

FACT:

Israel is faced with a nearly impossible situation in attempting to protect its population from Palestinians who are prepared to blow themselves up.



One strategy for dealing with the problem has been the peace process. Beginning in 1993, Israel believed that negotiating was the way to reach peace with the Palestinians, but after Israel gave back much of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and offered virtually all of the remainder, the Palestinians rejected these concessions and chose to use violence to try to force Israel to capitulate to all their demands.

A second strategy is for Israel to "exercise restraint," that is, not respond to Palestinian violence. The international community lauds Israel when it turns the other cheek after heinous attacks, but this restraint does nothing to assuage the pain of the victims or to prevent further attacks.

Moreover, many of the same nations that urge Israel to restraint have reacted forcefully when put in similar situations. For example, the British assassinated Nazis after World War II and targeted IRA terrorists in Northern Ireland. And, in the wake of the murderous attack on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, it was revealed that U.S. president Bill Clinton's administration had attempted to assassinate Saudi terrorist Osama bin Laden in 1998 in retaliation for his role in the bombings of the U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya.

The administration of President George W. Bush has said it also would not hesitate to kill bin Laden and has targeted a number of other Al Qaeda operatives.

In April 1986, after determining that Libya had directed the terrorist bombing of a West Berlin discotheque that killed one American and injured 200 others, the United States launched a raid on a series of Libyan targets, including President Muammar Gadhafi's home. This was widely viewed as an assassination attempt. Then-president Ronald Reagan justified the action as self-defence against Libya's state-sponsored terrorism.

More recently, George W. Bush ordered attacks on the Iraqi political leadership during the 2003 war in Iraq.

Israel has chosen a third option – eliminating the masterminds of terror attacks. It is a policy that has caused great debate in Israel, but is supported by a vast majority of the public. The policy is also supported by the American public according to an August 2001 poll by the America Middle East Information Network.

The Israeli government also went through a legal process before adopting the policy of targeted killings. Israel's attorney general reviewed the policy and determined that it is legal under Israeli and international law.

Targeting the terrorists has a number of benefits. First, it places a price on terror: Israelis can't be attacked with impunity anymore, for terrorists know that if they target others, they will become targets themselves. Second, it is a method of self-defence: pre-emptive strikes eliminate the people who would otherwise murder Jews. While others may take their place, they do so knowing they too will become targets. Third, it throws the terrorists off balance. Extremists must stay on the move, look over their shoulders and work harder to carry out their goals.

Of course, the policy also has costs. Besides international condemnation, Israel risks exposing informers who provide the information needed to find the terrorists. And soldiers must sometimes engage in high-risk operations that occasionally cause tragic collateral damage to property and persons.

The most common criticism of targeted killings is that they do no good because they perpetuate a cycle of violence whereby the terrorists seek revenge. This is probably the least compelling argument against the policy, because the people who blow themselves up to become martyrs can always find a justification for their actions.

Jewish Life

A lesson from our past

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Yom Hashoah is the day set to remember the events and victims of the Holocaust. There are Jewish survivors in the world who tell us first-hand of what they saw and lived through. And yet we know the maddening frustration of hearing Holocaust deniers who purport to know the truth.

Justifiably, we confront the lies of these deniers, and there is a concerted effort to be vigilant in our responses.

However, there is another opinion and we must be equally vigilant in responding to this view as well. There is a growing voice claiming that even if the Holocaust did occur, why can't the Jewish people just "get over it already? They're not the only ones who have suffered." In other words, enough is enough, we've heard it. Let sleeping dogs lie.

If we "got over" slavery in Egypt, should we not "get over" the Holocaust? Although there are similarities between the two Jewish experiences, the differences define how they enter Jewish consciousness. Until modern times, the slavery experience of Egypt was never questioned. By the time anyone raised historical questions, the experience itself had already transformed and informed our Jewish souls. The questions of history paled in comparison with the real impression Egypt had made.

We had time to integrate the full experience of Egypt without defending its reality. We suffered in Egypt and then were paid for our labours before we left. At the Red Sea, Divine justice punished those who tortured us. We do not rejoice at their downfall, but the biblical message of accountability is part of the event. We are told by other nations that they had heard of the events in Egypt. We were spared the pain of continuously insisting that it happened.

As a result, we integrated Egypt into our souls. The Torah commands us to always be kind to the stranger because we were strangers in Egypt. We took the experience of Egypt and transformed it into a celebration of freedom and a lesson of empathy toward all those who suffer.

We didn't "get over" Egypt, we worked through it. It is a part of us we transmit to our children, not to teach them how to be victims, but to teach them how to be liberators.

We cannot bring the Holocaust into our lives in the same way. It does not yet inform our consciousness or mould itself into our souls. The crematoria of the camps burned the experience into us and it still burns today. It cannot transform and inform us because we are still convincing people it really happened.

Is there no comfort to be had? The midrash tells a story of Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakkai, who lost his son. His disciples and colleagues took turns trying to comfort him. They cited people in the past who had lost children and had managed to get past the loss. In each instance, Rabbi ben Zakkai responded by saying that these attempts werre giving him no comfort.

Finally R. Eleazar comes to comfort him and is successful. R. Eleazar speaks of Rabbi ben Zakkai's son. He talks of the greatness of the son and the comfort to be found in knowing that as a father, the rabbi had parented well and succeeded in raising an exemplary individual.

We must openly speak of the individuals we lost in the Holocaust – not the numbers, but the people. We must acknowledge the parents who held their children, trying to protect them to the end. These exemplary parents. These outstanding individuals.

There is no comfort in hearing that others have suffered. This is not a contest. We must answer those who say, "Get over it." Get over the Holocaust? God forbid.

Contemporary anti-Semitism

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This Sunday evening marks the beginning of Yom Hashoah during which we remember the people who perished in the Holocaust and vow that it can "never again" happen. Unfortunately anti-Semitism is is as current as this morning's newspaper. Today, where to find information about contemporary anti-Semitism, the organizations that are combating it and a look at the debate over the "new" anti-Semitism.

"Today's Europe is not the Europe of the 1930s and 1940s, and it would be false to claim it was… We have no right to insult the memory of the Shoah's millions of victims by putting their sufferings on a par with today's manifestations, as serious as they undoubtedly are" [http://tinyurl.com/yqs34]. With those words, European Commission president Romano Prodi addressed a recent conference on anti-Semitism in Brussels, where he explained what the EC has done to combat anti-Semitism and what remains to be done [www.eurunion.org/news/press/2004/20040025.htm].

In 1997, the EC created the European Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia [http://eumc.eu.int]. But the centre hasn't been without controversy. In 2002, it commissioned two researchers from the Berlin Research Centre on anti-Semitism to write a report on the state of anti-Semitism in the European Union. Their report maintained that anti-Semitic acts are carried out "either by right-wing extremists or radical Islamists or young Muslims, mostly of Arab descent, who are often themselves potential victims of exclusion and racism; but also that anti-Semitic statements came from pro-Palestinian groups… as well as from politicians… and citizens from the political mainstream." When the draft study was released last year, the Berlin centre judged it "neither reliable nor objective" and not fit for publication. Another study has been commissioned, but meanwhile, you can read the original 100-page report as well as the centre's critique [http://eumc.eu.int/eumc/FT.htm]. Also on that site is The Fight Against Anti-Semitism and Islamophobia: Bringing Communities Together [http://tinyurl.com/37csc].

There are many other institutions around the world charged with monitoring and combating anti-Semitism. They include Tel Aviv University's Stephen Roth Institute for the Study of Contemporary Anti-Semitism and Racism [www.tau.ac.il/Anti-Semitism/], The Vidal Sassoon International Center for the Study of Antisemitism at Jerusalem's Hebrew University [http://sicsa.huji.ac.il/], the Anti-Defamation League [www.adl.org/] and the Simon Wiesenthal Center [www.wiesenthal.com/]. In Canada, B'nai Brith publishes its annual Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents [http://jewishcanada.ca/] and you can review statements about anti-Semitism released by the Canadian Jewish Congress [http://tinyurl.com/ytxze].

Elsewhere, the English-language Ha'aretz website has compiled a large archive of newspaper stories focusing on anti-Semitism [http://tinyurl.com/xtvz]. The Southern Poverty Law Center "Hatewatch" website monitors all types of hate-related crimes [www.hatewatch.org/]. And a "blogger" named "Izak" maintains a blog (or weblog) where he trolls the Internet for news and articles on anti-Semitism and copies them to his site [http://antisemitisms.blogspot.com/].

Last November, Mortimer Zuckerman, editor-in-chief of U.S. News & World Report wrote the magazine's cover story, "Graffiti on History's Walls." In it Zuckerman describes a new anti-Semitism that "transcends boundaries, nationalities, politics, and social systems." The target, according to Zuckerman, is Israel. "Just as historic anti-Semitism has denied individual Jews the right to live as equal members of society, anti-Zionism would deny the collective expression of the Jewish people, the State of Israel, the right to live as an equal member of the family of nations" [http://tinyurl.com/2ya3e].

In "The Return of Anti-Semitism," which appeared in December's New York Magazine, Craig Horowitz asks, "Why has hating the Jews become politically correct in many places?" [http://tinyurl.com/2aqqu/]

New Star publisher proud of his Jewish identity

There he organized and co-chaired a national conference on Canadian media, an event that altered his career yet again.

John Honderich, who attended the conference and whom Goldbloom will succeed at the Star, raised the possibility of employment.

"That's where the conversation began," Goldbloom recalled. "There was no guarantee I'd become publisher. But it was made clear to me that Honderich saw me as a potential successor."

There had been rumours that Honderich, a member of the five-family trust that controls Torstar's voting shares, was forced out by the company's chief executive officer Robert Prichard.

But Goldbloom, who was formally hired by Prichard on behalf of the board of directors, said he prefers to believe he was "everyone's candidate."

He said he has three broad goals: to maintain the Star's pre-eminence in circulation (452,521 Monday to Friday, 661,785 on Saturday and 432,147 on Sunday), to upgrade editorial quality and to increase financial performance.

"I believe this needs to be a period of change and continuity. We're working on interesting initiatives on the editorial and advertising fronts. We need to aspire to a situation where every person of influence in Toronto is a reader of the Star. I want the Star to be a must-read, to be more than it is today."

Alluding to the newspaper war, whose first shots were fired by the newly established National Post in 1998, Goldbloom said Toronto holds the distinction of being North America's most competitive newspaper market.

And as he gazed upon the figurative battlefield, he said, "There will be casualties. The current market is not sustainable. There are players that are operating at a loss, and that has to be a transitory situation."

Mindful of battles lost and won, Goldbloom intends to adopt a hands-on approach as publisher, his modus operandi at The Gazette.

"I will become much more knowledgeable of the newsroom over the next few months," said Goldbloom, who will wield complete editorial authority.

Although there have been reports he has been hired to cut costs, he said he does not intend to introduce "dramatic changes," but does intend to hire an editor. At present, the top-ranking editorial spot at the Star is filled by a managing editor.

Until May, Goldbloom will carry on as deputy publisher. "My involvement has been primarily with developing a strategic plan for the newspaper and restructuring and rejuvenating the human resources department," he said.

Recognizing that the Star's Mideast coverage has alienated and embittered some Jewish readers, Goldbloom said he expects news reporting at the Star to be "balanced, fair and complete."

In judging the Star, he said, readers should measure its coverage over time rather than reacting to a particular story.

Third-party opinion, written by columnists, will offer a cross-section of diverse views. "Editorials will be a reflection of my perspective and the wisdom of the editorial board."

Offering a preview of his outlook on the Arab-Israeli conflict, he said, "I believe in the legitimacy and necessity of Israel. I believe profoundly in its right to exist behind secure borders and at peace with its neighbours."

He is an advocate of a two-state solution. But he declined to comment about what the borders of a future Palestinian state should be. "I'm not an expert on the Middle East and I don't want to get beyond these fundamental principles. I won't get into a discussion of boundaries or the wall."

Neither would he be drawn into discussing whether the Star's coverage of Arab-Israeli issues in the Goldbloom era will satisfy its legion of critics.

Goldbloom, whose wife Fiona is in the documentary film business, has no formal connections with Toronto's Jewish community.

"As publisher of the Star, it's best not to be involved in the different institutions of the Jewish community," he said, adding it could be seen as a conflict of interest.

"The Star wants support from every sector of the Toronto community. I can't expect everyone, at all times, will agree with our position or coverage. But I'm confident people will view the Star with respect for its attempts to achieve high standards of journalism."

Asked if he considers his appointment to be historic, he said, "When a member of a minority group is given an opportunity for leadership, it helps in the constant pursuit of creating a just society in Canada, to use Mr. [Pierre] Trudeau's words.

"I'm very comfortable with and proud of my Jewish identity. But that's not why I was chosen to be publisher of the Star."

A positive outlook kept him alive, survivor says

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

At his 80th birthday party for the residents at 2 Neptune Dr. where Rubin Bortenstein and his wife Louise have lived for two years, the Auschwitz survivor, who could have recalled many horrific memories, spoke with optimism and hope.

This kind of outlook, he says, "saved my life… I believe that a person is a person, but what's important is what that person intends to do with his or her life."

In an interview in the Bortensteins' condominium where he has an oxygen tank because of his emphysema, the high-energy octogenarian with number 79635 tattooed on his arm spoke of his early years in Warsaw, his fight for survival during the Holocaust, the tragic loss of his family, his immigration to Montreal and his move to Toronto two years ago.

Born into a wealthy family, Bortenstein, who had a younger brother and sister, was raised and educated in Warsaw where he graduated in 1939 from a gymnasium (a combination of high school and college).

"But then, all my dreams in education were shattered," he said. He was taken away from the Warsaw Ghetto by the Gestapo in 1941 to Novydwor. Ten months later, he was shipped to Auschwitz where he remained until Jan. 14, 1945, when the camp was evacuated.

"I joined the surviving inmates on a death march towards western Europe. We were liberated by the 10th Armor Division of the U.S. Army near a small town called Shongau. Of the 500 who were shipped with me to Auschwitz to do labour work, there were only 67 survivors."

When he was imprisoned, he weighed 165 pounds and was in excellent physical and mental health. When he left Auschwitz, he weighed 70 pounds. Pointing to his oxygen line, he said, "This may be the result."

After liberation, he discovered that he was without a family and had no place to live.

When Bortenstein learned that his family had perished, he decided to immigrate to the United States but discovered that he had two uncles living in Montreal. Three days after arriving in Montreal, he found a job as a server and counter person at Harry's Diner on St. Lawrence Boulevard with a salary of $20 a week. After a year and a half, he opened his first restaurant, the University Coffee Shop.

He had met Louise in Germany, and in 1949, he brought her to Montreal where they were married. Over the years, he opened several other restaurants.

"To survive in the restaurant business," Bortenstein said, "one must have an instinctive love for people."

This instinct led Bortenstein to volunteer with Sun Youth, a Montreal-based organization that develops programs in working class neighbourhoods to keep kids busy and off the streets.

He was the first president of Sun Youth, a position he held for many years, and he often provided sandwiches and ice cream for special events and children in the neighbourhood.

Bortenstein also became involved with the Montreal Holocaust Committee, and in a speech at a Yom Hashoah Commemoration, he said, "I am not going to judge any one person, country or people, but the free world stood by and did nothing. Now, it is our obligation to pass on the history of the Holocaust and to make sure that what happened at the Holocaust never happens again."

Seen at his 80th birthday party, Rubin Bortenstein is surrounded by family and friends.

He was active in the Davis Lodge of B'nai Brith and has worked for the State of Israel.

"I decided I wanted to put up a monument in memory of my parents, sister and brother," he said. "I thought of Poland, Germany and Canada and then decided to put up a stone in Israel at the Survivors Forest of the Jewish National Fund."

Looking back, Bortenstein said that when they got into Auschwitz, "most people immediately became zombies and suicidal. I hoped that I would come out alive – so that's what kept me going."

He emphasized that his attitude was and is to "take it in my stride. And I still don't think about death, I think about life."

The Bortensteins have three sons, two living in the United States and one in Toronto and they have six grandchildren.

Teen gives bar mitzvah gelt to Shaare Zedek

By SHAWN SHAPIRO
Special to The CJN

Adam Bogoroch is like many other young teenagers who enjoy skiing, computers, sports and friends, but since he was seven years old, the Toronto teen has been aware of the importance of helping others.

Adam, who turned 13 on Jan. 23 and had his bar mitzvah in February, says the event "was fantastic. It was something very memorable for the rest of my life."

Adam Bogoroch

He has tried to give of himself wherever he can for several years. The year he turned seven, Chanukah was late and Adam's birthday came shortly after the holiday. After discussing it with his family, he decided to donate all the toys he received for both occasions to the patients at the Hospital for Sick Children.

He says he has learned from his parents Richard and Melanie, who also support charities, what it means to help others.

When they receive money, some bar mitzvah boys keep it and some save it for school, but many donate at least a portion to a charity. Adam knew he was going donate any money he received to a charity, but had to find the charity he most wanted to support. He says he wanted his donation to matter, and ultimately chose Shaare Zedek Hospital in Israel.

Melanie Bogoroch, Adam's mother, said that when he was looking at options, Adam first learned about this particular hospital. "Shaare Zedek Hospital deals with victims of attacks and is in need of lifesaving equipment" she said.

Adam's gift will make it possible for the hospital's newly created emergency unit to buy a resuscitation cart and two wheelchairs.

Suzanne Kaye, national executive director for Shaare Zedek's Toronto office, was their contact, Bogoroch said. "I had contacted her and she came over to bring [Adam] information on the hospital. They put his name on the equipment and Adam gave her the money."

Adam and his family are travelling to Israel this August, and thanks to arrangements made by Kaye, they will get to see his donation at work. They are also going to put up a plaque for him in the hospital saying what he donated.

"He feels so fulfilled and proud of himself as a person" Bogoroch said. "If other children gave, they would know the feeling as well."

"I want kids to know, if they were to donate… they would feel good about themselves," Adam said. "It replaces stress with a good feeling."

Legal scholar looks critically at corporations

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The world's dominant economic institution today is the corporation. But a century ago, corporations had little of the immense power and influence they currently wield.

Joel Bakan, a 44-year-old University of British Columbia law professor who has closely studied the corporation, has written a book from a left-of-centre perspective that charts its rise and delineates its foibles and strengths.

Judging by the attention it has generated in Canada and the United States, The Corporation, published last month by Viking Canada, has struck a chord.

Sales on the Amazon.com website have been brisk, and the book, which is designed for both lay and professional readers, will be translated into several Asian and European languages

Bakan, who has been a full professor at UBC for the past seven years, where he teaches contract, constitutional and corporate law, is also promoting the documentary film version of The Corporation, which he co-created and wrote.

Having debuted on TVOntario in February and March, the award-winning miniseries is scheduled to open in 40 U.S. cities in June and in Europe in July.

Like the film, the book has stirred debate and largely favourable reviews.

Corporate scandals in the United States, turning on the less than ethical practices of companies such as Enron and WorldCom, have aroused indignation and curiosity about the inner workings of big businesses.

In an interview, Bakan said The Corporation is essentially a spinoff of Just Words, published in 1997 by the University of Toronto Press.

Just Words claimed that Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms did not have a significant impact on the promotion of social justice because it left corporations out of the equation.

This was a source of concern to Bakan because corporations have so much power. As he writes: "Corporations govern our lives. They determine what we eat, what we watch, what we wear, where we work and what we do. We are inescapably surrounded by their culture, iconography and ideology.

"And increasingly, corporations dictate the decisions of their supposed overseers in government and control domains of society once firmly embedded within the public sphere."

Corporations emerged as a powerhouse in the United States and Britain with the laying of national railroad lines. Since railway barons required vast amounts of capital investments, they came to rely on big businesses to finance their operations.

Bakan argues that corporations – which are neither good nor bad, but rather amoral – immediately began pursuing their own economic self-interest without thinking of the consequences.

"All corporations are mandated by law to exploit natural and/or human resources for profit," he said. "It's very difficult to create wealth without extracting it from something: the earth or humans. And this process has the potential to cause harm."

On the plus side, corporations manufacture goods and services, produce jobs and keep the economy humming.

But the negative effects are devastating. Corporations degrade, even destroy, the environment. They can affect their workers' health and engender job insecurity. Their products may be unsafe and their prices unfair.

"We, as a society, need to create a balance that minimizes the negative and maximizes the positive," Bakan said.

In The Corporation, he writes: "Corporate rule must be challenged in order to revive the values and practices it contradicts: democracy, social justice, equality and compassion."

The solution is government intervention to regulate corporations, Bakan thinks. Asked whether governments have the political will to pass such laws, he said they normally respond to public pressure.

Lest he be misunderstood, Bakan said that the corporate world is not homogeneous and that many of the concerns he articulates have been expressed by chief executive officers of corporations. "They are not exempt from these concerns. Business people are really soul-searching."

Bakan describes himself as "a member of the Jewish social-minded intelligentsia."

He is engaged to be married to Canadian actress Rebecca Jenkins, whom he met through mutual friends after the death of his wife, Marlee, a fellow lawyer and professor.

His grandparents, Orthodox Jews from Poland, worked in the sweatshops of Brooklyn after immigrating to the United States in the second decade of the 20th century.

His parents, Paul and Rita, are retired psychologists. He taught at Simon Fraser University and she was an instructor at the British Columbia Institute of Technology.

A graduate of Simon Fraser, Bakan studied law at Oxford University, where he was a 1981 Rhodes scholar. He took two additional law degrees at Dalhousie University and Harvard.

"I enjoy law as an intellectual pursuit," he said.

Before coming to UBC, Bakan was a teacher at Osgoode Hall and practised labour law in Toronto.

UWO students divided on SPHR's stand against anti-Semitism

By PAUL RAKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Some Jewish students at the University of Western Ontario are questioning the sincerity of the support shown at a recent campus rally against anti-Semitism by a pro-Palestinian group.

Members of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) came to the rally, which was organized by Hillel at Western in response to last month's spate of anti-Semitic acts that hit Toronto Jewish sites, with Palestinian flags and signs carrying the group's name and denouncing hatred.

Guest Voice

The rally saw some 250 people stand together as members of the Jewish and Christian campus communities spoke out against hate and reaffirmed Canadians' collective responsibility to uphold Canadian values in the wake of such anti-Semitic acts.

In a press release forwarded to the local media, SPHR wrote, "Palestinians living under occupation face every form of racism. We condemn the dehumanization and brutalization that are the predictable consequence of the racism against Palestinians. It is in the same breath that we condemn anti-Semitism – the same despicable crime with a different target."

Many Jewish students are questioning the sincerity of SPHR's endorsement, accusing them of using the climate of fear created by anti-Semitic hate crimes to advance their own political ends, and wonder why the group made a concerted effort to show their support publicly.

"SPHR's gesture in solidarity against racism last Wednesday was an act of hypocrisy," said Shawn Fried, a second-year law student and co-president of Western's Jewish Law Students' Association.

"Their vilification of Israel on campus goes beyond criticism and enters the realm of racism when they defame the state and its peoples as racist, apartheid, imperialistic and colonial Palestinian human rights abusers," Fried said.

"The SPHR's failure to focus on the greatest human rights abusers of Palestinian society, that of the Palestinian Authority and other more culpable abusers while demonizing Israel for all the problems is racist, as racism is defined by prejudice based on race."

Matt Fisher, a second year political science student and president of the campus Israel Action Committee, said, "SPHR can't just hold events where speakers attempt to justify suicide bombings and accuse Jews of colonizing Israel and imposing apartheid-like conditions on non-Jews, [and] then say they stand against anti-Semitism."

Other students believe SPHR's intentions are genuine.

"It made me happy to see other groups in attendance as this is a global issue," said fourth-year physiology student and Hillel social action chair Rebecca Colman. "All groups should stand up for each other."

Rohan Belliapa, vice-president of finance of the University Student Council, which oversees all student clubs at Western, was also hopeful.

"The support shown by the SPHR is a wonderful model for how the two groups can find a common cause to unite against, in this case racism. This model would truly be a helpful reference to those looking to bring a resolution to the conflict in the Middle East."

Montreal police probe Jewish school firebombing

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Montreal police last week were following several leads in the firebombing of the United Talmud Torahs elementary school in St. Laurent on the eve of Passover, which destroyed the library and left the Jewish community in a state of shock.

Police found a few pages of computer-printed notes taped to the door of the school at the time of the fire at about 2:30 a.m. on April 5, which have led them to confirm that this was a hate crime.

Yves Surprenant, an assistant director for public affairs for the Montreal police, would not reveal the content of the notes and said the signatory was unknown to police, but copies have been seen by Jewish community officials and excerpts have been widely reported in the media.

Signed by "the brigades of Sheik Ahmed Yassin," the French-language note denounced Israel's "crimes" against the Palestinians and warned that "this is just the beginning."

Police have stepped up patrols around both Jewish and Muslim institutions for at least the next few weeks. Cruisers were a common sight outside synagogues during the holiday.

Police also set up a hotline to receive confidential information that might help their investigation 514-235-5465.

Several anonymous donors have offered a $15,000 reward, through the Sun Youth Organization, for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the perpetrators.

The firebombing was swiftly and widely condemned by political leaders, starting with Prime Minister Paul Martin. The National Assembly passed a unanimous motion of condemnation and Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay spoke at a press conference held at the school at noon on the day of fire, as did Quebec Immigration Minister Michelle Courchesne. In addition, numerous community and religious groups, including Muslim leaders and the campus-based Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, denounced the attack.

"Although, thankfully, no one was injured, there is nothing, absolutely nothing, that can justify such an act. It is against the values espoused by all Canadians, against everything that defines a civilized, open and tolerant society," said Martin in a statement. He called it an "unspeakable crime." He also personally called school officials.

Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, a UTT graduate, vowed to bring "the full force of the law to bear" on those who commit such "cowardly acts of racist hate crimes." Visibly shaken at the press conference, Cotler recalled that he had experienced anti-Semitism as a student, but it was the kind born out of ignorance and never reached the level of violence.

"We will not be silenced. We will not be intimidated. And we will act," he said.

Stéphane Dion, MP for St. Laurent-Cartierville, also present, later found himself having to backpedal on a comment attributed to him in the Globe and Mail April 6, in which he said it was regrettable that this happened when not all Jews support the policies of Israel Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

In a letter to the Globe and Mail April 7, Dion wrote: "No matter what one's opinion of the Sharon government's actions, violence is never an acceptable response. When I said, 'Why link all Canadian Jews with the policy of a government?' it was in the context of expressing my admiration for the pluralism of opinions among Jews of Canada and elsewhere."

The acrid smell of the burnt-out library, just off the foyer, hung heavily in the air at the press conference that was organized by the FEDERATION CJA and Canadian Jewish Congress.

"The Jewish community will not allow itself to be intimidated by this monstrous act. We will continue our daily activities as before, but with greater vigilance," said federation president Sylvain Abitbol, who condemned this "act of anti-Semitic violence" as especially reprehensible because children are involved.

All 10,000 books and documents and several computers were lost and the room itself was completely gutted. Smoke damage was sustained on the floor above. There is a park across the street from the side of the school where the library is located. Surprenant said an accelerant was thrown through one of the windows.

A mother openly sobbed as she walked through the black, sodden cavern that was the library. "This was my daughter's favourite room. Savages, these people are. I can't believe anyone would be so cruel, so heartless."

Principal Soly Benamron said she plans to keep a few of the charred books and put them on permanent display when the library is rebuilt.

The 230 children at the school will have to be prepared when they return to class April 15, she said. "We will let them know the truth, that this is an ugly event, that someone very bad did this. But we need to reassure them, not frighten them."

UTT executive director Sidney Benudiz said the sight of burnt books has "a powerful connotation," evoking Germany in the 1930s.

The students, he said, are already very security minded because of the measures taken in the school and quite aware of what goes on in the world. "Still, it is extremely unpleasant. We have to prepare them in a way that they will not feel threatened."

He said the school was daubed with swastikas last year but has had no other problems. "I don't know if this was preventable, but no school can afford around-the-clock security."

Although the seder was just a few hours away, about 100 people, many of them young, gathered outside UTT for a vigil. One placard read: "You can burn our books, but you can't burn our spirit."

Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Dollard des Ormeaux, using a Passover metaphor, urged them not to become embittered by what had happened and to "remember that most Canadians are sweet."

Offers of help came in quickly. A Toronto-based children's book publisher offered to restock the library, and the English Montreal School Board said it plans to give UTT students access to libraries at its schools.

Teen group sows seeds of peace in Montreal

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Was it right or wrong for Israel to assassinate Hamas spiritual leader Sheik Ahmed Yassin?

It's the type of question the teenage participants in programs run by Seeds of Peace are used to dealing with every day. Indeed, Israeli and Palestinian representatives of the group tackled it and others when they visited Montreal less than 24 hours after Yassin was killed.

It was Seeds of Peace's first visit to Canada.

The late American journalist John Wallach launched Seeds of Peace in 1993 after the first World Trade Center bombing. He sought to establish a neutral spot outside the Middle East where teens on both sides of the Arab-Israeli conflict could sow seeds of friendship and conciliation and create a generation of future leaders who could establish a "new reality" for peace.

That place is the Seeds of Peace International Camp in Maine, where 450 teens go each summer to break down barriers of distrust and begin to see each other as full human beings. The camp has produced about 2,000 "graduates" from 22 nations since its inception.

As Israeli-born Michal Brosh, 16, and Palestinian Adham Rishmawi, 21, said several times to an audience of a few hundred Jewish and non-Jewish high school students at the YM-YWHA Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre, the camp invariably creates a legacy of mutual friendship, affection and trust.

But the experience can also be marked by "intense" moments of anger, frustration, tears and shouting during the camp's daily two-hour "coexistence sessions" where the nuts and bolts of the century-old dispute are debated.

"You have to learn to deal with it," said the soft-spoken Rishmawi, who grew up in a West Bank town near Bethlehem. He attended the Seeds of Peace camp in 1997 and has gone on to be one of its more prominent spokespeople.

Now an engineering student at Columbia University in New York City, Rishmawi acknowledged that achieving trust is one of the camp's main challenges, yet it is a gradual process that is almost always successful.

A more daunting challenge, he said, was returning home to the environment of hate and distrust he came from. "Friends of mine have told me that it's all right to talk to Israelis, just don't trust them."

Brosh, whose father is Israel's consul general in Toronto, was born in Herzliyah and went to the Seeds of Peace camp last summer.

Now attending the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Brosh described herself as "right-wing" and said when she first got to the camp, she was filled with anger that "clouded my thinking."

"All I could think about were the rocks being thrown in the streets and the suicide bombers."

That changed when she was forced to co-operate with a Palestinian girl in a camp climbing expedition. "The camp changed my life forever," Brosh said.

Montrealer Howie Kislowicz, who also attended the camp last summer, said he realized he was "in touch with something extremely powerful" when he was able to forget that his fellow campers were from the other side of the divide, and meet people who were ready "to put a century of hate and bloodshed behind them."

Seeds of Peace participants all wear green T-shirts that, once donned, are meant to put them all on common ground. A small sea of the shirts could be seen on people sitting front and centre at the White House in 1993 at the signing of the Oslo accords.

George Atallah, the program's 24-year-old senior development associate in New York, told the audience – made up of kids from Herzliah St. Laurent, Bialik, Hebrew Academy and the Lake of Two Mountains High School – that unlike their Canadian counterparts, teens in the Middle East are sometimes forced to think about whether they'll survive the day, not "what colour to make the cover of your cellphone."

"Do you have to think about these things when you wake up in the morning?" he asked.

At camp, he said, "you're forced to share a bunk with the so-called enemy."

Once camp is over, kids return home. But the process started there continues with conferences, contacts and activities at a Seeds of Peace centre in Jerusalem on French Hill, the old Jerusalem dividing line.

Wallach, in a promotional video for Seeds of Peace, referred to the camp as a "detox program for the hatred that fuels violence and terror."

Atallah said Seeds of Peace hopes to establish a larger presence in Montreal.

The local event was organized by the Jewish National Fund and the Y, and sponsored by the Stephen R. Bronfman Foundation, Miriam Rolland and an anonymous donor.

The Seeds of Peace representatives also appeared at McGill University under the auspices of the Canadian Ethnic Studies Program for the United Nations' International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination.

Security barrier called essential for West Bank

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The Israeli general who has thwarted every attempt by terrorists to breach the security barrier surrounding the Gaza Strip says a similiar defensive system is essential for the West Bank to prevent suicide bombers from entering Israel.

Maj.-Gen. Doron Almog was commander of the Israel Defence Forces' Southern Command from the end of 2000 to 2003, a position that placed him at the head of military operations for all of Gaza, as well as the defence of Israel's borders with Egypt and Jordan. Almog was in Montreal to speak at a function late last month sponsored by Bank Hapoalim, which has an office here.

During the first half of 2001, Almog built a fortified security fence in the Gaza Strip bordered by a one-kilometre-deep buffer zone where no Palestinians were permitted. Everything that had existed in the zone was bulldozed, he said. At several points along the fence are observation posts with high-tech surveillance capabilities that can intercept anyone trying to enter the buffer zone well before they get near the fence.

More than 400 attempts to enter Israel from Gaza were stopped because of this barrier, he said.

Almog said such a buffer is also necessary around the West Bank. The great majority of terrorist attacks in Israel originate from there because the border can be "easily" passed through.

The suicide bomber responsible for killing five members of his extended family last October in a restaurant bombing in Jerusalem was a female lawyer from the West Bank town of Jenin. (Another family member remains in critical condition and another lost his sight.)

"The consensus is that Israel must be a Jewish democratic state," Almog said. "Jews must be a clear-cut majority. Separation [from Palestinians] is needed. The military must do more. It doesn't matter what the international community says.

"If we show our determination to the world, people will better understand us."

A fence cannot completely stop terrorist attacks because the Palestinians are increasingly capable of using rockets, said Almog, who also put other measures in place in Gaza, such as sophisticated intelligence procedures and "special rules of engagement."

> 'The military must do more. It doesn't matter what the international community says'

He said the assassination of Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin was justified because he was the one giving orders to send rockets into Israel. Under Almog's command, Israeli troops were prepared on more than 100 occasions to kill Yassin. They knew his movements and whereabouts intimately and was ready to act should word come from the government.

Born in Israel in 1951, Almog said he decided on a military career during the Yom Kippur War, in which he served as a paratroop company commander in the Sinai. His brother, a tank commander, was killed in action. The thought that his brother slowly bled to death for a week before troops could evacuate him has consumed him with guilt ever since, he said.

Under his three-year command of the south of Israel, about 60 soldiers died. While it was tragic, it was little compared to the 3,000 Israeli soldiers killed in the three weeks of the Yom Kippur War, he said.

The only way terrorism will end, Almog believes, is if "modern secular" education systems are developed in Arab countries. Attention will then have to be paid to changing their economic and political systems.

But, he said, "in the short term, I do not see any reduction in animosity."

In a paraphrase of Napoleon, he said the sword can only accomplish so much. There is currently no "central authority" among the Palestinians in Gaza or West Bank and no current Palestinian leader capable of peace negotiations. He said he could see Gaza being ceded to Egypt and part of the West Bank going to Jordan.

Almog said Israeli Arabs should be required to do some kind of national service in lieu of military duty, such as working in hospitals, in order to foster a sense of loyalty to Israel.

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is not only about land and occupation, he said.

"It is multi-dimensional. It is a religious, political, educational and ideological conflict, as well as territorial.

"This war is about the existence of Israel."

Technological superiority will not be enough for Israel to win, he said. "A nation will not win a war if it does not have spirit."

He urged Diaspora Jews to express their solidarity with Israel, not only by donations, but by visiting Israel and "showing us your sympathy and love."

Peace needs a spiritual component, panel says

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A political solution will never be enough to bring Mideast peace, as there must be a spiritual component to the process for it to succeed, a panel of representatives from Judaism, Islam and Christianity concluded in a recent symposium at Saint Paul University.

"Religious Resources for Peacebuilding: Jewish, Muslim and Christian Voices," co-sponsored by the Catholic university's faculty of theology and faculty of human sciences, invited peace-seeking people from the three faiths to compare their religions' attitudes and writings on peace.

"One of the reasons that the Oslo process failed is that it was a secular plan imposed by secular leaders on a holy land," said Yehezkel Landau, the keynote speaker at the symposium's opening and a faculty associate in interfaith relations at Hartford Seminary in Connecticut, the only Jew on the school's faculty.

Landau began his address, which took place shortly after Israel's killing of Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, by saying "the time [of this symposium] is either auspicious or horrific following the news today back home in Israel/Palestine."

Catherine Clifford, an assistant professor of theology at Saint Paul, introduced Landau as "a man of prayer, a man of dialogue, a man of peace."

The speakers agreed that in all religions, the main commandment is for people to love and respect one another, and that getting to know one another as people would eliminate hatred.

But the question is how to achieve this lofty goal, Landau said. "If religion is to become a force for good, it has to undergo a metamorphosis."

Landau, who grew up in the United States and later made aliyah, is a former executive director of Peace Now. He and his wife are the founders of the Open House Center for Jewish-Arab Co-existence in Ramle, Israel.

The story of the centre's beginning revolves around the childhood house of Landau's wife, Dalia,which had been owned by an Arab family before 1948. When she received a visit from the adult child of the previous owners, who asked if he could look around his childhood home, Dalia began to re-think the concept of ownership. She wondered whose home was it really, and whether two families – and two peoples – could co-exist. She and her husband decided to share the home, and it became known as the Open House. (For details about it, visit www.friendsofopenhouse.org.)

> 'One of the reasons that the Oslo process failed is that it was a secular plan imposed by secular leaders on a holy land'

Farhang Rajaee, a professor of political science at Carleton University, and clinical psychologist Sister Mary Ellen Francoeur of the World Conference for Religion and Peace responded to Landau's presentation with references from their respective religious teachings, illustrating the great similarities among Islam, Judaism and Christianity.

Rabbi Arnold Fine, spiritual leader of Congregation Agudath Israel, attended the symposium, which included small-group discussions throughout the second day.

He said he found the atmosphere respectful and welcoming, including the consideration that organizers gave to the dietary needs of all participants in the form of a kosher/halal lunch.

"We are all unique, but at the same time there is so much that we have in common," Rabbi Fine said. "The directions we take are mutual and somehow we have to find a way to have our separate traditions bring us together rather than separate us."

Shul, church move in together – for now

By MAXINE FISCHBEIN
The Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Erev Shabbat on Feb. 27 was a defining moment in Calgary's Jewish communal life as Temple B'nai Tikvah – the city's only Reform congregation – celebrated the dedication of its new home at Living Spirit United Church.

"We all sat in the sanctuary taking deep breaths and wondering if it was real," said temple president Lynn Millard of the "Chanukat Beit Knesset" ceremony.

The temple will share the building with Living Spirit for three years before taking over full ownership. Each January, B'nai Tikvah will make a payment toward the $2.6 million dollar cost to buy the building, while the Holy Spirit congregation continues to seek a new location elsewhere in southwest Calgary.

On the Shabbat prior to the first service in the new building, 32 B'nai Tikvah members shared the honour of carrying the congregation's Sifrei Torah from the Calgary Jewish Centre – the site of services for the past 20 years – to the temple's new home.

Rabbi Howard Vos-Altman, spiritual leader of Temple B'nai Tikvah, later pointed out that the number of participants happened to match the number of fringes on a tallit, adding another layer of meaning to the emotional experience.

Highlights of the inaugural Kabalat Shabbat service, which attracted more than 450 people, included the affixing of a mezuzah on the door leading to the sanctuary. The mezuzah, donated by a dozen B'nai Tikvah families, "is a symbol of our Jewish presence, our home," and defines the sanctuary as "sacred Jewish space," Rabbi Vos-Altman said.

Rabbi Vos-Altman and Rabbi Sharon Sobel, executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, delivered sermons linking the ceremony to the dedication of the Holy Temple in Jerusalem.

The service also marked the installation of an enormous silk-screen panel, more than 25 feet high and 10 feet wide, depicting a tree of life, the congregation's logo and one of Judaism's most ubiquitous symbols.

The panel will cover the enormous cross at the front of the sanctuary when the space is being used by the temple.

The tree roots in the logo include biblical quotations and words describing the values of the temple itself. In a nod to the congregation's geographical location, the logo includes mountains in its background.

"The sanctuary [was] utterly transformed," said Rabbi Vos-Altman.

Greetings from former B'nai Tikvah rabbis Jordan Goldson and Jamie Korngold were also read at the service.

The dedication of the temple's new home is an exciting new beginning, said Rabbi Vos-Altman, who has lead the congregation for the past 1½ years.

He says members are looking forward to the introduction – "on a gradual basis" – of additional prayer services and educational programs.

While congregants currently meet for Friday night services and again for Torah study on one Saturday morning each month, they will meet twice a month by the fall, the rabbi said.

"The plan is, of course, to begin transitioning to both a Friday night and Shabbat morning service," he added.

B'nai mitzvah classes begin again this month, and families will now have the option of holding their kiddush luncheons in the synagogue's social hall, Rabbi Vos-Altman said.

"In fall 2004 or 2005, we hope to make a transition from Sunday school to Shabbat school, " he said, adding, "It is quite important for families to experience Shabbat together."

Starting this fall, Temple B'nai Tikvah will also add a Wednesday afternoon Hebrew program for students in grades three to six that will be open to the Jewish community at large, he said.

Millard said she is looking forward to "growing the congregation" and its spirit of voluntarism. Also on her list of priorities is reviving the temple's youth group after a hiatus of a couple of years.

She said congregants are excited about the prospect of engaging in social action projects with Living Spirit members.

In the immediate future, Temple B'nai Tikvah will put together teams of volunteers to assist in Living Spirit's well-established Inn from the Cold program, which offers overnight shelter to the homeless four times a month.

"We believe that… the relationship between B'nai Tikvah and Living Spirit will be a model of religious dialogue and co-operation, not only for the city of Calgary, but for the entire country," Rabbi Vos-Altman said.

Links will include everything from a joint management committee that will "get the physical plan worked out," to plans for a communal Passover seder in 2005.

"It will be a traditional Maxwell House Jewish Seder," promised Rabbi Vos-Altman, who looks forward to bringing together both communities to celebrate Passover, as he did once before as a student rabbi.

Rev. Rita Cattell, Living Spirit's senior clergy, said the congregations' joint tenancy "creates opportunity for discussion."

Often, attempts at interfaith dialogue lead to "differences being glossed over," Rev. Cattell said, characterizing the arrangement between the church and temple as "a very exciting opportunity to walk the talk."

The United Church is active in promoting interfaith relationships and dialogue, and her congregation's relationship with the temple "adds a new dimension" to that.

It will show others "that two faiths can maintain and respect their own individual identities and still identify common ground we have."

Both Rev. Cattell and Rabbi Vos-Altman said they hope that even after Living Spirit finds its new home, the bonds forged between the church and temple will endure.

Blair promises to get support for disengagement

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — British Prime Minister Tony Blair told Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last week that he would work toward enlisting international support for the disengagement plan, Sharon's office said.

"British Prime Minister Blair called to voice his support for the disengagement plan and his appreciation for the step Israel is taking," Sharon's office said in a statement.

"Blair added that he intends to work toward enlisting support for the plan among the international community."

Blair said the withdrawal must lead the international community to commit to improving conditions in the Palestinian Authority (PA), according to the Prime Minister's Office.

The world must also make clear to the PA the need to carry out reforms and fight terror, Blair was quoted as saying.

Blair, Sharon and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak were scheduled to visit Washington separately this week. They will meet U.S. President George W. Bush at his Crawford, Tex., home.

Next week, Jordan's King Abdullah will meet Bush, and Palestinian Foreign Minister Nabil Sha'ath will meet National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of State Colin Powell for the first high-level American-PA meeting since before Mahmoud Abbas resigned as Palestinian prime minister last summer.

Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip could pave the way for Palestinian elections, Sha'ath said last week. He also said "militant opposition groups" may also participate in the vote.

Speaking to reporters in the West Bank city of Ramallah after meeting with PA President Yasser Arafat, Sha'ath said, "We hope [a withdrawal] will pave the road for a Palestinian general election with participation with Hamas."

Sha'ath told Israel Radio earlier that "[Hamas] joining the Palestinian government is a matter that's being discussed today, and it obviously has to be conditioned upon commitment to the Palestinian Authority and the peace process.

"Our hope is that once there is withdrawal from Gaza, there will be a real ceasefire. In a ceasefire, we have the commitment of Hamas and everybody when there is a reciprocated ceasefire [that is, reciprocated by the Israelis]," Sha'ath said in the interview.

He said the terrorist groups would be committed to a ceasefire and the Palestinian security sources would go after those who violate the truce, thus avoiding a civil war.

Sha'ath also said the Americans will have to be ready with the World Bank and other donors to offer "massive" economic support for the Palestinians in the event of an Israeli withdrawal from territories.

The Palestinians would not accept any agreement "that will pre-empt permanent [Palestinian] settlement, neither on borders nor refugees nor anything," Sha'ath said. "This will not be accepted unless this is part of the [U.S.-backed] road map [peace plan] and it should be co-ordinated with the Palestinians."

Once this happens, "the Americans should be ready with the World Bank and other donors to make massive economic support for the Palestinian Authority," he said, adding the aid was needed for "relief, reconstruction, economic activities, labor, job creation and others."

In return, he said the Americans want the PA to step up their security activities in the territories, and in particular, to arrest those responsible for a fatal attack on an American convoy in Gaza last year in which three people were killed.

The United States opposes any cooperation with Hamas. A State Department spokesperson last week called for the terror organization to be ostracized and stripped of any power and influence as an organization.

Nabil Sha'ath

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Jordan's King Abdullah II are also scheduled to meet Bush this month.

"I don't think [the Americans] will make a decision on this plan before these meetings," Sha'ath said. "I think Sharon wishes there would be such an agreement, but in fact I doubt it."

In addition to political compensation Israel is seeking from the United States for its withdrawal from Gaza and four isolated settlements in the northern West Bank, it also wants financial aid on two tracks.

It wants $5 billion (US) in loan guarantees that would be used to develop the Negev, as well as a grant of hundreds of millions of dollars to help finance the war on terror.

It is possible the administration will show some flexibility about the use of the money in Israel even if it does not agree explicitly for the money to compensate settlers who are evacuated.

Israel not allowed to defend itself

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

A few days after the recent publication of a European Union report in which the Europeans admit anti-Semitism has worsened on their continent, Europe took another step that reeks of the same stench.

The European Parliament effectively redefined Israel's self-defence against terror to be itself an "act of terror," because Palestinian civilians are being hurt in this ongoing war. This from the same self-righteous Europe whose air forces bombed Yugoslavia for more than two months, even though no European state was in any existential danger.

The background to the European Parliament's decision was Israel's assassination of Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, the person who effectively invented and encouraged suicide terror, and who recently allowed women to conduct suicide terror missions. Nothing was said, for example, about the latest suicide terror attack in Ashdod port – in which 10 Israelis were killed – that preceded the Yassin killing.

The problem did not begin with Yassin's assassination, about which there is a debate in Israel. From the minute the current round of conflict broke out, there have been waves of criticism of Israel's actions, whether offensive or defensive.

First there was criticism of the use of pinpoint snipers by the Israel Defence Forces. In the eyes of critics, it apparently would have been preferable if the army had used machine guns, which later came under criticism. The initial use of combat helicopters prompted a wave of complaints. Then there was the ruckus over Israel using F-16s to drop bombs. The criticism also came from the Americans, who a few years later used planes to attack targets in Baghdad, even after the American army was in control of all of Iraq.

When the IDF began bombing, as a punitive action, the homes of Palestinians involved in murder and sending suicide attackers, once again the accusations were directed at Israel. Israel did not know how to deter suicide terrorists whose families received financial grants (including from now-deposed Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein) for the dead Israelis killed by their relatives. The idea that bombers' families be expelled was raised, but even when the proposal was to move the family to Gaza from the West Bank, the hue and cry against Israel rose once again.

> Nearly every Israeli statement is greeted with mockery

"Pinpoint prevention" provoked a tsunami of complaints, as if this wasn't a war in which one side, the Palestinian side, deliberately strikes at the other's civilians – on buses, in restaurants and malls – filling explosives belts with large amounts of nails to ensure as much human damage as possible. But in the eyes of the critics, the pursuit of terrorists appeared to be a criminal act, not hostilities during warfare. The criticism was even leveled at the size of the bombs used by the air force.

There were also complaints about the IDF's rules of engagement. What army in the world has better rules of engagement? The Americans? The Egyptians? The Indians? The French? Or the Russians and Turks? All of them could learn from the IDF about how to comply with orders. But when it comes to Israel, they even complain about the rubber-coated bullets the IDF fires. Nearly every Israeli statement is greeted with mockery. The Israeli legal system has also been mocked.

"Lift the blockades and checkpoints," shouted the critics. True, the checkpoints harass the innocent, but the critics did not take into account that the breaches through which the murderers come must be blocked. At first, the intent was to prevent car bombs from making their way into Israel – including ambulances carrying weapons. And the idea of the separation fence was hated from the start. It was beyond the pale even before it began to go up and its route was determined.

The criticism is also fed from inside Israel. The suggestion to put IDF officers on trial at the International Court of Justice did not only come from Belgium. Some Israelis extremists also made similar threats.

Now there are complaints from the European Union that Israeli representatives are going to newspaper editors to complain about distorted reports.

Presumably, if we were to defend ourselves in this war of terror by throwing rocks, the world would still complain.

Most critics don't believe Israel has a right to self-defence. Israel, therefore, should, in most cases, ignore the critics. We should be the ones to criticize what is happening on our side and around us.

Gadhafi's son says Libyan Jews entitled to compensation

By ZVI BAR'EL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Libyan Jews will be able to receive compensation for property confiscated when they left the country, the son of Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi told the Egyptian weekly Al-Ahram Al-Arabi.

Saif al-Islam Gadhafi also invited Libyan Jews to return, saying Libya is "their country and their original homeland." Gadhafi said this would help solve the Palestinian problem, as the returning Libyan Jews could leave their homes to the Palestinians.

Gadhafi said Libya does not intend to negotiate with Israel, because Libya is not in conflict with the Jewish state and Israel has not conquered Libyan territory. Libya is, therefore, indifferent to the Middle East peace process.

"From the start we did not want to get into the stew of the Middle East," Gadhafi said.

"Until recently, we were in conflict with Israel, but things have changed. The Palestinians, to whom we gave support, weapons and military equipment, refused this assistance and began to ask for money to build industrial projects and civil infrastructure.

"Besides, conflict countries like Egypt, Jordan and, to a certain extent, Syria, negotiated with Israel and even signed peace agreements while Libya, which is not a conflict country, continued to pay the bill. That is, they benefited and we continued to pay a price.

"We have, therefore, decided to completely distance ourselves from the Middle East and to turn to Africa. If interested parties have decided to cease the war against Israel, why should we go on with it?"

Civilians will not be targets

The Hamas, Fatah and Islamic Jihad leaderships in Gaza have prepared a draft "National Plan" that "emphasizes the right to use violence to oppose the occupation and the settlements, while avoiding turning civilians from either side into targets for attack." The document, which summarizes the outcome of meetings between Abdel Aziz Rantisi of Hamas, Ahmed Halas of Fatah and representatives from the Islamic Jihad and other, smaller armed political factions, is regarded as a basis for negotiations between the Palestinian Authority (PA) and all the armed factions, to have a mutually agreed leadership to control Gaza after Israel withdraws.

But is Arafat a target?

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon hinted U.S. protection over PA President Yasser Arafat has expired. Sharon told Ma'ariv his past pledge to Washington not to harm Arafat had been overtaken by events. "That was when he still went around on red carpets. Today, even those people who feted Arafat, know exactly what damage he has caused," Sharon said, repeating a veiled threat against the Palestinian leader's life. "I would not recommend he consider himself insured." U.S. President George W. Bush's administration, while shunning Arafat as an obstacle to peace, has opposed any Israeli plan to remove him.

Disengagement plan detailed

Israel plans to remove all settlements in Gaza and four in the West Bank. Sharon first detailed his plan to disengage Israel from the Palestinians in a number of pre-Passover media interviews. "There are still details left to work out, but I believe our intention is to leave all of them," Sharon told Army Radio, referring to Gaza's 21 settlements.

Passover a touring holiday

Israelis filled the hotels in the north, as well as nature reserves, Jewish National Fund forests and beaches throughout the country, this Passover holiday. In Tiberias on Lake Kinneret, hotels reported 95 per cent capacity, with visitors spending more money than in the past. "There was something different, encouraging, this Passover, after three hard years for the city," said Tami Atiya, director of the Tiberias Hotel Association. "And you couldn't ignore the fact that the level of the Kinneret was up, making it more attractive to Israeli tourists." By Thursday of last week, some 700,000 people had visited Israel's national parks and forests, Army Radio reported. Tens of thousands of people attended the traditional Priestly Blessing at the Western Wall on Thursday as well.

Federal government plans 10-point program to fight racism

While noting that Canada has had anti-hate laws and provincial human rights legislation in place for decades, Cotler conceded they are "not always appreciated." Cotler said the legislation will reinforce current laws and hand law enforcement new tools to use in combating hate.

Cotler, who as both a Liberal backbencher and a prominent human rights advocate spoke out frequently against anti-Semitism and the lack of government programs to counter it, said the new plan will place special emphasis on teaching about the evils of hate and bigotry and encourage community and ethno-cultural leaders to preach messages of tolerance.

Eric Vernon, director of government relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, commended Ottawa for the initiative and said he hopes it will feature a special focus on anti-Semitism.

"It would be our expectation that anti-Semitism is clearly recognized as one of the core evils of racism, as recent events have demonstrated," Vernon told The CJN. "Our hope is that the measures will lend themselves to battle anti-Semitism. All Canadians of good will have been shocked by recent anti-Semitic attacks and it's critical that our government responds both through unequivocal denunciations and through this kind of long-range strategic thinking.

> 'Our hope is that the measures will lend themselves to battle anti-Semitism'

"We commend the government," Vernon added.

Jewish leaders from several organizations met recently with Prime Minister Paul Martin, partly to discuss a plan of action in the wake of anti-Jewish hate crimes in Toronto and its northern suburbs. Martin strongly denounced the arson attack at the United Talmud Torahs school in Montreal on the eve of Passover as "an offence against all that Canadians cherish."

> 'Multi-million-dollar, multi-year anti-racism plan has been formulated by the department of Canadian Heritage'

The multi-million-dollar, multi-year anti-racism plan has been formulated by the department of Canadian Heritage and is expected to be introduced in the coming weeks.

YIDDISH PROGRAM AT BETEL CENTRE FOR THOSE WHO 'FALL BETWEEN THE CRACKS'

Yiddish skits, videos (with English subtitles), discussions and stories "in Yiddish or Yinglish" are on offer at the monthly "Fun With Yiddish" gatherings in north Toronto, the next instalment of which takes place next week.

"I've organized this because there are many of us who don't speak Yiddish that well but we like to hear it spoken," said program co-ordinator Evelyn Yuditsky.

"We like to get together and tell nostalgic stories about our grandparents and our parents in the shtetl or in Toronto in the old days."

According to Yuditsky, "Fun with Yiddish" is geared for those people who "fall between the cracks between those who know Yiddish very well and those who have lost a lot of it."

Bernard Betel Centre, Synagogue. Admission $1. Thursday, April 22, 1 to 2:30 p.m. (Followed by the "Nafty" Naftolin Komedy Kabaret," a free program.) 416-225-2112, ext. 134.

Men of the Deeps: Nova Scotia's celebrated Men of the Deeps coal-miners' choir is performing a concert here this week dedicated to the memory of Nicholas Goldschmidt, Canada's premiere advocate of choral music and festivals.

A little-known bit of history associated with the Glace Bay choir is that it was dreamed up in 1967 as a centennial project by that town's Nina Cohen, who had previously worked to establish the Glace Bay Miners' Museum. She's been called a "whirlwind" by both media and colleagues.

Based at the museum, the choir consists of men who have toiled in the mines, and who collectively raise their voices to perpetuate the heritage and folklore of mining communities.

The concert is at the Metropolitan United Church, 56 Queen St. E. on Saturday, April 17, 8 p.m. Tickets $42. 416-870-8000.

Gabi's Dresser hits the stage

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Kathy Kacer has adapted her award-winning children's Holocaust book The Secret of Gabi's Dresser into a play which opens this week at Toronto's Al Green Theatre of the Miles Nadal JCC.

Kathy Kacer

The Secret of Gabi's Dresser mixes suspense and courage in a story centring on a 12-year-old girl forced to hide from Nazis in a small Czech town. Kacer based the story on her mother who eluded soldiers by crawling into a tiny dresser that the Toronto author still owns today.

The cast includes Jill Morrison (as Gabi), Alan Lee, Alan Price, Nadine Rabinovitch, and Blair Keyzer.

While Gabi's family and friends flesh out the play, "the focal point is the girl," Kacer says, "because children relate to children."

Te-Amim Music Theatre is producing the drama, and founder/director Helena Fine says the play's Holocaust education aspects serve as a springboard to other everyday kid problems such as bullying and individuality.

"Theatre makes the learning experience deeper, and it touches more emotions," she says.

Both Kacer and Fine hope the play will reach families as well as classrooms – they not only workshopped the play at Rosedale Heights School of the Arts but several matinees have been reserved for schoolchildren.

The slender book, which won both the Jewish Book and Silver Birch awards, underwent a difficult transition to theatre script at first, Kacer notes.

Scenes heavy with description and internal monologue had to be converted to dialogue-laden scenes, a process the first-time playwright found fulfilling. "This is a rich theatrical piece that I'm very proud of," Kacer says.

"Is there any other Holocaust drama targeting children other than The Diary of Anne Frank? There are many books but very little theatre," she says.

Other page-to-stage revisions included expanding character roles. The boy who joined the Nazi Youth movement in the book becomes Gabi's ex-boyfriend in the play, Kacer says. Also, the bold Stephan who hides Gabi's family on his farm shifts from bit player to supporting actor, which Kacer believes is necessary for someone "with a good heart who protects a family despite the risks involved."

Te-Amim, which previously staged Brundibar at the Leah Posluns Theatre to great success, commissioned Kacer to adapt her book because it fit with the company's goal of nurturing cultural differences with a focus on the Holocaust.

"Through the arts we can affect young people in a more sensitive non-threatening way," Fine says.

The Secret of Gabi's Dresser previews on April 15 at 2 p.m., with all tickets costing $5. It opens April 17 and runs until April 21. Tickets are $20 for adults, $15 for children, although during school performances tickets for students and teachers cost $10, and for the public $15.

Holocaust survivors will share their experiences after the school performances. Scheduled speakers include John Freund, Max Eisen and Vera Shiff.

All performances take place at Al Green Theatre of the Miles Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Avenue. For tickets, call 416-504-7529.

Atrium named after artist

The University of Western Ontario recently opened an atrium named after one of its former students, now an artist, collector and critic.

The John A. Schweitzer Atrium is a courtyard that connects the Weldon Library with the newly-opened Archives and Research Collections Centre.

The atrium currently features two sculptures by Henry Moore donated by Schweitzer and a permanent exhibition of Schweitzer's own work.

"I am delighted at the naming honour," Schweitzer said. "To me it's a perfect fit – a public space linking a library and a collections centre. Books and art mirrors my own artistic interest in juxtaposing text with image."

Introduced into the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts in 2003, Schweitzer has been lauded for his artistic achievement since the outset of his career with awards ranging from the Queen's Golden Jubilee Medal and the University of Western Ontario's Purple and White Award in recognition of his philanthropy.

Magazine launched for conservative readers

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

For some, cows and colts might strictly be referring to types of animals. But for one magazine, it's probably referring to beef and guns.

"If Maclean's magazine is vanilla, we are a little bit of tabasco," says Ezra Levant, publisher of the Western Standard, a pro-gun, pro-beef, pro-American, conservative magazine, launched in March.

Ezra Levant

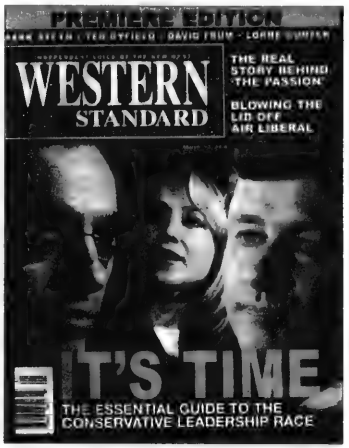
With a 72-page-premiere issue, The Western Standard is a counter-balance to Canada's liberal press, says Levant.

"What's different about us it that we're not starting with the establishment assumption that the Liberals are the natural governing party."

When the Alberta Report magazine folded last year, Levant says he sensed that there was an editorial void in the country, with a need for an independent, pro-Western voice.

The Calgary-based Standard started officially in January with 19 investors on board. So far, the subscriber list has exceeded 10,000, and 40,000 copies of the premiere issue were printed.

But you don't have to live west of the Ontario border to enjoy the magazine. "Being a Westerner is not only a geographical definition. It is a culture, a sensibility that includes everything from a belief in the individual, to a pioneering spirit, to a respect for tradition mixed with a healthy skepticism of authority - especially government authority," Levant says.



PREMIERE EDITION
WESTERN STANDARD
THE REAL STORY BEHIND 'THE PASSION'
BLOWING THE LID OFF AIR LIBERAL
IT'S TIME
THE ESSENTIAL GUIDE TO THE CONSERVATIVE LEADERSHIP RACE

The magazine offers a large dollop of politics, some biting wit, and a critical eye towards news items. In the first edition appeared a tongue-in-cheek proposal to amalgamate Alberta and British Columbia into "Albumbia."

The magazine also takes a jab at Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson's spending spree and former National Post columnists Mark Steyn and David Frum wrote about the corporatization and monopolization of Canadian politics and media, respectively.

A former National Post writer himself, Levant was able to lasso a "dream team" of writers for his magazine. "Working in the media has allowed me to meet a lot of great columnists, editors, reporters and even cartoonists. So it assisted in recruiting our amazing line-up of talent," he says.

In the first issue there were also articles on Israel's security fence, and the debate over the controversy of Mel Gibson's movie, The Passion of The Christ.

Fittingly, Levant says his Jewish background does influence the paper's editorial stance. "Unlike Jewish opinion leaders of the last generation, I am more likely to see today's socialists and other 'progressives' as anti-Israel and even anti-Semitic," he says, "ranging from international 'human rights' groups that ignore Arab terrorism and nit-pick Israel, to domestic political parties and media, [which] routinely demonize Israel. I see that Christians and other conservatives are our new and best friends."

In April, the magazine will start the Western Standard Radio Hour, a weekly radio call-in show that Levant hopes to syndicate to other cities as well.

"Liberals already have enough of a platform in Canada, and much of it tax-subsidized," he says. But that doesn't mean the magazine will be avoiding liberal -or Liberal- news altogether.

"We will cover liberals in our news pages, because they are part of the news," he says. An example is in the first issue's two-page interview with federal NDP leader Jack Layton.

"As far as the Liberal Party, we'll praise them where praise is due, and we'll criticize the Conservative Party where it's warranted."

Are there political topics that the magazine might shy away from? "No," says Levant, "and we'll prove that every issue."

Warsaw Ghetto uprising commemorated in evocative book

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Germany conquered Warsaw in September 1939, the city's 360,000 Jewish residents were effectively doomed.

With the Polish capital in their hands, the Germans set up bread and soup distribution centres for its starving population. In a portent of the horrors that awaited Jews, who comprised one-third of Warsaw's population, they were not permitted to join the food lines.

"Nicht für Juden" – Not for Jews – the Germans proclaimed.

In October of that fateful year, the German administrators issued the first of what would be numerous anti-Semitic decrees, all intended to demoralize, weaken and isolate Jews.

A stamp issued by Poland in 1983 to mark the 40th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

The Germans also humiliated Jews – cutting off the beards of the observant and beating and forcing passerbys to dance and sing at gunpoint.

On Nov. 15, 1940, the ghetto was sealed. Shortly afterward, 100,000 Jews from neighbouring towns were pushed into what would be the biggest ghetto in Nazi-occupied Europe. Many died of disease and starvation.

In the next three years, the German occupiers methodically deported tens of thousands of Jews. Further deportations were shelved when the ghetto uprising broke out on April 19, 1943.

On May 16, Jurgen Stroop, the SS general in charge of crushing the revolt and liquidating the ghetto, informed his superiors he had successfully carried out his orders.

These tragic events, which will be solemnly remembered in ceremonies around the world later this week, are recalled in Brave and Desperate, published in Israel by Beit Lohamei Haghetaot, the Ghetto Fighters' House Museum.

The original edition, released in Hebrew, came out in 2003 to coincide with the 60th anniversary of the rebellion. Now an English version, running to 207 pages in large album size format, has been published.

Skillfully edited by Danny Dor and expertly designed by Tzipi Birak-Bizanski, the book is a useful addition to Holocaust historiography.

The text, supplemented by personal accounts, is sharp and precise. The photographs, some apparently never seen before in print, are stark and graphic.

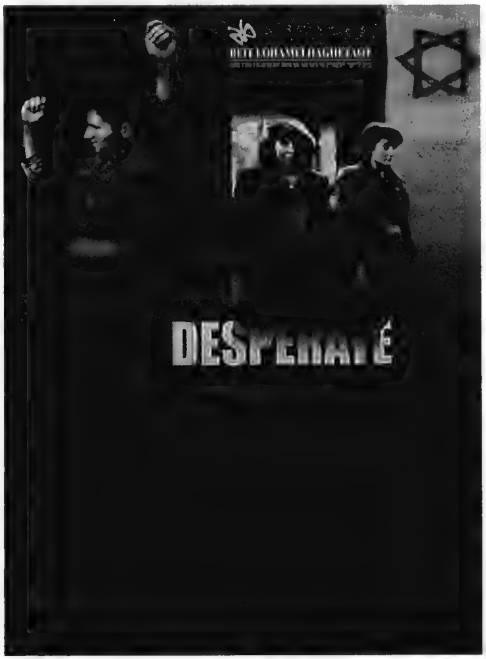
Brave and Desperate, whose title pretty well sums up the emotions that accompanied the uprising, charts major developments in the ghetto.

On Oct. 3, 1939, four days after the fall of Warsaw, Adam Czerniakow – an industrial enginneer who had studied in Germany and who had represented the Jewish community in Poland's Senate – was summoned to Gestapo headquarters to head up the new Council of Elders.

The Judenrat, in conjunction with a Jewish police force, administered the ghetto for the Germans. In 1942, Czerniakow committed suicide, no longer being able to fulfill German demands.

By then, the ghetto's population consisted of a small class of Judenrat employees, police and smugglers, a much larger group of Jews struggling to survive on a bowl of soup and a slice of bread per day, and a slightly smaller mass of people just getting by.

The Jewish Fighting Force, which organized the uprising, was formed on July 28, 1942, just as the greatest deportation in the ghetto's history got under way. Its top leaders were Mordechai Anielewicz, Mordechai Tenenbaum, Joseph Kaplan, Yitzhak (Antek) Zuckerman and Zivia Lubetkin.



Only Zuckerman survived.

The odds against them were overwhelming, given the paucity of weapons and ammunition at their disposal. The Polish underground donated a small cache of 49 pistols and 50 grenades. Polish arms dealers filled in the gaps.

Much to SS chieftain Heinrich Himmler's disappointment, the fighters rolled back the first German assault on the ghetto. In anticipation of Hitler's birthday on April 20, Himmler had planned to convey the joyful news that the ghetto had been cleared of Jews and rendered Judenrein.

Commanding far greater resources, the Nazis eventually prevailed. In what is probably an exaggeration, Stroop claimed that 13,929 Jews had been killed and 7,000 shot while trying to escape from burning buildings.

The official German casualty rate was low: 16 killed and 86 injured. But historians believe the toll was considerably higher. Stroop, who was hanged after the war, wanted to minimize the heroism of the Jewish fighters.

When the fighting ended, he was ordered to plow the entire area of the ghetto and replace it with a huge amusement park. The Germans levelled the remains of the ghetto, but it was left to Poland's postwar government to build a park.

Today, the only physical reminder of the ghetto is a 20-metre stretch of wall the Nazis forgot to destroy. The wall is hidden between drab housing blocs that converge on it from all sides.

Sixty-one years after the Nazis tried to eradicate the Jews of Europe, the defiant spirit of the uprising lives on, with Brave and Desperate skillfully distilling its essence.

New Israeli product aims to lower cholesterol

By WENDY ELLIMAN
Israel Press Service

Have a fried egg for breakfast, French fries with your lunch, pour extra oil over your salad – and end the day with your cholesterol level 15 per cent lower than it was in the morning.

Neither fantasy nor a glimpse into the future, this is something you can do today if, says Israel's leading producer of edible oils, you use their newly produced Canola Active, which is refined from the seeds of the mustard family plant called rape and is enriched with two-and-a-half times its natural quantity of phytosterols.

Shemen Industries says Canola Active works because these phytosterols, natural components of many vegetable oils, prevent "bad" cholesterol from entering the bloodstream and arteries. Binding themselves to cholesterol carriers in the digestive system, they enter the bloodstream and cause the cholesterol to be excreted from the body. They are so effective that two to three teaspoons of Canola Active a day are sufficient to lower blood cholesterol in healthy people by 15 per cent.

While the protective action of phytosterols has been shown by dozens of scientific studies and was recently confirmed by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, the problem has been how to increase the quantities of phytosterols that nature provides.

"Plant phytosterols are insoluble in both oil and in water, so introducing them into foods and thus making them bioavailable presented a considerable challenge," says Nissim Garti, a professor at Hebrew University's Casali Institute of Applied Chemistry, and inventor of the technology that has enabled the production of Canola Active.

"We solved the problem by creating 'vehicles' that transport additional phytosterols across the membrane. Our vehicles are droplets capable of absorbing phytosterols, no droplet measuring more than one-ten millionth of an inch."

Garti's technology was immediately bought by Shemen Industries. Founded 98 years ago, Shemen recently moved into the health food market, investing $3 million to launch its Etz Hazayit-Health From Nature subsidiary in 2001. The Etz Hazayit line is made of edible oils enriched with nutritional components, such as soya, corn, sunflower, canola and safflower oils with added vitamin E to protect the immune system and promote vascular activity.

Shemen Industries chose its canola oil for phytosterol enrichment. Produced from two different species of rapeseed, canola's level of saturated fatty acids is the lowest of any commonly consumed vegetable oil currently on the market. Its level of mono-unsaturated fatty acids is second only to that of olive oil, and it contains an appreciable amount of two essential fatty acids, linoleic and alpha-linolenic acid.

While the Canola Active marketing initiative has only just begun, it is likely to strike a chord among Israelis. As in other western countries, Israelis are increasingly concerned about the management and cost of their health care and increasingly frustrated with the disease-treatment approach of modern medicine. More and more are seeking not only basic nutrients but also active health benefits from the food they eat.

Tal Leizer, Shemen Industries' marketing manager, says the company expects Canola Active "to launch a worldwide revolution in eating habits.

"It provides a complete solution for all those with high health awareness, high cholesterol levels or a family history of high cholesterol, and as it's neutral in taste, it can be used by the whole family for seasoning, cooking, baking and frying."

Sold in one-litre containers for $3.40 (US), Canola Active joins an edible oils market in Israel that has an estimated annual volume of about 150 million litres and generates some $200 million (US) a year. But although the market is large, it is viewed as sluggish. Israelis consider edible oils as a product for which there is no substitute and an essential food additive that improves taste. Most buy according to habit and price.

Sitting pretty in the air

By NETA ZACH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — A new airplane seat may help prevent thrombosis associated with long flights.

Long flights can have far worse side effects than jet lag. In the United States alone, an estimated two million people suffer from deep vein thrombosis (DVT), with half of all cases being caused by long flights. Sitting immobile for long periods in a cramped position is not natural for the body, and blood clots start to form in the bent and motionless legs. These clots can grow to dangerous proportions, pass through the blood stream and block a main vein or artery, causing a heart attack or a stroke.

The highest risk group is the one that is at risk for DVT anyway – pregnant women, heart patients, people who are overweight or have high cholesterol, vascular diseases or diabetes.

Of the two million people who develop DVT each year, some 2,000 die.

Flight-related DVT could be prevented if only sitting on the plane were not so cramped. One way of doing this is, of course, to increase the space between the rows of seats. But this would reduce the number of seats on the plane, which is not about to happen anytime soon.

Another possibility, which may be cheaper and more realistic, has been proposed by Arnold Jonas, an Israeli who has designed an airplane seat specifically to prevent DVT. The chair, called Newsit (www.newsit.org), has two positions: normal, and with the front section raised to support the legs. Switching between the two positions, in a rocking chair motion, allows free movement of the legs and prevents the formation of blood clots.

The Newsit chair is not only healthier, it is also very comfortable, easier to sleep in, and prevents the discomfort that tall people suffer on flights due to lack of leg room. A study at the University of California found that participants who sat in the seat under conditions as close as possible to those of a flight, including eating and drinking while in the seat, reported that the Newsit is more comfortable than a regular chair.

Jonas recently took out a U.S. patent on his design and is currently in contact with several airplane seat manufacturers regarding the production of the Newsit. A number of airlines have also shown their interest in his invention.

If the airlines continue to look only at their bottom line and stick with the current less comfortable and less healthy seats, DVT can still be prevented by getting up periodically during a long flight to stretch your legs and keep the blood flowing properly.

NOW, MORE THAN EVER!

Sun sportswriter revisits world of thoroughbred racing

By HARLAN C. ABBEY
Special to The CJN

Laura Hillenbrand's book Seabiscuit has been on best-seller lists for three years and has been made into an Academy Award-nominated movie.

Toronto Sun sportswriter Perry Lefko isn't even dreaming of similar success for Thoroughbred Racing's Greatest Day, his second book about the Breeders' Cup, the Super Bowl of North American horse racing.

"Laura's book was not only about a rags-to-riches race horse," he said in a recent telephone interview."It was also about a special time in history. And it took up four full years of her life."

Lefko, who covered horse racing for the Sun from 1987 to 1994 and now reports on the Canadian Football League, said it took him two years to write his latest book, which updates his previous one on the Breeders' Cup, titled The Breeders' Cup: The Greatest Show on Turf. He was encouraged by his literary agent, Arnold Gosewich.

His new book marks the 20th anniversary of the cup, which has been renamed the World Thoroughbred Championships.

Lefko, 43, became a newspaperman through his friendship with Lorne Sokol, whose father Al was considered the dean of amateur and Olympic sportswriters during his career at the Toronto Star. Lefko, the son of Lou and Myrna Lefko, attended Camp Northland with Lorne.

"Al befriended me when I joined the Sun in 1985 and began covering amateur and Olympic sports shortly after, even though we worked for rival papers," Lefko recalled. "He introduced me to everyone. He was one of the kindest writers to those he wrote about, and I tried to emulate him and still do. He's my writing idol."

Lefko said he covered Canadian racing during one of its best periods.

"It was when Sam Son and Kinghaven Farms were making inroads in North America and not just Ontario. Play The King was second in the Breeders' Cup Sprint in 1988 and another Kinghaven horse, With Approval, was second in the Breeders' Cup Turf in 1990. Then Sam Son's Dance Smartly became the first Canadian Breeders' Cup winner when she took the Distaff [a race for female horses] in 1991," Lefko recalled.

"I think horse racing is the most unusual sport to cover in that it is a business that is covered in the sports section and it has more unusual characters and diversified personalities than any other sport.

"The jockeys and the horses are the only true athletes, and half of them don't talk! It takes a lot of understanding, and it's a world unto itself. But covering racing helped me to understand the physical aspects of an athlete, especially football injuries which occur to ligaments and tendons, just like with horses."

Lefko's new racing book covers the Breeders'Cup in chapters devoted to outstanding horses, owners, jockeys and trainers (including Hall of Famer Bobby Frankel, the son of kosher caterers in New York).

In the book, he explains how the 1996 cup almost didn't come to Woodbine because of a threatened strike by mutual clerks.

That was the year Ricks Natural Star, a hopelessly outclassed horse from out West, was entered (at a cost of $40,000) by his odd-ball owner-trainer, a veterinarian. The horse had earned $6,093 in two wins in 23 starts up to that point, but was eligible to run according to the rules, which have since been changed. Lefko gives a lot of credit to jockey Lisa McFarland for not interfering with the race's real contenders and making sure the ill-conditioned horse wasn't physically harmed.

"That chapter could have been a book by itself," Lefko said.

The author also covers the cup "pick six" betting bonanza by a group of TV workers, in which a $20 investment returned more than $250,000, and also has some interesting new material on the "fix six" scandal of 2002.

Lefko said he did place a few bets during his days at the racetrack, and his biggest score came when Arcangues, at $269.20 for $2, won the 1991 Breeders' Cup Classic.

"I didn't pick him. I liked Bobby Frankel's three-horse entry, so I played them in an exacta with every other horse in the race. That's when I learned about something at American race tracks called the Withholding Tax."

Lefko and his wife Jane are the parents of Ben, 11, and Shayna, 10, "both of whom will be better writers than I am," according to their proud father.

Lefko's three non-racing books are about quarterback Doug Flutie – "before he went to the Buffalo Bills" – pro wrestler Bret Hart and – his most successful – the late Sandra Schmirler, skip of Canada's 1998 Olympic gold medal curling team, who died in 2000.

"I visited Sandra when she was in remission, less than two months before she died, to talk about a book about her," he recalled. "When she died, I asked her family for permission to go ahead with the project, and they were gracious and extremely generous in providing me with some private journals Sandra had kept, which became her voice in the book.

"Of all the books I've done so far, this is by far the one that means the most to me… because Sandra Schmirler and her family epitomized class and dignity, which too often is lacking in sports these days.

"Her family wanted me to pursue it, it became a national best-seller and CBC has an option on it for a feature film," he said.

As for Thoroughbred Racing's Greatest Day rivalling Seabiscuit in acclaim or royalties, Lefko just hopes that "when someone finishes the book, they'll say 'He did a good job.'"

Israel turns to youth for Paralympic Games

By JONATHAN LIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has been losing its standing as a major force in the world of disabled sports in recent years.

After their rehabilitation, disabled Israel Defence Forces veterans chalked up numerous successes for the country in the 1970s and 1980s, and several became Paralympic Games champions.

Recently, however, the number of medals garnered by Israel has dropped dramatically: Israelis won 45 medals at the 1988 Seoul Games, but the number plummeted to six in Sydney in 2000.

During this period, the attitude toward disabled sports underwent a revolution in many countries, as authorities began to view them in professional terms rather than as part of the rehabilitation process. Countries began training disabled athletes at a young age, and the system of classifying athletes at the Olympics was altered, resulting in fewer events.

Still, some 70 per cent of Israel's Olympics delegation to Athens this year is comprised of disabled IDF veterans.

In an attempt to compete with the rest of the world, the Israel Sports Association for the Disabled is trying to locate and train children and teenagers who were born disabled or were injured in terror attacks.

"Until now, disabled sports in Israel has revolved around disabled IDF veterans," says Dr. Ron Bolotin, a senior official in the disabled sports association and one of the heads of Israel's Olympics delegation.

"If you want to cultivate athletes who can compete at the highest levels, you have to start training them when they are still children," says Bolotin, a disabled veteran who has competed as a swimmer in the last six Olympics.

BURNING THE CHAMETZ: An old man in Jerusalem observes the ancient tradition of burning his leftover chametz before the start of Passover. [Israel photo]

Sweet Potato Salad w/Orange-Maple Dressing

Dressing: 1/4 cup olive oil
2 tblsp. pure maple syrup
2 tblsp. orange juice
2 tblsp. balsamic vinegar
1 tblsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. minced peeled fresh ginger
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp. ground nutmeg

Whisk all ingredients to blend in small bowl. Season dressing to taste with salt and pepper.

Salad: 6 lbs. sweet potatoes peeled, cut into 3/4" cubes
1 cup chopped green onions
1 cup chopped fresh parsley
1 cup pecans, toasted, coarsely chopped
1/2 cup each brown & golden raisins

Microwave sweet potatoes until tender. Transfer to large bowl. Cool to room temperature. Add green onions, parsley, pecans, and raisins. Pour dressing over; toss gently to blend. Season salad to taste with salt and pepper.

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

When I was in my 20s, I produced a TV series about the Jewish past, present and future. A major component of the show was interviews with Holocaust survivors. One day, I was at a party with a bunch of non-Jewish young adults who grew up in Toronto without many Jewish friends. One of them heard me talking about my series and approached me.

"Why do you keep talking about the Holocaust?" he asked. "It happened so many years ago. Don't you think it is time to stop talking about the past?"

His comment caught me totally off-guard, but I could tell he meant no harm. He simply didn't understand. I tried to explain.

"People forget when we stop talking about the past. Six million Jews died less than 60 years ago. I have friends whose grandparents and parents are Holocaust survivors and the time to hear their stories first-hand is now. We have to remember the past to avoid these atrocities from repeating in the future."

Back then, I thought remembering would be enough.

Fast forward a few years to today. I am now in my 30s living in a world full of anti-Semitism. Statistics back up the fact anti-Semitism is on the rise. B'nai Brith Canada reported a 27 per cent jump in anti-Semitic incidents last year.

When newspaper headlines read, "Biggest wave of hatred toward Jews since Holocaust," we need to take a stand. Catastrophes such as overturned headstones, swastikas spray-painted on shuls, cars and survivors' front doors, and graffiti on university campuses must end.

Anti-Semitism in Toronto has become such an issue these days that rallies are being organized to raise awareness and to protest recent incidents. Events like this display solidarity and make us stronger. It shows we will not tolerate hate crimes.

I realize we have to do more than remember the past – we have to vigorously prevent the horrors of the Holocaust from happening again and to stop the hate crimes that are happening in our own backyard.

It is no longer enough to passively remember the Holocaust. We have to make our voices heard and be active in our community. We must be vigilant defenders and help bring those who commit crimes to justice.

On this Yom Hashoah, we should remember those who died, those who suffered and those who fought. But we should also remember that the Holocaust is a testament to the strength of the Jewish people. We will not tolerate anti-Semitism on any level, ever.

A sunny day in Auschwitz

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

It was a cool spring day, and the sunlight shone kindly down on Auschwitz. Beyond the barbed wire, villagers walked briskly to church in their Sunday finest.

Eva walked in queue with the other women and children toward "the showers," a place the adults knew was the gas chamber. They were 200 metres away.

A beautiful, young Hungarian Jewess took a rebellious step sideways, and the guards yelled, "Keep the line straight."

Eva considered the peculiarity of the guards' demand while people walked to their death. It was exaggerated and reminded her of the chastising she had received from her German music professor in Budapest for scratching her nose during her finest piano recital ever. "What a strange culture," she thought.

Eva felt a tap on her arm. She looked down and saw the cherubic face of a most dishevelled little boy. He didn't want to be alone in Auschwitz.

"Have you ever wanted to fly like a bird?" Eva asked in Yiddish.

The little boy looked up at the hideously gaunt woman. He nodded his head and said, "I've always wanted wings, but never knew how to get them." Eva hid her giggle.

"Here's what you do," she replied. "When you're in the shower and it starts getting hard to breathe – you know like when your head is stuck in a pillow – take the biggest breath you can [she showed him], and soon afterwards you will find your wings. Okay?"

The little boy assured her with an impish wink he would do just that. They were 100 metres away from the showers.

Eva lifted her eyes up to the sun and remembered the warm waters of the Danube flowing through her toes. She could hear her mother's and sister's embarrassingly loud laughter as they splashed about in the waves. Her father's dignified and splendid face appeared to her and she smelled the familiar aroma of vanilla and cinnamon on his hands. His fingers touched her face.

"Eva," the baker said to his daughter, "one day when you need to be protected and I cannot be there to help, promise me you will say the words of the Shema in my place."

The proud daughter promised the noble man, and kissed his hands.

The shower was 50 metres away. The little boy squeezed Eva's hand. She knelt down so as to become small and caressed his muddied forehead. "Vos is dine nomin? What is your name?" she asked.

"Sol," the little Jewish boy replied.

"Well Sol, pleased to meet you. My name is Eva and I'm happy to be your friend."

Sol seemed quite pleased to have made a new friend and skipped and hopped, quite undisciplined, in and out of the line. The guards missed Sol's outburst.

They reached the showers. Eva directed Sol inside and turned for a moment searching for a glimpse of feminine humanity in the eyes of the guard. The doors closed and women cried. The air became thinner and Sol breathed as hard as he could. Eva raised her head and sang – "Shemah Yisrael HaShem Elokeinu HaShem Echad."

The doors swung open and Eva glided out into the fresh air. Sol flew by her at top speed and shouted to his new friend that he had followed her instructions and found his wings.

"Wow, Sol. You look like you've been flying forever," she yelled back.

A peacefulness began to settle into Eva's soul. She flew past the showers, the barracks and the train tracks and saw everyone who had ever come to Auschwitz and their lives before. Eva sobbed for the Jewish people. She cried for humanity and she roared furiously – "I know we can do better."

Her spirit rose above Auschwitz. It had done so in life and it did so in death.

It was a sunny day in Auschwitz and children played beyond the barbed wire.

UTT students cope with firebombing

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Grade 4 student Esther Abikhzer said she felt sad and a little scared returning to United Talmud Torahs (UTT) and finding the library where she had spent many happy hours just an empty shell.

"Maybe it could happen again," she said as she sat in the gymnasium with her classmate Gabriella Tapiro. Gabriella, the more talkative of the two, wondered why it happened at their school and not somewhere else.

She had gone by the school soon after the firebombing April 5 and was surprised to see the broken windows and burnt debris thrown outside.

"I did a lot of good projects there," Gabriella said. "I like spending time there reading and doing things. I don't know why they hit on books and not something else.

"I'm proud so many people around the world have given their support. I feel our school must be pretty important, but I'm still sorry this happened."

On this day, she and Esther went to see what was left of the room. It had been cleaned out, the windows were boarded and most of the smell was gone in time for the students' return to class after the Passover break. The school reopened as scheduled April 15.

Both girls said they felt better after seeing two security guards at the front door. The guards, from a private firm, were asking for photo identification and checking bags.

This level of security, paid for by FEDERATION CJA, was to continue for at least 10 days, not only at UTT, but at all Jewish schools, said FEDERATION CJA executive vice-president Danyael Cantor. After that, the community will assess the situation.

Group Co-founder Dies

TORONTO — Jack Stevens, co-founder of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims (CAJM), which promotes understanding between Jews and Muslims, died April 9 of cancer. "He was always ready to give voice to the vulnerable, whoever and wherever they might be" said Shahid Akhtar, a Pakistani Muslim who co-founded the group with Stevens, an Iraqi Jew, in 1996 when they were colleagues in the Ontario civil service.

WORLD

Teen Vandals Sentenced

BRATISLAVA, Slovakia — Three teenage boys convicted of vandalizing tombstones at a Jewish cemetery in a western Slovak city last year received suspended sentences. They were among six teens who damaged 22 tombstones at the cemetery in Puchov last fall. The other three could not be prosecuted because they were minors under age 15 at the time. Police said the acts were not racially motivated.

ADL Raps Carter

NEW YORK — The Anti-Defamation League criticized former U.S. president Jimmy Carter for his comments on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict earlier this month. The ADL said Carter's remarks to reporters, in which he criticized George W. Bush's administration for a lack of progress on the conflict and cited the Palestinian issue as a "prime source of animosity toward the United States," both "distort and oversimplify" U.S. policy. Carter also said the United States has been "exclusively committed to the policies of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Israel."

New Google 'Jew' Result

SAN FRANCISCO — A grassroots campaign is trying to alter results that led Google users to an anti-Semitic website when the word "Jew" was searched. Entering "Jew" on the Internet search engine now leads to a free encyclopedia that defines the word "Jew," not to Jewwatch.com, an anti-Semitic site that now comes up as the second item. The "Jewschool" blog, an interactive Web journal, launched the campaign, which asked organizations to link their sites to http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jew. Google officials said last week it can't deny users access because that would betray a vow to deliver unbiased information – no matter how it detests the site's message. Google also posted an explanation of the results for the word "Jew," saying it does not endorse its search results.

BBC Head to Listen

LONDON — The new, Jewish chair of the BBC says the broadcaster will take complaints of anti-Israel bias seriously. Speaking to the Jewish Chronicle, Michael Grade said, "The BBC has an absolute duty to be impartial." He added, "It is my role to take complaints seriously and make sure any evidence provided is fair and sustainable." The BBC has been strongly criticized for alleged anti-Israel bias, so much so that Israel cut ties with it for a time.

Remarks Lead to Firing

MOSCOW — A local government official in Russia was fired after making anti-Semitic remarks about Russia's new prime minister. Vladimir Torbokov, deputy prime minister in charge of social issues in the eastern Russian region of Altai, was fired April 5, soon after the local Postscriptum newspaper published his remarks about Mikhail Fradkov. "What kind of need is there in a country like Russia to bring in some barely known person from abroad for a government post, and an ethnic Jew at that?" Torbokov asked of Fradkov, who was Russia's envoy to the European Union before President Vladimir Putin picked him as prime minister last month. Fradkov, who Jewish leaders believe had a Jewish father, appears to be a practising Orthodox Christian.

Peace Concert

NEW YORK — Israeli musician David Broza and American singer Patti Smith headlined a benefit concert in New York last week for groups of Israelis and Palestinians whose relatives have died in ongoing Mideast violence. Some 1,000 people attended the event for the Parents Circle and Families Forum, which was formed in 1995 by Yitzhak Frankenthal, whose son was kidnapped and killed in 1994 by Hamas.

Hitler OK: Polish Pol

WARSAW — Polish firebrand Andrzej Lepper, whose nationalist Self-Defence party tops opinion polls, was quoted last week as saying he believed Adolf Hitler's early policies were good. "At the beginning..., Hitler had a really good program," Lepper told the Zycie Warszawy newspaper. "I don't know what happened to him later... who had such influence over him that he moved towards genocide." Lepper told Reuters the paper manipulated his comments. Surveys say one in three Poles could vote for Lepper in parliamentary elections due next year.

Citizenship Revoked

CAMDEN, N.J. — A U.S. federal judge has revoked the citizenship of a retired blueberry farmer because of his past as a Nazi guard during World War II. The U.S. Justice Department said Andrew Kuras, 81, served as a guard at three concentration camps in the 1940s. Officials said Kuras concealed his Nazi past when he entered the United States in 1951 and when he became a citizen 11 years later.

Justice Minister heartened by multi-faith event

Temple, mosque give joint donation to rebuild Montreal library

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Thornhill's Temple Har Zion and its neighbour the Ja'ffari Islamic Centre share more than a driveway – they share a vision and represent a model to aspire to, both here and abroad, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler told a multi-faith audience last Thursday morning at the temple.

Cotler was in town to address members and guests of Mosaic, an interfaith group of clergy and lay leaders representing seven religions: Judaism, Christianity, Islam, Buddhism, Zoroastrianism, Sikhism and Hinduism.

After Cotler's talk on issues related to recent hate crimes, Ron Smith, president of Har Zion, and Nazir Gulamhusein, president of the Ja'ffari Islamic Centre, presented a $500 cheque to Dena Libman of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, adding to its fund for Montreal's United Talmud Torahs (UTT) elementary school, whose library was firebombed just before Passover. An equivalent cheque was given to Karrar Naqui of the Al Mahdi Islamic Centre in Pickering, which was the target of hate-related arson last month.

"I find it very encouraging, what's happened here today," Cotler said.

Following an earlier spate of anti-Semitic attacks in and near Thornhill, Elinor Caplan – who represents the riding as an MP and who attended the event with local councillor Susan Kadis – had asked Cotler in the House of Commons what the government was going to do about racist hate crimes in Canada, he recalled.

Such crimes constitute "an assault on the inherent dignity and worth of every human being" as well as on the nature of Canada as

Finance for Thought

The Fundamentals

S. Jonathan Kirshblum,
B.A., CFP, FMA, FCSI
Financial Planner
Investment Advisor

Three years ago, a financial conference was held for 25 investment advisors from Canada and I was privileged to be part of this group. Each day of the 3-day retreat focused on a different theme. Day one was a study of the four fundamentals of prudent investing. Day two centered on gaining an in depth understanding of why the majority of individual investors routinely break most of the rules reviewed in day one. I'll come to Day 3 later.

What are the four fundamentals of prudent investing? Asset allocation, manager diversification, portfolio rebalancing, and capital preservation.

Asset Allocation is a strategy that promotes investing in a variety of assets, such as stocks, bonds, cash equivalents, etc., to reduce overall portfolio risk. Just as we know the road to healthy eating is rooted in a balanced diet that draws from all the food groups, so too does a healthy investment strategy require a properly diversified portfolio. While the short term results of a lack of balance can be positive, in the long term too much focus on one group may yield weight gain and portfolio loss.

Manager Diversification tells us to extend the principle of "Don't put all our eggs in one basket" beyond asset mix to the professionals who manage our investments. Just as it is risky to rely on one type of investment to deliver consistent results, so too must we avoid relying exclusively on one money manager to track the complex workings of all of the markets.

Portfolio Rebalancing Our financial investments are not our children; our commitment to them is not unconditional. Even the most well-constructed and diversified portfolio requires a rebalancing strategy to eliminate risks associated with price changes. For example, think of the unusual growth of technology stocks in the late 1990's. While soaring stock prices gave investors reason to rejoice, it was also a time when profits should have been protected through appropriate selling programs.

Capital Preservation Bottom line: be risk averse. One of the reasons no one likes market declines is because it is much more difficult to recover losses than it is to create new gains. A drop of 20 cents from a dollar invested (a 20% loss) requires a 25% gain to return to even. In plain English, this translates to: "let's make the most we can over the long-term with the least amount of risk."

There you have it, the four basics of investing. Seems pretty straightforward. So why have individual investors frequently found it difficult to adhere to these principles? No doubt, investors and brokers alike have found it difficult to maintain the discipline necessary to buy low and sell high, but the answer is not this simple.

One issue is the advisory services that have traditionally been used by the average individual investor in Canada. While stockbrokers typically offer expertise in the area of security selection, a financial planner's training makes him or her more adept at addressing asset allocation. Since asset allocation is considered to be the most important determinant of portfolio performance, it stands to reason we should seek counsel from a professional specifically trained in this area.

Working with one stockbroker to direct our investments also ignores the principle of manager diversification. It might seem like a reasonable solution to hire many stockbrokers to guide our investments, but such a strategy would require a co-ordination and integration effort, likely to produce ineffective results.

Another concern is the conventional products many of us have grown accustomed to having in our portfolios. Mutual funds are a perfect example. While they address the issue of manager diversification, there are now so many mutual funds available (indeed in the United States there are now more mutual funds than stocks), it would take a team of experts just to review all of the data on each of these funds before they could even begin trying to construct a well-diversified portfolio.

Perhaps the most significant issue is the lack of access individual investors have had to investment strategies and services that for years have been reserved for large institutional investors and pension funds. Times have changed. A whole host of new investment opportunities and paragrams previously beyond the reach of the average individual investor are now available. The playing field has been leveled. This was the focus of Day 3 of the conference I referred to above and will be the focus of part 2 of this column.

This is the first in a series of 4 columns Nesbitt Burns' has sponsored as part of our commitment to the education process inherent in making investment decisions. Part 2 of Jonathan's "Finance for Thought" will appear in the May 6, 2004 issue of the CJN.

Large coincidences of life

From the editor's desk

One never knows what results will flow from the coincidences in our lives. Indeed, one never knows whether they were coincidences at all.

* * *

In the lush, verdant Hulah Valley in the Upper Galilee panhandle of Israel, across the road from Kfar Blum, is a kibbutz called Sdeh Nehemiah. The wooden clogs that still decorate some of the patio porches of the pied-a-terre kibbutz homes are quaint reminders that many of the founding pioneers of the community were Jews from Holland who came there in the early 1930s.

One such pioneer was Yitzhak Pimentel, a tall, elegant man of high culture, broad learning and strong convictions. The Pimentels were Sephardi Jews who could trace their ancestry to the Inquisition-inspired flight from Portugal some four centuries earlier.

In Amsterdam, these Portuguese Jews maintained their traditions and customs with great pride. Their heritage was to their identity what the rainfall in spring is to flowers. The one could not exist without the other.

Yitzhak's father had hoped his son would become an accountant and settle down to a meaningful, Jewish family life in Amsterdam. But young, headstrong Yitzhak – Dorus, as he was known in Dutch – had other aspirations.

He was an ardent Zionist.

He wanted to help reshape Jewish destiny and direct the new Jewish history unfolding in the ancient homeland. The idea of Jews returning to Zion was a dream and an ideal that stirred his soul. So he emigrated to Mandatory Palestine in 1930 and ultimately to the kibbutz that would be his home.

Some four decades later, in the summer of 1971, he taught Hebrew in an ulpan in the northern border town of Kiryat Shmonah to a group of university graduates from North America, volunteers in a program called sherut la'am.

Yitzhak was beloved beyond words by his students. A superb pedagogue and a superb human being, he combined both excellences into scintillating learning experiences.

In the mid-1980s, nearly a decade and a half later, Pimentel visited Toronto. He stayed at the home of his younger cousin Tilly Bueno de Mesquita.

Tilly survived World War II in hiding in her native Amsterdam. In 1946, she married a Canadian soldier from Toronto, Lester Sugarman, who was among the allied forces that liberated Amsterdam from the Nazis.

I first met Tilly in the mid-1980s when she, along with her husband and her cousin, my teacher Yitzhak, came to my home on Shabbat. We have remained friends ever since.

Tilly Sugarman-Bueno de Mesquita

On Sunday, I attended the launch of Tilly's book A Safe Haven: Hidden Children in Nazi-Occupied Holland (Bueno Press).

Ostensibly written for children, this small, endearing book tells the true tale of how three girls were hidden and survived due to the unsurpassing generosity and bravery of a single family. It captures the detail of that extraordinary time and place.

Tilly writes in an easy and casual manner, with a marked sense both of irony and humour, typically appealing to younger readers.

But the book, of course, is not only for children. It is a parable aimed at adults as well. And many of the key reminiscences, such as when she writes of her feelings surrounding her liberation from the Nazis, make this evident.

As Tilly herself has said about the book, "It is a story of love and hope."

And because of this one fact alone, it is important for parents to obtain Safe Haven for their children, and of course, to read it themselves.

I have always been grateful for the coincidence that placed me in Yitzhak's Hebrew class and made him my teacher. For many good things happened as a result, one of them being my friendship with the remarkable Tilly Sugarman-Bueno de Mesquita.

Another local Toronto artist who deserves a great deal of credit is mezzo-soprano Renée Barda. She has just recently issued a CD called Posterity: Timeless World Music.

The 12 items on the CD, half of which are from the world of opera and the other half from Broadway and popular music provide a warm, endearing listening experience for any devotee of fine song. Barda's skills are considerable and they are well showcased on the CD.

She will be the subject of an upcoming television program Second Chance: Making it Work, which airs on Global Prime Television on Thursday, April 22 at 10:30 a.m. and again on Saturday, April 24 at 9:30 p.m. Readers are advised to check local listings.

Toronto Jews gather to mark Yom Hashoah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A community-wide commemoration such as Sunday's Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah is the answer to anyone who wishes to eliminate the Jewish people, said Ya'acov Brosh, consul general of Israel to Toronto.

Speaking immediately following a candle-lighting ceremony in memory of the six million Jews who died in the Holocaust, Brosh said that as a representative of Israel, "I swear that this phenomenon will never be seen again.

"Israel will do whatever it can to prevent it. They will never succeed and we will ensure that they never start," he said.

The commemoration, held under a tent at Earl Bales Park, featured a dramatic presentation by the students of CHAT Richmond Hill; a reading of the names of loved ones who died in the Holocaust; a March on the Colours by General Wingate Branch 256 Royal Canadian Legion and Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Toronto post; as well as poetry readings and songs. Brosh presented a Righteous Among the Nations medal posthumously to Johan and Johanna Boeltjes, who were arrested in Holland in 1943 after it was discovered that they had been hiding two Jewish men.

Johan Boeltjes died in Dachau, and Johanna eventually followed her son to Toronto, where she died in 1959.

Accepting the medal for his parents, John Boeltjes, overcome with emotion, said his father had much inner joy.

"True joy is demonstrated in the caring for others, and true joy and sacrifice cannot be separated."

Judy Cohen, who was born in Hungary and survived Bergen-Belsen, Achersleben-Junkers' slave labour camp and a forced death march before she was liberated by the U.S. army at age 16, said we must not forget that silence can incubate malevolence.

"Never should we forget the injustice and the intolerance. It is our moral obligation to pass our knowledge on to subsequent generations. We must never forget to remember."

Shauna Waltman, a past participant in the International March of the Living, has since travelled to several other places of historical Jewish interest across Europe, including Holland, Austria, Germany, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Denmark, Italy and Lithuania.

She said a connection to the past is what holds us to the future.

"Yom Hashoah is a day to remind us of the price we pay for silence. It is a day to recognize the significance of Israel, and to remember that a threat to Israel's existence is a threat to our own.

"Today we have much to mourn, but we also have much [of which] to be proud," she said.

Rabbi Martin Berman of Shaar Shalom Synagogue recited Psalm 118, Rabbi Moshe Stern of Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue recited verses from Ezekiel and Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple sang Zog Nit Keynmol.

The ceremony included a rendition of Kel Malei Rachamim by Cantor Louis Danto of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Kaddish by Arnold Friedman and the blowing of the shofar by Marty Spring. It closed with the singing of Hatikvah by Hillel of Greater Toronto and March of the Living participants.

Community seeks provincial funds for security

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish community representatives met with senior Ontario lawmakers last week in a bid to elicit provincial support for enhanced security measures at Jewish schools.

The meeting with Attorney General Michael Bryant and Minister of Community Safety and Correctional Services Monte Kwinter was "excellent," said Bernie Farber, executive-director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. The ministers and their senior staffs were receptive to the delegation's contention that the Jewish community requires provincial assistance to protect Jewish schools from the current spate of anti-Semitism, he said.

The ministers assured the community leaders, which included incoming Congress president Ed Morgan and representatives of UJA Federation, that they would take their case to cabinet, which will consider providing assistance to the community to increase security measures at the schools. A follow-up meeting with the ministers is expected in the near future, Farber added.

"The commitment we received is one we haven't received before, to bring it to cabinet," Farber said. "We wanted to make sure [concern over anti-Semitism] was number one on their radar screen… They fully understood our issues."

Speaking to the media following the meeting, Bryant said, "We had a very productive meeting to discuss particularly sensitive areas. This is part of an ongoing conversation we've been having since we formed the government to ensure we're putting the right resources in the right places.

"This government firmly believes that no one deserves to live in fear. We will do everything we can to end this campaign of hate, through the justice system and through every part of government."

The meeting came shortly after the school library at a branch of United Talmud Torahs in Montreal was set ablaze by arsonists, who left a note saying the fire was in retribution for Israel's killing of Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin.

As well, two more Jewish cemeteries – one in Toronto, the other in Kitchener – were vandalized, with headstones turned over. Those incidents came on the heels of vandalism incidents at Bathurst Lawn Memorial Cemetery in Toronto and the Beth David Cemetery in Brantford, Ont. In addition, homes in the Toronto area have been smeared with swastikas and graffiti, a synagogue and school had windows broken and fundraising signs were defaced.

Farber said protecting students in Jewish schools was the community's top priority and should also be so for the provincial government. Public schools in high-crime areas already have surveillance cameras and other measures in place to protect students. Jewish schools have the right to the same protections, he said.

The Montreal incident "was a second wake-up call" following incidents of vandalism in Ontario, Farber said. "It demonstrated that these attacks could progress to be a huge danger to the community."

He noted that four Jewish cemeteries in Ontario had been desecrated in just four weeks, while he could recall only three similar incidents in his 20 years with Congress.

Prior to the recent surge in occurrences, B'nai Brith Canada reported in its annual Audit of Antisemitic Incidents that there had been a sharp rise in anti-Semitism over the last three years. A total of 584 incidents were reported across Canada in 2003, an increase of 27 per cent over the year before. Four hundred of the incidents took place in Ontario, and of that number, 315 occurred in the Greater Toronto Area.

At Pape Avenue and Gerrard Street in the east end of Toronto, vandals also overturned nine headstones at the 150-year-old Pape Avenue Cemetery over Passover. Because of the cemetery's age, many of the headstones are fragile, said Benjamin Applebaum, executive director of Holy Blossom Temple, which operates the cemetery. They are also generally not as bulky as modern ones and several of the toppled stones were cracked.

"We have to figure out how to repair it," he said.

Even though earlier incidents of cemetery desecrations had been reported, "it's always a shock. It's very discouraging and unsettling when something like this happens."

Applebaum said the cemetery, which was filled to capacity in the 1930s, is surrounded almost entirely by barbed-wire topped fencing. It appears that the perpetrators jumped a fence at the groundskeeper's home and another fence to get into the cemetery. Holy Blossom plans to upgrade security in those areas, he added.

In Kitchener, meanwhile, 12 headstones were knocked to the ground over Passover at the Beth Jacob Cemetery, said Gordon Strauss, president of the Beth Jacob Synagogue.

An anonymous former resident of Kitchener, the son of Holocaust survivors, offered a $10,000 reward for information regarding the crime, but as of last week, the police had no leads, Strauss said.

The incident was "very upsetting" to the 120-family congregation, he said. The headstones, which were otherwise undamaged, have been righted.

The cemetery, which is more than 80 years old, is in the centre of town and is surrounded almost completely by a wrought iron fence. The congregation is now considering improving security, he added.

"The fact it happened during the Jewish holidays, right after Good Friday, with [Mel Gibson's] movie [The Passion of the Christ] going on… Who the hell knows [why it happened]?

"I hope it's not a hate crime," Strauss added, though he pointed out the Waterloo Regional Police hate crime unit is involved in the investigation.

Local Christian and Muslim leaders denounced the vandalism and offered moral support to the Jewish community, Canadian Press reported.

Meanwhile in Montreal, government house Leader Jacques Saada disclosed that he handed over to the RCMP at least one of a number of hostile letters he has received attacking him as a Jew. The most recent came earlier this year.

Saada, MP for Brossard-La Prairie, a riding on Montreal's South Shore, decided to go public about getting the letters as well as phone calls described as menacing, after the firebombing of a United Talmud Torahs school in Montreal, his press secretary Marie-Claude Lavigne said.

She described one letter in January as "pure hatred," but not necessarily a death threat.

Cotler visits interfaith group of clergy, lay leaders a democratic, multi-cultural society, said Cotler, who is a UTT alumnus.

Caplan's question was the trigger for his invitation to other MPs to join him in unequivocal condemnation of hate crimes and anti-Semitism – a motion that was adopted unanimously, he said. "We will not be silent. We will speak, and we will act."

Hate crimes have been unequivocally condemned at all political levels in Canada – federal, provincial and municipal, Cotler noted. "There will be no sanctuary for hate in this country."

The meeting at Har Zion, which was followed by a group visit to the Ja'ffari Islamic Centre, represents "the voice and vision of civil society, and a common front against racism," Cotler said, noting that a similar multifaith meeting took place in Montreal the previous week.

Referring to the Holocaust and more recent atrocities in Rwanda and the Balkans, Cotler said, "we have to understand the dangers that are posed by hate speech and hate crimes."

'We have to understand dangers posed by hate speech'

He vowed to bring to bear "the full panoply of legal remedies" upon the perpetrators of hate crimes. "Canada has developed the most comprehensive legal regime in the world to combat hate speech," he noted, citing provisions for sentence enhancement when offences are motivated by hate or bias.

But Canada also needs to create understanding, particularly among young people, about human rights, multiculturalism and democracy, he said.

Har Zion's Rabbi Michael Stroh, who co-founded Mosaic almost 25 years ago, offered the wish that every country would have clergy and congregants who would follow the lead of participants at last week's event, coming together "for the purpose of protecting each other from extremists and those bent on destruction."

Arieh Cohen, co-chair of Mosaic, said that, beginning in May, representatives of the seven religions will be visiting schools to teach children about tolerance.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

We who were born less than 56 years ago are too young to understand, let alone appreciate, the poignancy of the existence of a sovereign Jewish state. The atrocities and persecution that our forbears saw with their own eyes, we have only seen on reels of film or on the pages of history books. The helplessness they felt deep in their hearts at every turn and crossroads along the tear-stained path of vulnerable exile, we have only felt in empathy.

Such is the nature of a timeless chain of peoplehood that not all the links are forged in the same fiery furnace.

With the presence of the State of Israel on the roster of nations, we are privileged to live in a new norm of Jewish and world history, though many of us, alas, hardly know it. Ironically, that cannot be said for a great many non-Jews who recoil at the very thought, who cannot abide the very notion of, a sovereign Jewish presence in a Muslim Middle East.

In the 21st century, with mankind pushing into the vast frontiers of space or exploring the infinitesimally tiny, microscopic structures of sub-molecular particles, it is hard to believe, though not too unbelievable to be true, that there are individuals, groups and even nation-states determined to destroy the Jewish state. In all these years, they have never advanced past their hatred.

Where Arab armies have failed to defeat the Jewish state, there has now arisen a ghoulish agglomeration of dark forces – including Al Qaeda, Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, Iran and others – who are dedicated to putting an end to Israel.

Some people blame Israel for the hatred, pointing to the 37-year occupation of the disputed territories as the hatred's root cause. To be sure, there can be no doubt that the occupation, especially in the past 3½ years has been harsh and humiliating. But the finger-pointing at Israel is as disingenuous as it is misdirected. For it ignores the facts: the hatred long preceded the occupation; for more than a decade, Israel has tried to negotiate an end to the occupation; the harshness of the occupation is in direct response to the terrorism directed at Israelis; the Palestinian leadership has thus far refused to take any steps to end the terrorism and – almost always omitted in the commentaries of the pundits – all the members of the dark forces are utterly and totally opposed to the existence of a sovereign Jewish state. For them, the occupation did not begin in June 1967. It began 56 years ago, on the first Yom Ha'atzmaut in May 1948.

Thus, it falls now to us, who were born less than 56 years ago, to oppose the dark forces. The new norm of Jewish history should not inure us to the wonder and the awe of what was achieved by the previous generation. Rather, it should inspire us to stand in their footsteps, strong and resolute, alongside and in defence of the Jewish state.

Thank you God for having sustained us and brought us to this day.

Speak out with pride

The last few weeks have seen the occurrence of anti-Semitic incidents not seen for decades, if at all, in Toronto and Montreal. The responses have been the ususal rallies and denunciations. While these actions are commendable, will they be effective in preventing anti-Semitic actions in the future?

Anti-Semitic actions are neither new nor original. But history shows that anti-Semitism is always most prevalent and overt when Jews appear to be ashamed – ashamed to be Jews, ashamed of our religion, ashamed of our heritage, ashamed of our contribution to civilization, ashamed of our nation Israel, and, most of all, ashamed of our present.

How many of us apologize for Israel's actions rather than proudly proclaimig its achievements over a mere 56 years? How many of us do not speak up when we hear Jews, Judaism, or Israel being insulted? How many of us are embarrassed to practice our religion in the office or at school so that we do not appear "different," be it simply not attending on a Jewish holiday or eating only a salad at a business lunch?

Jews cannot expect others to respect us if we as a group do not respect ourselves. We should be proud to be Jewish. We should not apologize for our existence, justify it, nor petition for it. We should be neither meekly supplicatory or aggressively demanding, just proudly assertive.

We should speak out with pride.

It is essential for every organization and individual to stand up, declare pride in our religion, heritage, and the State of Israel, and act. We cannot leave it simply to the "professionals" or authorities to solve the problem.

Abandoning Jonathan Pollard

I am trying hard to contain my anger and disgust at the duplicity and inhuman behaviour of the Israeli government toward Jonathan Pollard, who sacrificed his freedom and youth to safeguard the security of all Israelis.

What image do we Jews present to the rest of the world, especially the United States, who see nothing but our self-abasement? The United States knows we know what they did and keep doing to Pollard. How they must disdain us.

Many years ago, during one of Ariel Sharon's visits to Toronto on a fundraising mission, he told me he couldn't do anything about the Pollard case, saying, "I am persona non grata in Washington." Well, he no longer is. What is his excuse now?

In 1967, we were respected and admired among the nations of the world. We knew how to act with self-respect, prudence and bravery.

After 19 years, it is time for the Jewish state and Jews worldwide to protest Pollard's discriminatory sentence and violation of his constitutional rights, and demand his immediate release.

That would go a long way to redeeming our self-respect and perhaps the respect of the international community.

Correcting an easy mistake

In "Peace needs a spritual component, panel says," (CJN, April 9), Yehezkel Landau is incorrectly identified as a former executive director of Peace Now. In fact, he is a spokesperson for Netivot Shalom, a religious peace movement in Israel. It was an easy mistake to make. Since he announced his unilateral disengagement plan, some Likudniks have even mistaken Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for a Peace Now disciple. We wish.

Liberal gov't and terrorism

A few weeks ago, despite Maha Elsamnah Khadr's stated support for Al Qaeda, the Canadian foreign affairs department facilitated her return and the return of her son Karim to Canada by issuing them one-way passports. It is unfortunate that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms makes it difficult to revoke Canadian citizenship and therefore provides a haven for terrorist supporters who have Canadian citizenship. What is even worse is that the Liberal government actively helped Khadr come to Canada.

Yet Canadian Jews remain steadfast in their support for our current Liberal government and its impotent terrorist fighting measures. If the Liberal party wants the support of the Jewish community in the upcoming election, the party had better begin cracking down on terrorists and terrorist supporters in Canada.

Canada is not America

In his column from Jerusalem ("Can Canada learn from Australia?" CJN, March 25), Gerald Steinberg contends that during the Chrétien era, Canadian foreign policy was essentially the opposite of that of the United States, or just plainly anti-American. I believe he is dead wrong. In its often misguided attempts to be a world player and exhibit fairness, Canada has frequently taken unfair or unsupportive positions on Israel, but that is neither anti-American nor anything new. It has been a fairly consistent position of many Canadian governments.

Canada also has had some important disputes with the United States on trade matters. Supporting our own domestic interests is not anti-Americanism. Clearly, what is on Steinberg's mind is our lack of support for U.S. President George W. Bush's war in Iraq.

I am a strong supporter of Israel and wish nothing but ill for Saddam Hussein, but he was no longer much of a threat to anyone but Iraqis. It seemed clear even last year that the U.S. administration was either mistaken or lying about the reasons for the war, and it was likely that liberating the Iraqis from their oppressor would be a costly and unappreciated act.

The United States would be doing very well if all governments were as anti-American as Canada's. If only we showed as much common sense on Middle Eastern affairs.

The Holocaust and the State of Israel

By ARIK BERGMAN

The first boatload of immigrants to the new State of Israel arrived on May 17, 1948, two days after the British forces left.
[Encyclopaedia Judaica photo]

The Holocaust was the systematic murder of six million Jews by the Nazis during World War II. The creation of the State of Israel saw the return of the Jewish people to their ancestral homeland and was the realization of the Zionist dream. The fact that these two events, among the most notable Jewish history, came within a few years of each other indicates that there is a link between them. The difficulty lies in assessing the importance of the Holocaust in the creation of the State of Israel.

In 1933, the year Adolf Hitler came to power, the Nazis, in agreements with leaders of the Zionist movement, established a policy that encouraged immigration to Palestine and thus served to strengthen the Jewish settlements there. By 1939, almost 150,000 Jews had left Germany for Palestine, and the Jewish population there grew to almost 500,000.

However, entrance to Palestine was highly restricted by the British White Paper of May 1939, which limited Jewish immigration to 75,000 over five years. This hampered Zionist efforts to strengthen the Jewish settlements in Palestine through immigration and left Europe's Jews vulnerable to Hitler's Final Solution.

By the end of 1941, German policy had firmly shifted away from encouraging Jewish emigration, and Jews could no longer leave German-occupied Europe. The genocide was beginning.

The Jews did not find many doors open to them, and as Christopher Sykes writes in Crossroads to Israel, "the hope of Zion was their only hope."

Illegal immigration of Jewish refugees to Palestine, continued, however, and became increasingly important in the development of the Jewish Yishuv.

The initial German encouragement of emigration followed by the escape from Europe and illegal entry into Palestine became consequences of the Holocaust that played a significant role in the founding of the State of Israel, because they provided the strength in numbers necessary to legitimize the Jewish presence in Palestine and, even more importantly, to defend the state when war broke out upon its founding.

Even before the Nazi policy of extermination became known, the Zionist goals and calls for homeland had become more urgent as the Jewish position in Europe deteriorated. In the past, some Zionist aims had been vague or tentative, but as the war progressed, it became evident that a forceful, more open approach was crucial.

In 1942, because of the war in Europe, it was impossible to hold a regular Zionist congress to establish policy. An extraordinary Zionist conference was held in New York's Biltmore Hotel, with representatives of different Zionist opinions, including, notably, Chaim Weizmann and David Ben-Gurion. Weizmann was intent on continuing to negotiate patiently with Britain to have the White Paper reversed. Ben-Gurion placed greater emphasis on the importance of a Jewish army, and according to Yehuda Bauer in From Diplomacy to Resistance, was advocating an "immediate transfer of millions of Jews… to Palestine."

At its conclusion, the conference announced the Biltmore Program, which called for the establishment of Palestine as a Jewish commonwealth and stated that the Jewish Agency should receive control over immigration and the building of Palestine. Shortly after the Biltmore Program was formulated, news of the Final Solution reached the Allies.

The Holocaust brought about a dramatic change in official Zionist policy. Sykes writes that there was a "connection between the tragedy overwhelming the Jews in Europe and the intensification, indeed the transformation of Zionism."

The policy shifted from one of gradual immigration and the eventual development of a Jewish national home with a Jewish majority, to one where Zionist demands were clear and forceful – maximalist Zionist goals, including statehood, were to be pursued. It had become a matter of survival.

The end of the war left thousands of Jewish survivors in Europe. As the horrors of the Holocaust came to light, one might have expected world opinion to rally behind the Zionist cause, but in Menachem Begin's view in The Revolt, the world was "largely indifferent to the shedding of Jewish blood."

The White Paper remained in effect throughout the war, and according to Michael Marrus in The Unwanted, "British policy hardened towards refugees attempting to enter Palestine." U.S. president Franklin D. Roosevelt expressed his "personal sympathy with the Jewish National Home," but instead of changing American immigration policies, his "sympathy" took the form of occasional attempts to pressure Britain to ease immigration to Palestine.

As the Jews in Palestine lost faith in the British, numerous Jewish resistance organizations began to operate against British targets. Britain sought United Nations intervention, and in May 1947, a more or less neutral investigative board was formed – the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP). Its purpose was primarily to assess the situation in Palestine and to propose a solution, but the committee was also instructed to examine the problem of the Holocaust survivors in Europe, and this issue played an important part in UNSCOP's eventual decision and suggestions.

Arab representatives boycotted the UNSCOP hearings, and according to historian Howard Sachar in A History of Israel, they threatened "bloodshed if Palestine were divided." This radical view only proved to the committee that it would be devastating to place the Jewish minority under Arab rule.

Further proof of Jewish desperation came in July 1947, when the ship Exodus-1947 arrived in Haifa, carrying 4,500 Jewish displaced persons. On attempting to board, the British encountered stiff resistance that led to the death of three Jews. The British ultimately seized control of the Exodus and sent it back to its port of origin in France. Refusing to disembark, the Jews were then taken to Germany. All these events were broadcast to Palestine and from there to the world.

This tragic episode presented Britain and its handling of Palestine in an increasingly negative light. For Zionism, the affair "drew more sympathetic attention to the refugee problem in Europe than ever before," says Marrus in The Unwanted. UNSCOP described the episode as "the best possible evidence we can have" of the needs of the Jewish people.

The issue of the 250,000 Jewish displaced persons in Europe also greatly influenced UNSCOP's decision to end the British Mandate in Palestine and to partition the country. The partition plan was approved by the UN General Assembly on Nov. 29, 1947. The Americans and the Soviets voted in favour of partition, drawing a direct link between the Holocaust and their support for the plan. Andrei Gromyko, a Soviet official, was quoted as saying that "the denial of this right to the Jews [for a Jewish State] cannot be justified, especially if we take into account everything that the Jewish people underwent during the Second World War."

The Holocaust turned most Jews into Zionists, as they sought what has been called a Jewish "home for the homeless." This was especially true in America, where, according to Sachar, "the revelation of the death camps and the emergent plight of the refugees effectively transformed Zionism into the dominant mood."

Sachar adds that U.S. president Harry S. Truman said he had never seen "as much pressure and propaganda aimed at the White House," and later expressed his sympathy for the Jews, writing of his essential purpose to "rescue at least some of the victims of Nazism."

During the Holocaust, the Jews of Palestine were naturally willing to join the Allied war effort, and according to Sachar, by 1942, "11,000 Jews were serving with British forces [and]… 18,000 Palestine Jews were incorporated into purely Jewish battalions." The existence of this Jewish "army" was a product of the Holocaust, and these same soldiers were later directly involved in the creation of the State of Israel as they had to physically defend it in 1948.

The factors leading up to the creation of the state were summarized in the Proclamation of the State of Israel, and there is no doubt that the Holocaust did play a role. In the proclamation, Ben-Gurion said: "The Nazi Holocaust, which engulfed millions of Jews in Europe, proved anew the urgency of the re-establishment of the Jewish State, which would solve the problem of Jewish homelessness by opening the gates to all Jews."

It is evident that an intimate link exists between the Holocaust and the creation of the modern State of Israel. The degree of importance of the Holocaust, however, is often debated. An examination of history suggests that the creation of Israel involved the coming together of many different factors and events. One cannot necessarily say that Israel would not have been created without the Holocaust, as its role appears more catalytic than causal.

It is clear, however, that the Holocaust sped up the process by moving Zionist policy away from a gradualistic approach towards one calling for immediate and swift action. The Holocaust left thousands of Jewish people without a home and their destination of choice was Palestine. As the horrors of the Holocaust came to light, the world was forced to find a solution, thus bringing the Palestine problem to the forefront of the UN agenda. The Holocaust also rallied world Jewry behind the Zionist cause, which influenced the U.S. decision, to support a state. In addition, the Holocaust led to the formation of Jewish fighting units from Palestine who were later able to defend the new state.

It is difficult to find any good coming out of the genocide of the Holocaust. However, in that the Holocaust contributed to the creation of the State of Israel, it ensures what Jews and others have been able to say ever since: "Never again."

Israel bashing disguised as peace rally

It did not take very long before Arab fury over the killing of Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin spilled onto the streets of many North American cities. Community mobilization probably reached its peak on the weekend after the Yassin's demise, when remembrances of various sorts commanded public and media attention.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

In Hamilton, we were treated to a variation of the same old performance that we've seen so often before. The script usually runs like this:

First, identify a theme. For the last two years, it was the fabricated Jenin massacre. This year, the spotlight was, of course, on the pitiful image of a hunched quadriplegic in a wheelchair.

Second, to create the right bona fides for staging the demonstration, publicize the event as a "peace rally." After all, who could possibly quibble with the noble quest for peace?

Third, find an appropriate site for the gathering – preferably one that houses a Jewish, or better still, an Israeli, organization. In Hamilton, such a locale is easily identifiable and the same one is continually targeted. What the city authorities ought to be asking is why a "peace rally" by Palestinians needs a Jewish institution as its focal point. This question is never addressed.

Fourthly, make sure that the visuals are bold and provocative. This year, the juxtaposition of large posters of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, labelled a "war criminal," and the hapless, now dead Yassin created just the sort of melodramatic mendacity that the media loves to highlight. To augment the placards, there need to be catchy slogans, chanted with an adequate mix of force and pathos. This year's choice was "Why, why do so many children have to die? Why, why do so many mothers have to cry?" Why indeed? Who are the suicide bombers and whose children are being murdered? Are such questions of any relevance in this setting? Apparently not.

Fifthly, it is always helpful to have the essential message of the rally delivered by a recognized community leader. At the Hamilton event, the president of the local Muslim association lent his support. He spoke not of a rational vision for peace, but instead called on Canada and the international community to impose economic sanctions on Israel, likening Sharon's government to the former apartheid regime in South Africa, and proposing that it be dealt with in the same way.

It is beyond absurd to even suggest that protests such as the one that occurred last month in Hamilton could be construed as promoting peace. Equally incongruous is the reluctance of the media and the community at large to recognize that these rallies serve no less a purpose than to provide a platform for those who seek to delegitimize Israel and demonize Jews everywhere.

When the sirens wail

Few people welcome the sound of sirens. This is especially true in Israel, where they are more frequent and more ominous than in most places.

Sirens have become a regular part of my life in Jerusalem. It's hard to believe there was a time when I would rarely hear one. Growing up in Toronto, I'd occasionally hear the distant sound of a fire truck, police car or ambulance responding to some urban emergency. Back then, such sirens were fairly rare and had little impact on me.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

In the 1970s, when I moved to France, I heard my first air raid siren. I quickly discovered that on the first Wednesday of every month, at precisely 12 noon, sirens would sound briefly to test the civil defence alert system. During the 12 years I lived in Paris, I barely paid attention to this noise.

It's a different story in Israel, particularly this month, when air raid sirens will sound throughout the country on several occasions. Instead of their usual function of signalling an emergency or danger, they will be a call to remember. And what is Jewish reality without memory?

This week, sirens will bring life to a halt almost everywhere in Israel. Literally, if only temporarily. On April 19, sirens will blare at 10 a.m. for two minutes as part of Holocaust Remembrance Day. True to Israeli tradition, as soon as the sirens start, cars, trucks and buses will stop, their occupants calmly getting out to stand at attention. Pedestrians in the street, workers in offices and factories, students in schools, and shoppers in malls will all suddenly become statue-like. They stand erect and silent with their heads bowed in a poignant pause to honour the 6 million Jews murdered by the Nazis.

Every year, it invokes such sorrow. Every year, I marvel at this custom. Every year, I am deeply moved by the experience, an entire nation taking time out together to remember people they never knew. Several times, I've been downtown when the sirens begin. It makes for an unusual sight – a large, loud animated city transformed instantly into one big motionless scene.

Next week, a similar scenario will unfold, only this time it will be after sundown. Again the sirens will resonate from Metullah in the north to Eilat in the south, bringing Israelis to a standstill. Again the sirens will trigger painful memories, as they mark the beginning of Memorial Day, a 24-hour period of mourning for the 22,000 men and women killed in uniform in defence of the country.

The next morning, on Monday, April 26, at 11 o'clock, the sirens will again pierce the air to coincide with ceremonies at military cemeteries. For the third time in less than a week, Israelis will freeze in their tracks. Again they will relive heart-searing events, wrestle with the enormity of their loss and the grief that will never go away.

Again, almost no one will move as the sirens reverberate. No one, except Arabs and haredi Jews who want nothing to do with this commemoration. They continue on their merry way, tuning out the sirens and ignoring those around them standing motionless.

The disregard of most Israeli Arabs is hardly surprising. More disturbing is that the Haredim can't stand for even two minutes in memory of their fellow Jews who gave their lives protecting the country. All because they consider this to be a non-Jewish custom. Such disrespect for their co-citizens is especially repugnant coming from those who proportionately take the most from the state and give the least back, and who systematically avoid doing their share to defend Israel.

If only these were the sole sirens Jerusalemites had to endure. In recent years, residents have become only too familiar with the cacophony that invariably spells disaster. Within minutes of a major terrorist attack, scores of ambulances, their sirens blaring, race to the site of the latest atrocity.

We first hear these sirens from a distance. They soon grow louder and more unnerving as they get closer. Unlike the sirens of my youth, these are anything but banal or removed from my reality. They are a signal of horror that has struck all too close to home, yet again. It's only after the sirens go silent we learn what we dread the most.

Democracy: Israel's secret weapon

In addition to all of our other problems – terror, international delegitimization, disagreement over disengagement, Iranian nuclear weapons, socio-economic gaps, religious-secular tensions, etc. – Israel is also in the midst of a leadership crisis. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon may be indicted for allegedly using his influence, while serving as foreign minister in 1999, to advance shady business deals, including a crony's attempt to buy a Greek island for development. The evidence is not entirely clear, and even if he stands trial, he might not be found guilty, but if the attorney general issues an indictment, Sharon may be forced to resign. This kind of political uncertainty and turmoil is the last thing that Israel needs right now.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Even without the "Greek Island affair" and questionable transactions involving his two sons, the fact that Sharon – at age 75 – faces no serious challenge reflects a wider problem. In the Likud party, former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the current finance minister, is Sharon's most likely heir, despite his divisive term that ended in resounding defeat. And the opposition Labor Party is headed by the octogenarian Shimon Peres, who, despite multiple electoral defeats, continues at the helm. Peres and Labor, as well as small parties from all ends of the political spectrum, seem to be entirely incapable of providing strong alternative leadership in the event Sharon is forced to resign.

For all these reasons, Israelis should be, and many are, very concerned about the absence of credible leadership. Sharon, for all his faults, has guided Israel successfully through three years of terrorism, responding with growing force while working closely with the Americans and avoiding internal conflict. Critics charge that he has not brought peace, but most Israelis recognize that the romantic notions promised by the architects of the Oslo process were never realistic. Sharon has gradually defeated Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's strategy of terror without triggering a confrontation with Washington, and Israel's security and political situation is significantly better now than under former prime minister Ehud Barak in early 2001. Thus, Sharon's sudden departure from the scene could, in theory, leave a vacuum and provoke a leadership crisis.

But this is where Israeli democracy comes into play. Sharon's successes were, in many ways, a reflection of the Israeli consensus, rather than its cause. At each stage, his policies, including both the targeted killing of Hamas founder Sheikh Ahmed Yassin and the decision to implement a policy of disengagement and withdrawal from isolated settlements, were solidly backed by a wide spectrum of Israelis. And any future leader who wishes to stay in power will inherit the same consensus, which recognizes the need to fight terror with all available means while also moving to reduce Israel's exposure to terrorism and friction with the Palestinians.

This Israeli consensus was not forged by a charismatic leader (the era of Ben-Gurion and Begin ended with the departure of both those founding fathers), but through democratic debate backed by a solid dose of collective common sense. For all our faults, we Israelis are relatively sensible, with a healthy degree of skepticism and a strong culture of intense debate and public deliberation. The most popular radio and television programs debate the issues of the day, and for every topic, you can easily find four experts (former generals and government officials are particularly active) with at least five different opinions.

As a result, most important general policies (as distinct from specific operational decisions) are adopted with a public debate on costs, benefits and alternatives. This is true for the construction of the separation fence, the targeted killing of terrorist leaders, prisoner exchanges, etc. In contrast, the absence of any form of democratic debate among Palestinians and in most Arab regimes is reflected in the failures of their policies and the devastating results.

For all its faults, Israel's democracy remains a very powerful foundation for assessing and implementing policies that reflect the national interest. Indeed, Israel may be the best example of Winston Churchill's astute observation that democracies eventually choose the best paths, after they have tried everything else. If Sharon is forced to resign, Israeli democracy will continue to be an effective force, regardless of who is chosen to be the next prime minister.

The Kirshner File

Bush changes the rules of the game

In one bold stroke on April 14, President George W. Bush recast U.S. policy in the Middle East, altered the parameters of Israel's dialogue with the Palestinians and deepened the United States' relationship with Israel. By wholeheartedly endorsing Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's unilateral disengagement plan from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank, Bush changed the rules of the Arab-Israeli negotiating process.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Until Sharon's visit to the White House last week, the United States hewed to two broad principles: Israel's settlements in the territories were illegal under international law and were obstacles in the attainment of peace, and final borders should be the outcome of face-to-face talks between Israel and the Palestinians. These tenets, though somewhat breached by President Bill Clinton in 2000, had underpinned American policy since the 1967 Six Day War and lay at the core of every diplomatic effort to defuse Israel's bitter and increasingly bloody conflict with the Palestinian people.

But now, in a historic shift that has infuriated the Palestinian leadership from Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat on down, Bush has reshaped the political landscape of the Arab-Israeli dispute. By way of rewarding Sharon for his decision to withdraw from Gaza and four isolated settlements in the northern West Bank within a year, Bush acceded to Sharon's demands with respect to settlements, Palestinian refugees and Israel's right to carry out reprisals in retaliation for terrorism.

Citing "new realities on the ground, including already existing major Israeli population centers" in the West Bank, Bush declared that the United States no longer expects Israel to retreat to the 1949 armistice lines. In a remarkable concession, he said that "a full and complete" Israeli evacuation of the West Bank would be "unrealistic."

Deferring to Arab public opinion, Bush deliberately refrained from mentioning the major settlements and settlement blocs that Sharon wishes to retain permanently: Maale Adumim, Givat Zeev, Ariel, Gush Etzion, Kiryat Arba and Jewish enclaves in Hebron. Nor did Bush speak of further Israeli withdrawals, leaving the impression that " facts on the ground" created by Israel in the future might not be contested by the United States. No wonder Sharon was beaming.

Bush reiterated his commitment to the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan, which has yet to be implemented due to the absence of mutual trust and political will. And much to Sharon's delight, Bush dismissed the possibility of the road map being supplanted by, say, the Saudi Arabian initiative or Yossi Beilin's Geneva plan. The road map, which Sharon accepted with 14 reservations, envisages a two-state solution. But how can Bush reconcile his support of a viable and geographically contiguous Palestinian state with his tacit acceptance of settlement clusters?

This pivotal issue, a focal point of the July 2000 Camp David summit and the subsequent talks at Taba, was never really resolved. Ehud Barak, the then Israeli prime minister, proposed the annexation of settlements comprising five to 10 per cent of the West Bank and containing 80 per cent of Israeli settlers. By contrast, Sharon's intentions are quite murky. But given the hawkish territorial positions he has generally postulated, Sharon wants to keep much of the West Bank. Candidly enough, he has admitted that his separation plan "would rule out a Palestinian state, at least for years… [and] bring [the Palestinians'] dreams to an end." In essence, Sharon wants to trade Gaza for the West Bank. He is following in the footsteps of one of his predecessors, Menachem Begin, who relinquished the Sinai in the interests of keeping Judea and Samaria.

Sharon's willingness to jettison Gaza stems from his belief that Israel needs defensible borders and should not be responsible for the welfare of the Palestinians there. But Sharon's plan has aroused fierce opposition in his cabinet and the Likud party. On May 2, it will be put to the test in a Likud referendum. The latest polls indicate that 57 per cent of Likud members will rally behind Sharon, who regards his plan as a long-term interim solution.

Bush's unequivocal rejection of the Palestinian "right of return" constitutes another victory for Israel."It seems clear that an agreed, just, fair and realistic framework for a solution to the Palestinian refugee issue… will need to be found through the establishment of a Palestinian state and the settling of Palestinian refugees there rather than Israel," he said. With this unambiguous statement, Bush has served notice on the Palestinians that their scheme to swamp Israel by demographic means is beyond reach. For Palestinians whose goal is to undermine Israel by such stealth, Bush's commitment to the preservation of Israel's Jewish character will be a bitter pill to swallow.

In reference to the security fence Israel is currently building through the West Bank, Bush said it should be "temporary rather than permanent," and should " not prejudice final status issues, including final borders." The invasive route of the fence, which in some cases cuts off Palestinians from their homes, farms and schools and encircles Palestinian towns, was the focus of lengthy discussions in Jerusalem and Washington. Under American pressure, Israel appears to have adjusted its route to minimize Palestinian inconvenience and humiliation. According to reports, Israel has decided not to fence off the Jordan Valley and has scaled down plans for a barrier near Ben-Gurion Airport.

Ariel Sharon and George W. Bush at the White House last week

Mollified by Israel's apparent co-operation, the United States has reportedly removed the incendiary issue of the fence from its agenda. In this spirit, Secretary of State Colin Powell has said that Israel's U.S. loan guarantees would not be subjected to penalties, as they were last November when the United States deducted $289 million (US) from Israel's $9 billion loan guarantee package.

The fuss over loan guarantee deductions coincided with a period of unusual tension between Israel and the United States. In quick succession, the Bush administration initially opposed Sharon's unilateral disengagement plan, claimed that Israel had "done too little for far too long" to foster talks with the Palestinians and criticized the Israeli army for using excessive force too often in dealing with the current Palestinian uprising.

One of the most important achievements of Sharon's trip to Washington, his 10th in three years, was Bush's pledge of support for Israel's right to "defend itself" against terrorism as the need arises. In practice, Washington has given Israel a green light to mount raids into Gaza if it is attacked.

More than two years ago, Israel raised the ire of the Bush administration by launching the first of a series of frequent incursions into the Palestinian autonomous areas. But having concluded that the Palestinian Authority is incapable or unwilling to stamp out terrorism, a key requirement of the road map, the United States has adopted a fairly tolerant attitude toward Israeli raids. In fact, a sizeable Israeli armoured force rumbled into Gaza just hours after Sharon's appearance at the White House. The purpose of the raid was to destroy tunnels in the Rafah area the Palestinians have used to smuggle in weapons from Egypt.

In another quid pro quo for Israel's planned withdrawal from Gaza, Bush promised to maintain Israel's strategic qualitative edge through the sale of advanced military equipment. Two months ago, the United States began delivery of the new F-16I fighter jet. At a cost of $4.5 billion, Israel has ordered 102 F-16Is. The F-16I would extend Israel's reach to Iran, whose atomic program is widely seen in Israel as an existential threat.

Israel's planned withdrawal from Gaza raises a panoply of vexing questions. The first is whether Palestinian groups will try to attack Israel after its pullout. Two weeks ago, Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Fatah (the latter controlled by Arafat) announced they would continue operations until Israel ends its occupation of the West Bank. Another question is whether Israel will turn over Gaza to the Palestinian Authority. Israel has had few contacts with the Palestinian Authority since Sharon severed talks with Arafat after dismissing him as an untrustworthy and irrelevant interlocutor. Further imponderables are: What will be the fate of Gaza's 21 settlements and its 7,500 residents? Will they resist evacuation? Will the outposts be demolished? Will they provide housing for Palestinian refugees?

The final question turns on the Palestinians. Ahmed Qureia, the Palestinian prime minister, offered conditional support of Sharon's plan if it was a harbinger of an eventual Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank. But in the aftermath of Sharon's visit to Washington, the Palestinians are doubtful that Gaza will lead to an Israeli pullout from the West Bank. And the Palestinians are furious with Bush's sweeping assurances to Israel, saying they circumvent final status negotiations. Arafat contends that Bush and Sharon have destroyed peace prospects by prejudging pivotal issues, but he neglects to say that the peace process has effectively been dead for the past three years.

Emily Brady loses 61 lbs., keeps it off for 3 years & counting!

61 lbs. lighter ...

3 yrs. & counting!

After giving birth to my third child, I became content with life. I frequently ate out, snacked between meals, and gained a staggering amount of weight in a short period of time.

I tried weight loss fads and diets. I would deprive myself and pray that it would make a difference. It didn't. I ended up binging on chocolate or snacks and gaining back my weight faster than I lost it.

When I considered how much money I'd wasted on diets and pills that didn't work, I decided that Positive Changes made good sense. I signed up and melted off 61 lbs.! My dress size plunged from a tight 16 to a slender size 6.

Hypnosis has given me control. I eat less and enjoy it more. I recommend Positive Changes to anyone who wants to lose weight. Why go on a diet when losing weight can be this easy?"

Jewish Life

A classic work on the Yom Kippur War

The Yom Kippur War: The Epic Encounter that Transformed the Middle East*, by Abraham Rabinovich, Random House, $41.95.

Books
Bernard Baskin

On Yom Kippur afternoon, 1973, Israel was caught by a surprise attack on two fronts with the bulk of its army unmobilized. When the fighting ended less than three weeks later, its army was on the roads to the Egyptian and Syrian capitals in one of the most remarkable turnabouts in military history, one that it took international intervention to halt.

The author of this outstanding work believes that then-Egyptian president Anwar Sadat emerges as a major player, having reformed the Egyptian army and evolved a national strategy of limited objectives.

The Israelis, Rabinovich argues, played into Sadat's hands with intelligence failures that delayed their mobilization, gross underestimation of Arab fighting qualities and not reckoning on new enemy weapons (the SA-6 anti-aircraft missile and the Sagger anti-tank missile) that would make the Israeli Air Force and armour-heavy ground troops vulnerable.

The result was a war that began with serious Israeli losses and major Arab advances in the Sinai and on the Golan Heights, within miles of Israeli civilians. Sheer hard fighting by the Israelis at the front limited the damage, however, and in spite of leadership conflicts and a few outright failures, a viable Israeli strategy supported by improved tactics gradually emerged. The result was a victory for Israel that was actually more devastating than the Six Day War, with the added effect of leading to a partial peace with Egypt and later Syria and Jordan.

Viewing the Arab military through the spectrum of the Six Day War, the Israelis were startled by the daring the Arabs displayed and by the way they held their ground. With the passage of time, however, Israel would come to see the Arabs as having "fought bravely, not well," as one armour colonel put it. Disdain for Arab fighters had given way to respect, but not to a sense that the balance of power was shifting.

Despite Israel's spectacular recovery on the battlefield, its mood at war's end was anguished. It had lost almost three times as many men per capita in 19 days as the United States did in Vietnam in close to a decade. For the first time in one of Israel's wars, a significant number of its non-fatal casualties – between 10 and 23 per cent, according to different studies – suffered from battle shock, in good measure deriving from the initial surprise.

As the reservists returned home, public squares began to fill with crowds – not celebrating Israel's tremendous military achievement, but giving vent to the deepest trauma in the nation's history.

The Agranat Inquiry Commission, which was set up to answer questions about the nation's unpreparedness, issued its findings in April 1974. It absolved defence minister Moshe Dayan and prime minister Golda Meir of all responsibility. However, there was widespread public anger and calls for their resignations.

A week after the report, Golda Meir resigned, saying she could not ignore the public ferment. Her move led to the resignation of the entire cabinet. The new government was headed by Yitzhak Rabin, with Shimon Peres as defence minister.

Rabinovich, a well-known Israeli journalist, covered the war for the Jerusalem Post. He combines a wealth of published and archival material with dozens of oral history interviews in a seamless, riveting narrative. This book covers battles large and small, the day to day concerns of Israeli soldiers along the Bar-Lev line and the intense diplomatic and geopolitical machinations of both Russia and the United States. The book takes its place alongside The Six Day War by Michael Oren as a classic and enduring work.

Time to rethink campus strategy

By JOANNE COHEN

Guest Voice

The key business of any university is teaching, research, and professional accreditation, not militant campus politics.

The vast majority of the thousands of secularized Jewish undergraduate and graduate students and Jewish contract or tenured faculty at York University and other campuses are not affiliated with, nor effectively represented by, undergraduate associations such as Hillel, the Young Zionist Partnership (YZP), the Progress Not Politics (PNP) YFS student government, nor insular Jewish studies faculty and Jewish communal staffers. Developments at CUPE 3903 at York offer serious cause for concern, as isolated Jewish graduate students and contract faculty remain dependent on CUPE 3903 to negotiate wages, benefits, overtime and other workplace issues.

None of these organizations are legally empowered nor professionally credible to advocate on behalf of individual secularized Jewish students or faculty who may be facing informal and insidious anti-Semitic marginalization, harassment or discrimination in the classroom or workplace. These conditions ought to be our top priority as a matter of long-term professional and communal interest, and not the sensational and damaging theatrics of amateur undergraduate student politicians and their community and staff supporters.

The CJN rarely seeks comment from moderates on campus who are not embedded in self-referential institutional or communal agendas, and who, like women, graduate students, and secular scholars, were not included in the recent Jewish delegation that met with York's president Lorna Marsden. My recent meetings with non-Jewish academic colleagues at York, including Marsden, have found them to be much more professionally supportive and welcoming than many within our insular and militant Jewish campus groups. My consultations revealed that moderate Canadians at York frequently regard Jews and Israel with suspicion, given the poor optics presented by militant Zionist initiatives and speakers, which have been poorly strategized for a militant leftist and demographically diverse campus climate. At this point, both the small minority of pro-Palestinian militants and the small minority of militant Zionist activists are viewed with equal disdain by the average Canadian and many Jews on campus.

The recent extreme Vari Hall protest by a minority of York's Jewish students, while understandable, continues to present negative optics, suggesting a lack of reality awareness and informed strategy in this campus context. Such efforts worsen the professional climate for responsible Jewish scholars, who are unrepresented by an unaccountable core constituency of Hillel's and YZP's key organizers and staff, but who must deal with the long-term negative professional effects presented by transient and inexperienced undergraduate students and non-academic staff.

It is time for our Jewish communal leadership to reconsider its uncritical endorsement of, and devotion of community resources to, these frequently damaging and alienating self-congratulatory initiatives. Where is the evidence of their effectiveness and impact? Ultimately, as in the wider community, we will be better served by responsible and reasonable Jewish advocacy, and quiet diplomacy with Canadians on campus, not hysterical tit-for-tat campaigns against pro-Palestinian militants and exploitative recruitment of moderate Muslims.

While the recent temporary suspension of Hillel's activities at York was regrettable, and its efforts to rebut SPHR necessary, I hope the interlude provided some valuable peace and quiet for responsible scholars to pursue their professional work and an opportunity for Hillel, YZP and PNP to rethink their efforts to represent the interests of the wider Jewish community, on and off campus.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Israel is about to celebrate its 56th birthday. And even if you can't make it to Jerusalem, Afula or Kfar Saba for Sunday night's party, you can still give a present by supporting Israel's economy. Here are some ideas.

Buy blue and white: If your local store doesn't carry Israeli products, you can probably find what you're looking for on the Web. Do want to munch on some Israeli chocolate or listen to a CD or soak in some Dead Sea salts? Follow the links at Shop in Israel for hundreds of Israeli merchants who will be happy to sell their goods to you over the Internet [www.shopinisrael.com/].

I've enjoyed browsing through the Ke'ilu site, where you'll find Israeli-made products that are a bit out of the ordinary, such as lampshades, combination toothpaste/toothbrushes and Astro-turf-shaped floor mats in the shape of a hippopotamus. If you still have money to spend, the American Jewish Congress has even more vendors on its site [http://tinyurl.com/2map6]. The Orthodox Union has a list of Israeli exporters whose products can be found in retail stores on this side of the Atlantic [www.ou.org/israel/5762/difference.html].

Give tzedakah: There are plenty of wonderful organizations in Israel that need your support. You can give online to an umbrella charity such as UIA Federations Canada [www.uiafed.org/donations_home.html]. Or you may want to help organizations that are dedicated to assisting victims of terror, such as the One Family Fund [www.onefamilyfund.org] and Natal: The Israel Trauma Center for Victims of Terror and War [www.natal.org.il/eng/home.html] For more Israeli charities, check out the list at Maven [www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=172] and at OU [www.ou.org/israel/5762/helpisraelis.htm].

If you are interested in donating to an Israeli organization, you may be able to find out more about it by browsing through Prof. Eliezer Jaffe's Giving Wisely: The Internet Directory of Israeli Non-Profit and Philanthropic Organizations [www.givingwisely.org.il]. Always check out any charity or retailer before doing business online. If you are considering using a credit card on the Internet, make sure you are dealing with a secure website. Those are websites with addresses that begin with "https://".

Go on a trip: The official Israel tourism site offers plenty of information on planning a trip. The site also lets you take an impressive virtual tour of the country. But before you travel for real, make sure to download the coupons to save on accommodations, attractions, car rental and shopping [www.goisrael.com/]. As for what to do when you get there, take a look at Hello Israel. This is the online version of the tourism magazine found in most Israeli hotels [www.helloisrael.net/].

If you've done the tourist thing and are looking for something different, consider some of the programs that are available to foreigners. You can study intensive Hebrew on a kibbutz ulpan, learn the lay of the land through an intensive seven-week hiking program or volunteer with the Magen David Adom's ambulance corps [www.israelprograms.org/]. For program ideas for younger people, check out Israel Experience [www.israelexperience.com].

Go forever: Does the idea of moving to Israel intrigue you? Start by calling an Israel Aliyah Center near you to find out details about the process [www.aliyah.org/], and participate in a forum with other people who are considering going or have advice about their move [www.jafi.org.il/forum/]. Jacob Richman has done a marvelous job linking to other aliyah organizations. His "Aliyah – Why?" page has links to many non-official sites as well as an archive of personal stories [www.jr.co.il/aliyah/].

If you want to check out the housing or job markets, take a look at Localista. The site has thousands of apartment and employment listings for Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa and Be'er Sheva. You can even put in a free "jobs wanted" or look for a shidduch. The navigation part of the site is bilingual, but most of the listings are in Hebrew only [http://tinyurl.com/2z5fp].

If you start working on your aliyah now, maybe by this time next year you will be in Israel for its 57th birthday.

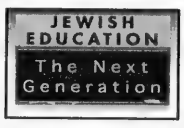
Anti-Semitism should not define us

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

A great deal of the way Jewish education is packaged today seems to revolve around the Holocaust and anti-Semitism. Anti-Semitism sells. The two most popular Jewish studies courses in universities across North America seem to be "The Holocaust" and "Israel and the Middle East Conflict." This can lead to some very unfortunate consequences, as many Jews have come to define their identities more around the persecutions of Jewish history than the inspiration of Judaism itself. In the vast majority of cases, children do not grow up to light Shabbat candles or pray to God because they were taught that Hitler wanted to exterminate us.



Teaching about the Holocaust, and anti-Semitism in general, is so essential that it hardly needs defending, but such teaching should come with a warning. It is a fantasy to believe that you can precisely pin down the causes of anti-Semitism. In Ron Rosenbaum's book Explaining Hitler, the author examines historians who, over the past 50 years, have tried to explain how such a man could have arisen and what constituted the nature of such evil.

Probably the most striking part of the book is the cover photo of Hitler at the age of perhaps two years old. The inclusion of this sweet, cherubic face is a deliberate attempt to force the reader to encounter what seems like a staggering transition from this innocent child with a divine image to the monster of adulthood. How could he have become Hitler? All speculations fall short.

The American novelist Philip Roth once defined Jews as "people who are not what anti-Semites say they are." Though Roth was being somewhat playful, this definition as much as any captures the great modern problem of Jewish identity: lots of Jews know what they aren't; they just find it much harder to say what they are. And we have let others set the tone for the Jewish conversation. A friend of mine who is heavily involved in Christian-Jewish relations told me that he had been asked to go to New York to assist in a kind of task force meant to counteract the expected fallout from Mel Gibson's movie, The Passion of the Christ. "What do you think we should focus on?" he asked me.

I answered, "When the hoopla about the movie dies down, what then? Will the Jewish people no longer need task forces?"

Why is it that we have become a people who react rather than initiate? We brought the fundamental principles of morality to the world. We brought the Ten Commandments. We brought, "Love your neighbour." We brought, "Thou shall not oppress the stranger." We brought "You were made in the image of God." We brought, "Do not hate your brother in your heart," "Do not revenge yourself on your neighbour or hold a grudge." In short, we brought ethics to Western civilization. But when you look in Jewish media and literature today, you would think we are utterly defined by anti-Semitism.

Anti-Semitism needs to be confronted, but it's not who we are. And if we don't know who we are, sometimes anti-Semitism is an impolite way of reminding us.

Temple Kol Ami to build own synagogue

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Model of proposed sanctuary for Temple Kol Ami.

Temple Kol Ami, a 15-year-old Reform congregation housed in rented quarters in Thornhill's Leo Baeck Day School, is proceeding with plans to build its own synagogue, thanks to a $2.6 million donation from philanthropist Leslie Dan.

The 240-family congregation owns a four-acre lot that once boasted a working maple sugar bush, said temple president Barry Bernstein, referring to the location on the east side of Dufferin Street, north of Langstaff Avenue, in the Thornhill Woods area. Administrative offices are housed in an existing building on that site, which was purchased two years ago, but religious services and the temple's supplementary school, serving almost 200 children, are run out of Leo Baeck.

"We're obviously ecstatic," said Bernstein. "Especially because we're a young congregation, it's very special and allows us to really move ahead and finally, after 15 years, have our own home."

Bernstein said he hopes groundbreaking will take place this fall, once rezoning is complete and architectural plans are finalized. "We're trying to integrate the building into the natural beauty of the site. There are a lot of trees surrounding the building. We want to maintain the rural feeling."

The first phase of construction, expected to be finished for the 2005 High Holy Days, will include school space and a sanctuary with seating for about 350 people in a 16,000-square-foot building, said Bernstein.

In addition to the Dan family gift, the synagogue has raised about $3 million, including individual donations and the proceeds from selling part of its land, which was originally six acres, said Bernstein.

Dan, a member of Temple Emanu-El, has no direct connection with Temple Kol Ami, but said he was "impressed by their sincerity and desire to have a place of worship of their own. I felt if I could help, I should do that."

The Hungarian-born Dan said that regardless of denomination, "we're all Jews…we had heavy losses during the war… the important thing is to bring back the Jewish people to Judaism. There are many ways to go about it."

Israel's situation has 'never been better:' envoy

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Last Thursday morning, major news outlets reported that U.S. President George W. Bush had reached an agreement with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to recognize Israel's claim to some West Bank settlements in exchange for an Israeli promise to leave the Gaza Strip.

That night, Ya'acov Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto, joked about the news.

"I have to tell you, there was a survey today and for the first time, [Israeli Finance Minister] Bibi Netanyahu was in second place to be the prime minister of Israel. The first one was George Bush."

In a pre-Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration speech, Brosh detailed the response he expects the leaders' announcement to have on Israelis.

"There will be a bitter internal debate in Israel on this issue. Some are happy. The majority will accept it. Some will oppose it. But I hope that everyone will show enough sympathy for the people who have to leave their homes," he said.

The agreement between Bush and Sharon came after several days of meetings at the White House. Although Sharon agreed to leave Gaza, Israel will still have control over its border with Egypt. He and Bush also agreed that Palestinian human rights would be respected, Brosh added.

Brosh expressed dismay that Israel, even as it nears its 56th birthday, is still fighting to be recognized as a legitimate country by other Middle Eastern states.

But Brosh said he doesn't know how to achieve legitimacy in the eyes of other nations. Part of the difficulty, he said, is in the Jewish mentality.

"We want to be liked. The result is that Israel is always explaining why it has the right to defend its borders, and protect its own interests in ways that other countries do not."

Brosh quoted an old study in which three- and four-year-old Palestinian children were asked where they came from, and they responded with answers such as Jaffa, Haifa and Nazareth.

The study was repeated two years ago, with similar results.

"Those three- and four-year-olds became adults and educated their own children that they are from Jaffa and Haifa and they will go back to their homes," Brosh said.

While he doesn't expect the Palestinians to become pro-Israel or pro-Zionist, he said he expects nothing more than recognition.

"The maximum we can hope for is that the Arab countries will recognize the fact that Israel is there for the time being and forever. They can't defeat us," he said.

"The Arabs believe we are like the Crusaders. We will last 200 years and then we will disappear. I'm afraid we shall disappoint them, the poor Arabs. We will last much more than 200 years," Brosh said. "Our situation may not be the best, but it's never been better."

Brosh's speech was sponsored by the Herut-Likud Betar-Tagar, the Canadian wing of the Israeli Likud party.

Aliyah program targets 'kids in the shadows'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Everything Joey Gold wears is too big for his slight, wiry frame.

The pants are extra-baggy and the hooded sweatshirt hangs on him in folds. An outsized knit stocking cap is pulled low over his brow – but it can't hide the twinkle in his brown eyes.

Joey doesn't know much about being Jewish, but he knows he wants to visit Israel. The streetwise 18-year-old is aware the experience has the potential to shake him out of a pattern of trouble with the law, transient living and welfare.

"Yeah, I want to go to scope the territory," he says with a wide grin. "I hear they have a great night life."

Joey didn't have a bar mitzvah and knows no Hebrew. He hasn't seen his father since he was four. He loves his mother but can't live with her, choosing instead to share a small apartment downtown with his sister and her boyfriend.

He was fired from a job at one of the Jewish community centres "because I f--ked up." He collects welfare, is studying for his high school equivalency and dreams of becoming a filmmaker, though first he has to acquire a camera.

More than a year ago, he was arrested – not for the first time – for drug possession. Because he looks so innocent, his flatmates at a Parkdale crack house would send Joey out to sell the goods.

The courts put him on probation and ordered him out of the crack house. Trouble was, he had nowhere to go, and jail was a real possibility. But authorities noticed Joey is Jewish and contacted Jewish Family & Child Service, which put him in touch with Lillian Freedman, a private social worker who has turned Jewish homelessness in Toronto into a personal crusade.

Freedman, who has located and helped house several dozen homeless and transient Jews in Toronto over the past five years, found Joey a place to stay. After a few moves, he settled in with his sister, but like most people his age, he seems distinctly itchy to do things and go places.

At about the same time, Gadi Anavi, shaliach at the Israel Aliyah Centre for Toronto and Western Canada, had a thought. The Birthright program is a huge success, sending thousands of North American young people to Israel. But what about kids who don't fit the traditional Jewish mould – the kind who fly below the community's radar not because they lack Jewish identity, but because trouble with the law, dropping out of school, drugs and homelessness make them almost invisible?

Anavi calls them "kids in the shadows – the unaffiliated. I wanted to find them. We never really worked with anyone outside the community establishment."

What could Israel do for them, he wondered?

Anavi and Freedman found each other last fall and have since created a program they hope will serve as a model for Jewish communities around the world.

This summer, with full blessings from the Israeli government, they plan to send at least a dozen Jewish youths like Joey to Israel for two to three weeks. It will be the first time some of the participants have ever left Toronto.

The idea, Anavi says, is not only to get them away from trouble and out of the cycle of despair, at least for a while, but also to introduce them to the concept of aliyah.

After the customary sightseeing, participants, aged 17 to their mid-20s, will meet with a social worker, who will describe what awaits them should they move to Israel: free skills training or high school; life on an all-inclusive absorption centre, where they would learn Hebrew; and free university – all with a view toward independent living in Israel.

"We want to start a process," Anavi explains. "First we have to find them and prepare them. We're looking for kids who are Jewish who, without our coming to them, would never come to us."

Glancing at Joey, he adds, "I had no way to get to him if it weren't for Lillian."

Freedman, who's plugged into the homelessness scene and more or less shamed JF&CS into confronting the issue a few winters ago, says she could locate "a few dozen" qualified young people "easily, at the rate we're going."

She says five or six have already expressed interest in this summer's inaugural program.

Some would come from foster care or group homes. "These kids have problems even renting a room, so often, they just crash with friends," says Freedman, who's co-ordinating the project. "They don't go to the traditional places. They've not only fallen into the cracks, but they stay there."

Joshing aside, Joey knows the trip would change his life. "I think it would be a great experience for me," he smiles. "It will open another door."

But it won't be cheap. Israel, Anavi says, can only do so much, and the rest will be up to private donors. Almost all the resources for the project will have to be found in Canada.

For details, contact Anavi or Freedman at 416-633-4766.

Health care system can be fixed: author

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canada's public health care system has been the subject of a long, heated debate characterized by two interlocking themes: Costs are spiralling out of control, and the system is dangerously underfunded.

On the right, there are calls for privatization. On the left, there are pleas for more funds.

Dr. Michael Rachlis, a Toronto-based private consultant who gave up his medical practice five years ago, believes the debate should be reconfigured.

Proceeding from the assumption that costs are not excessive and that the system is far from underfunded, he argues that the main issue is really about management, not money.

Dr. Michael Rachlis

He conveys these arguments in his new book Prescription for Excellence (HarperCollins).

In an interview, Rachlis explained that he was motivated to write the book out of a concern that Canada's medicare debate focuses too much on money and politics and not enough on health care.

A graduate of the University of Manitoba medical school, he contends that the ills afflicting medicare can be resolved by timely reforms.

Rachlis, who has lectured widely on these issues, believes that hospitals admit too many people who would be better served by out-patient care.

He makes two additional points.

If chronic diseases, such as diabetes, were better managed, the incidence of complications would decrease. And if preventable illnesses – heart disease, diabetes, lung cancer and emphysema – were nipped in the bud, 6,000 hospital beds could be freed up each year.

"We have a health care system that is poorly designed to manage chronic illness," he said. "Too many hospital patients should actually get care elsewhere, too many chronic disease patients develop preventable complications and too many people develop illnesses that are totally preventable."

If these problems were seriously addressed, Rachlis said, Canada could "re-engineer the system," making it much more effective.

"We don't have to spend a lot of money for reforms," he added.

Federal and provincial governments have begun implementing such reforms, Rachlis acknowledged, but the process should be completed expeditiously, within three years.

Canadians should be thankful for medicare, which was introduced provincially by Saskatchewan's NDP government in 1947 and adopted by Ottawa under the 1966 Medical Care Act, he said.

Until the advent of medicare, Canadians essentially had the same system as the United States – where today more than 40 million Americans go without medical insurance, 50 million Americans lack adequate coverage, and 500,000 Americans annually declare bankruptcy because of medical bills.

"In Canada, everyone has medical coverage," he said.

And though the United States spends more on health care than Canada in percentage terms, Canadians are better off than Americans, Rachlis contends.

"Our infant mortality rate, for example, is 30 per cent lower than the United States," he said.

"We're ahead of the game, but we're not doing well as we should be doing. We have problems, but compared to those in United States, they're manageable."

In his opinion, Canada should concentrate on improving the quality of care.

"That's how we can preserve the system. Poor quality is unsustainable."

No fan of privatization, Rachlis claimed that an American-style private health care system would basically be un-egalitarian.

"Care-for-profit is less equally received. And privately financed care is less efficient than publicly financed care."

Rachlis, who was born in Winnipeg in 1951, has written two previous books on medical topics – Second Opinion and Strong Medicine.

After interning at McMaster University and practising family medicine in Toronto and Hamilton, he set up shop as a consultant.

A specialist in policy analysis, epidemiology and program evaluation, he has worked for the Romanow Commission, which studied Canada's health care system, and has made presentations to the House of Commons in Ottawa and the House of Representatives in Washington, D.C.

Currently, he teaches at the University of Toronto's department of health care policy and evaluation.

Israeli cancer fund honours three 'women of action'

Staff Reporter

A research scientist, an investment counsellor and a cookbook author were honoured for their professional and community contributions at the recent Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) "Women of Action" luncheon.

Linda Penn, senior research scientist at the Ontario Cancer Institute, Princess Margaret Hospital; Catherine Delaney, president of C.A. Delaney Capital Management Ltd.; and nutritionist Rose Reisman received the ICRF's Women of Action Award at the fund's annual luncheon, held at the Inn on the Park.

Keynote speaker was Myra Freeman, the first female and the first Jewish lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia. She thanked the ICRF "on behalf of the Queen of Canada for making a difference."

Freeman herself has a long history of voluntary service with such organizations as Canadian Jewish Congress, the Grace Maternity Hospital Foundation and the Nova Scotia division of the Duke of Edinburgh Awards.

> Women have traditionally 'fed and cared for their family'

She said women have traditionally "fed and cared for their family and their community. She is the nucleus of the family as well as the local, regional and global communities."

As a teacher, Freeman said, she learned to balance her career with volunteerism. "This served me well as the Queen's representative, and the guardian of responsible government [in Nova Scotia]."

Freeman said that in her role, she concentrates on service to young people, women's issues and the arts. Her goal is to show that "there are no limits to what we can achieve."

Delaney said she was especially pleased to be associated with the ICRF, because "my parents were felled by cancer." She grew up in Winnipeg and later moved to Toronto to share their interest in investment.

She founded her own company in 1992, an experience she called "rewarding, challenging, nerve-wracking."

At the Ontario Cancer Institute, Penn is studying what makes cancer cells proliferate uncontrollably. She is also a noted educator and is active in both the scientific and general communities, serving on editorial boards and the executive board of the Canadian Cancer Society, among other activities.

She said she is proud of the enormous ICRF contributions to scientific research in Israel, such as at the Weizmann Institute of Science and the Technion, as well as to research on genetic mutation and new cancer drugs by scientists at Shaare Zedek hospital.

Several of those scientists have continued their work in her labs, she said.

Reisman has contributed a portion of the proceeds of her 12 best-selling cookbooks to the fight against breast cancer, noted her friend Carol Seidman, CEO of the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation.

"[Reisman] has raised over $1 million" for the cause that way, Seidman said.

Reisman said she is glad her career "allowed me to speak out on healthy living," something she feels can affect the development and progression of cancers.

The ICRF has funded more than 1,400 research projects since 1977. All grants are reviewed by a panel of leading scientists from Canada and the United States.

UJA Federation announces nominees

TORONTO - Ralph Shedletsky, Nominations Committee Chair for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has announced the nominees for the Board of Directors and Individual Representatives to Council.

Elections will be held during UJA Federation's annual meeting on Thursday, June 3, 2004.

In accordance with the by-laws, the governance consists of a Council, a Board of Directors and an Executive Committee. The Executive Committee will be elected by the Board of Directors from among the Directors. No nominations can be made from the floor during the annual meeting. However, any member of the Jewish community may be placed in nomination by complying with the following by-laws:

Ralph Shedletsky

"Only members of the Federation who have made a financial commitment to the United Jewish Appeal in respect of the previous year, and are in good standing with the United Jewish Appeal, shall be eligible to serve as an Individual or Group Representative on the Council.

"Any 20 Representatives may nominate any individual member of the Federation for election to the Board of Directors and the positions of Chair and Vice-Chair, provided that: (a) any one Individual Representative may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the Board of Directors; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the Federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of Council.

"Any seven members may nominate any individual member of the Federation for election to the Council provided that: (a) any one member may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the Council; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the Federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of Council."

Nominated for Chair of the Board is Leslie Gales and Vice-Chair of the Board is David Engel. Nominees for the Board of Directors include:

Natan Aronshtam, Barbara Bank, Austin Beutel, Lesley Binstock Offman, Peter Cohen, Peter Ekstein, Leo Goldhar, David Goldstein, Sheldon Goodman, Toddy Granovsky, Louis Greenbaum, Robert Harlang, Marshall Kesten, Warren Kimel, Igor Korenzvit, David Koschitzky, Julia Koschitzky, Glennie Lindenberg, Baila Lubek, Guidy Maman, Berl Nadler, Neil Nisker, Adrienne Offman, David Peltz, Morris Perlis, Ariella Rohringer, Dr. Miriam Rosenberg, Jacques Sayegh, Ralph Shedletsky, Honey Sherman, Ted Sokolsky, Fran Sonshine, Carole Sterling, Mark Waldman, Alan Winer, Charles Winograd, Henry Wolfond and Cecile Zaifman.

The following Individual Representatives are to be elected for a two-year term (2004-2006) to the Federation Council:

Cheryl Appleby Jackson, Sandra Atlin, Marlene Axmith, Arna Banack, Donna Bank, Tobie Bekhor, Marc Benjamin, Donald Bennett, David Wm. Toronto stands united with Montreal's Jewish community

"Despicable acts such as these can only be answered with courage and resolve."

The following message was sent to Sylvain Abitbol, Chairman of the Montreal Federation and Danyael Cantor, its Executive Director.

Dear Sylvain and Danyael,

It was with great distress and sadness that we heard of the terrible events at the St. Laurent campus of United Talmud Torah Day School on the eve of Passover. Having just gone through some very terrible days ourselves in Toronto, the impact of yet another bitter reminder of an increasingly hostile world for our Jewish people was even more disheartening.

Despite these terrible fears, we know and trust in the great leadership of your Federation and in the indelible strength of the Montreal Jewish Community to rise above this with new resolve and solidarity.

Despicable acts such as these, in fact, can only be answered with courage and resolve. Together we will not stand silent and together we can work to ward off this madness and, to once again, create a better world for our Jewish tomorrows.

On behalf of the Jewish Community of Toronto we want you to know we stand behind you at this critical moment in the history of the Jewish Community of Canada.

May we continue to go from strength to strength, together as one united Jewish People.

Sincerely,

Leslie Gales

UJA Federation establishes fund to help Montreal's United Talmud Torah Day School rebuild

To assist Montreal's United Talmud Torah Day School - the victim of a recent firebombing - UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has announced the creation of the UJA Federation United Talmud Torah (UTT) Fund, designed to help the school, and the community, rebuild.

The fire, set on the eve of Passover, destroyed library books and damaged a library computer system, and police found antisemitic notes taped to the school's walls.

"The Jewish community of Toronto knows - all too well - about the effects of antisemitic behaviour following the recent incidents in the GTA," says Leslie Gales, Chair, UJA Federation Board. "This deplorable act of hatred and ignorance perpetrated against a well-known and respected Montreal Jewish institution simply cannot, and will not, be tolerated. Toronto stands united with the Jewish community of Montreal, and through the UJA Federation United Talmud Torah Fund, members of Jewish Toronto will have the opportunity to show their unyielding support."

Funds received will go directly to the purchase of new books for the Day School as well as towards repairing the extensive damage caused by the fire.

Those interested in making a donation to the UJA Federation UTT Fund can do so by writing a cheque payable to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, 4600 Bathurst Street, Toronto, M2R 3V2, or by calling the hotline at 416-631-5705 or via email at swenner@ujafed.org or you can make a secure online donation and receive an instant tax receipt by visiting www.jewishtoronto.com and pressing the "UTT Library Fund" icon.

Linda Frum excited to work with women she respects

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Linda Frum

After a brief discussion with her husband, Linda Frum, who at the time was considering whether or not to accept the role of vice-chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy (WC&A) for 2005, her choice became an obvious one.

"When I was considering taking on this position, naturally I asked my husband for his thoughts," says Linda of husband Howard Sokolowski who, along with Ronnie Appleby, chaired UJA Federation Campaign 2003 to historic heights. "He put it very well. He said 'think about the hospitals, the schools, the disabled and the disadvantaged who are supported by UJA. Do you want to help them?' It was a very simple decision when he put it like that."

In her new role, Frum, who joins Fran Sonshine, chair of WC&A, will have the opportunity to work side-by-side and shoulder-to-shoulder with some of the community's most talented and committed women, as together they tackle a series of important community projects.

"As vice-chair of the Women's Campaign, I will be working with some wonderful women whom I deeply respect," says Frum, a mother of three. "I love the way our whole community commits itself to this unified cause. We are there to help those in need, to ensure the continuity of our community, and to give much needed support and assurance to Israel. This is extremely important work."

Last year, that important work done by Women's Campaign & Advocacy under the leadership of Barbara Bregman and then vice-chair Sonshine, raised a record $7 million.

Regardless of the year of the campaign, the common goal of WC&A has always been clear.

"Every year we have the same goal - to make the lives of Jews in our community and abroad safer, healthier, and happier," says Frum.

On a personal note, Frum adds, "the recent antisemitic attacks in Toronto and Montreal are worrisome but we are fortunate to have a strong and close-knit Jewish community that is not afraid to speak out. Our federal government has been a tremendous disappointment when it comes to the moral support of a strong and democratic Israel. There is a connection between the hostility of the Liberal government towards Israeli actions of self-defense and local antisemitism. This must change."

Perspective

Thirteen-year-old says "None of us should have to worry!"

By JOEY SACKS,
AGE 13

Joey Sacks

Fifty-nine years ago, an unforgettable war ended. Everyone who was involved in that war believed that once it was over, it would never start again. Now, in the last month there have been too many hateful things happening against Jews, and I, for one, am not about to sit here and watch all this go on.

When I heard about the incidents in the cemetery, the spray paint all over Jewish houses, the vandalism at synagogues, it all made me think. I thought about why? Why and who? How could someone possibly feel this much hate towards others because of their religion? Who could find it in themselves to discriminate against such innocent people, their families and homes, their houses of worship and their cemeteries. Even when Jewish people are dead, they cannot have peace.

We are all the same at heart. People are just divided into religions and race so that there are differences in the world. Think about it, what would this world be if we all acted and looked the same? People are raised to believe certain things - wrong or right. The problem is not what children are seeing on TV, or the media; the problem is how they are being brought up at home, what their parents and siblings are teaching them, and making them believe into their adulthoods. There is no such thing as a bad person, just a person making bad choices.

The other day, I was discussing with a close friend of mine about all this antisemitism, and how scary it is to think about what could be coming - how we could walk the streets and be stopped by someone and asked if we are Jewish. We realized that this is how the Holocaust started, with vandalism, and other acts like that. But no one did or said anything then, and that is why it continued. I don't want to worry about what I could be in for when I leave the house, or go out with friends, just because I am Jewish. None of us should have to worry. This is everyone's world and it should not be ruled by one religion or another.

I was taught in public school to accept differences among people. I learned that we should all live as one, equally. You only live once, and what is the point of living if you spend your whole life fighting for something that we should all have - equality? No one should have to wake up in the morning, walk outside their house and see hateful signs and horrible sayings in graffiti all over their house. No one should have to visit their relative or friend in the cemetery and see that their gravestone has been turned over. What kind of a world are we living in? We do not want young children growing up learning to hate. Racism is easily taken in, and we cannot stand by and let the people who did these awful things think they can get away with it. No matter what religion, race, colour, or gender you are, we are all one. And we should live in unity.

I once asked someone very special to me if he believed the Holocaust could happen again. He answered me in a way I will never forget. First he told me something that his grandfather told him, "Man is not dead, until he is forgotten." Therefore, if we remember the horrible war that ended 59 years ago, then it will not happen again. Even people who are not Jews, who are not antisemitic, should fight for what is right. We live in a very fortunate place and time. We all have family and friends who are very dear to us, Jewish or not, and I hope I can speak for everyone when I say that we do not want our family or friends to be hurt physically or mentally. Please, everyone, help those families and friends prevent the Holocaust from happening again.

Never forget.

New on-line feature simplifies Walk with Israel

Organizers of UJA Federation's Walk with Israel 2004 have come up with a new and innovative method to help participants raise money for Israel, while at the same time, save their feet for the May 30th event.

Through the new Walk with Israel on-line registration site, adults, teens, and even computer-savvy youngsters can design their own Walk registration page, which they can email to friends and family around the world, all from the comfort of their own home.

Those who wish to make donations to the UJA Walk with Israel on-line can now do so easier than ever, and just minutes after donors hit the send button on their computer, they will receive an official tax receipt. Sponsors or Walk participants can simply log on to www.jewishtoronto.com and press the Walk with Israel icon and follow the simple instructions.

"This on-line feature allows interested Walk participants the chance to cover a lot more ground, gain a lot more sponsorship dollars, without having to go door-to-door," says Peter Ekstein, chair, along with David Peltz, of this year's Walk with Israel. "Besides, we don't want people tiring themselves out too much; they need to have their energy to complete the Walk, and then enjoy the wonderful food and entertainment waiting for them afterwards at the RioCan Festival at Ontario Place."

Participation in this year's UJA Federation's Walk with Israel - the world's largest solidarity walk on Israel's behalf - is the strongest possible way to tell the world how much Toronto's Jewish community cares about the people of Israel, and Jews in need around the world.

"The Walk is also about showing our pride – as a community – in Israel as antisemitsm and anti-Israel sentiment continues to grow," says Ekstein. "Toronto has seen this resurgence of antisemitism first-hand recently, with several incidents around the GTA. This Walk will also let people know that we will not be intimidated."

For the first time ever, this year's event will feature a Walk Kick-off party between 9:30 a.m. and 10:30 a.m. at Coronation Park, located across from the CNE Princes' Gates. The party will feature live entertainment, and much more. Those in attendance will also be attempting to set a Guinness Book of Worlds Record for the largest hora.

Students help students one problem at a time

By SUSAN MERSKEY
Special to The CJN

LONDON, Ont. — Last fall, a group of first- and second-year medical students at the University of Western Ontario were looking for volunteer opportunities in the Jewish community.

Dan Nayot approached Esther Marcus and Laraine Hurwitz at the London Jewish Community Centre to see what they might do. After a couple of meetings everyone decided that the group's talents would be best used in offering tutoring for high school students. The medical students would be the tutors, and the JCC would identify teens who would like some academic help and provide a room at the centre.

Every Thursday since the beginning of February, 10 medical students – Jason Abrams, Ronen Behar, Nathaniel Dostrovsky, Sam Elfassy, Kevin Gable, Nathan Ivers, Jeremy Keller, Saul Miller, Dan Nayot and Marci Turner – have been offering one-on-one tutoring to any high school student who needs help in math, science, physics, chemistry or English.

About 12 high school students have signed up for the tutoring.

"Some of them come every week," Marcus said, "others only when they encounter a topic with which they need help. Still others simply take advantage of the opportunity to do homework in a quiet environment, knowing that help is available should they need it."

"We are delighted to be giving something back to the community," Nayot said on behalf of the medical students. "We are close enough to our own high school days to be able to appreciate the challenges facing today's students, and have had to familiarize ourselves with the new curriculum in order to help them."

In fact, Nayot and several of the others commented that they were in first year of university before they studied some of the topics with which they are now being asked for help.

The sessions do more than merely offer help with school assignments, however. The tutors are establishing mentoring relationships with the high school students and discussions range over all manner of topics.

"Some of the high school students are considering going into medicine," noted Grade 11 student Hayley Faulkner, "and the medical students have provided valuable advice on which courses they should be taking to prepare for this."

The tutors find it rewarding to see the same group of students returning every week. And the high school students "really enjoy the sessions and appreciate the help we are getting," Faulkner said.

After only a couple of months, the project is seen as a great opportunity for people to interact, to get and give help and to form relationships outside their immediate peer group.

Nayot said the medical students, who are all members of the fledgling Jewish Medical Student Association, would like to see the scheme continue in other years. All of them are from out of town, though some of them already knew each other slightly from high school in the Greater Toronto area.

"We are really enjoying this opportunity to become involved in the London community," said Behar, "and are very grateful to Dan for taking the initiative and contacting the JCC in the first place."

Marcus and Hurwitz are delighted with the success of the initiative. "First," said Marcus, "it is clearly working. Second, the original approach came from the medical students, rather than vice versa. Finally, we hope that the high school students who are already enjoying the sessions will not only spread the word among their peers and encourage more people to attend, but will also become enthusiastic participants in other JCC program and special events. It's a win-win situation all round."

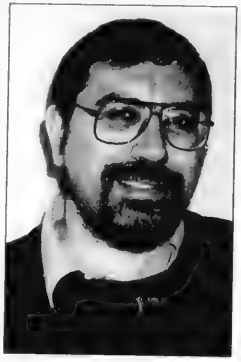
Toronto Hillel optimistic despite challenges

By NATALIE RUSKIN
Special to The CJN

The mood was bittersweet at Hillel of Greater Toronto's annual general meeting this year – bitter because of the past year's rise in hostility against Jewish students on campus, but also optimistic because after nearly 10 years of planning and anticipation, the board finally met for the first time in the new Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

"It's been a long, hard road," Zac Kaye, Hillel's executive director, told the board late last month.

"This is a historic moment: it's the first architecturally built building for Hillel in Canada," he said.



Zac Kaye

As members of Toronto's interfaith community gathered downstairs for a pre-Passover seder hosted by Hillel, board members sat in the centre's second-floor "spiritual room."

The oval-shaped sanctuary is framed by tall windows that wrap three-quarters of the way around the room. The windows provide a sweeping panorama of the downtown neighbourhood and showcase transparent hologram murals depicting historical Jewish cultural scenes.

A blue-green glass chandelier hangs at the front of the room, reminiscent of the stained-glass windows of ancient Moroccan synagogues.

The building, which includes Jerusalem stone on one of its outside walls, is a huge change from the group's previous quarters in the basement of University College. It also houses Hillel staff, who have moved from their previous office in a building on Bathurst Street north of Lawrence Avenue.

But despite the hype over the new building, Kaye does not want to lose sight of its primary function.

"This building was made for the students, and it's already a place they feel very comfortable with and very proud of," he said.

The centre has already hosted several major events, including a Purim party attended by 400 students and the annual student arts festival.

Larry Sonenberg, Hillel's immediate past president, said Hillel led numerous successful pro-peace programs and hosted several high-profile speakers this year, including Irshad Manji and Daniel Pipes.

But he also noted areas that need improvement.

"Our greatest challenge last year was Israel advocacy," Sonenberg said. "We had great speakers, but there were still students on campus that weren't involved."

Hillel's incoming president, Agi Mandel, agreed but added, "Israel advocacy is only one option. It's also important to provide students with a shopping basket of choices to get involved.

"More is expected from students at this time," she said, referring to the increase in hostility against Jews on campus.

Kaye highlighted some of the stresses faced by Hillel@York.

"Many pro-Palestinian students at York are Jewish," Kaye said. "They're beyond the pale for us Jews and it can be quite frustrating."

Yassin: What's law got to do with it?

By FREDERICK PINTO

As the epilogue to the targeted killing of Hamas founder and "spiritual leader" Sheikh Ahmed Yassin once again showed, international law and justice are often at odds in the Middle East.

Even before the UN Security Council had deliberated on the question, or the Human Rights Commission had predictably adopted its own resolution condemning Israel's "tragic assassination" of Sheikh Yassin, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan stated that the "attack" was "in violation of international law". The charge was quickly echoed by EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and innumerable other world leaders. Amnesty International adopted an even more condemnatory tone, stating that "again Israel has chosen to violate international law instead of using alternative lawful means".

The rapidity of these high-level condemnations would suggest that Israel was, once again, in clear breach of its international obligations. But a closer look reveals quite a different picture.

The first main problem is that you can't apply international law and ignore it at the same time. The Geneva Conventions – which Annan and others have frequently invoked against Israel in the past– state clearly that targeting an enemy combatant in times of armed conflict is fair game. Yassin, as leader of Hamas, had declared war on Israel, vowed to pursue that war until Israel was destroyed, and implemented that policy through his support of hundreds of suicide bombings. As such, he cannot be considered anything but an enemy combatant – perhaps even to a greater degree than the confused youths who carry out the attacks. International law is also clear that enemy combatants only cease to be acceptable military targets when they surrender, which Yassin never did. One thing is certain: you can't condemn Israel for alleged violations of the Geneva Conventions while negating its right under those conventions to target enemy combatants.

Some legal commentators have opined that since a case (albeit not a very strong one) can be made that since this is not an "armed conflict," Israel would also have to demonstrate that it had exhausted all other legal means of getting Yassin, and that his killing was the military's last resort. In today's Gaza Strip, however, where Israel's military control is waning, you cannot realistically expect the army to apprehend Yassin as the police would apprehend a criminal in New York or London. It would have caused riots and mayhem in the streets, and probably more civilian damage than the precise targeting that the army used to finally get him. In any case, Israel's targeted killings generally come after years of arrests, detentions and other attempts to bring terrorists to justice. Yassin himself had already been arrested, and was only released from jail in a prisoner exchange after a bungled assassination attempt on a Hamas leader in Jordan, not for any legally justifiable reason.

The condemnations of the Yassin killing were also partly based on a document that Israel has never ratified. Protocol I of the Geneva Conventions states that "unlawful combatants" – such as members of Hamas and other terrorist groups – must be considered part of the civilian population unless they are undertaking attacks themselves. The effect of this bizarre provision is that terror groups are afforded legal protection that conventional armies are not. This is something Israel – as well as the United States and others – deemed an unacceptable proposition, especially in light of Hamas' practice of mixing in with civilian populations. Western European countries, however, did ratify Protocol I, and they sometimes assume everyone else did as well.

It seems that the outcry against Israel's "illegal" killing had other motivations, none of which have anything to do with the law. Many European leaders, for example, expressed the fear that Hamas would now retaliate not only in Israel, but also abroad. There was also, as Amnesty International pointed out repeatedly, popular shock at the fact that Yassin was "paralyzed and wheelchair-bound," or that this "spiritual leader" was innocently coming back from morning prayer – none of which kept him from promoting and endorsing the mass murder of Israeli civilians. And there were also the usual predictions that Israel's act of targeted self-defence would perpetuate a "cycle of violence", to which Harvard university law professor Alan Dershowitz offers a pertinent response: "It is not a 'cycle of violence.' It is a Hamas policy of terrorism against innocent civilians, to which Israel responds by targeting guilty murderers that it is unable to arrest." Hamas' own fanatic brand of hatred toward Israel was never, in any case, a function of Israel's actions toward its leaders. As clearly mentioned in its founding document – which Yassin helped draft – it is based on Israel's very existence.

One might also be tempted to ask where international law was when Yassin was publicly endorsing and supporting international crimes against Israelis. The UN's own International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, adopted in 1997, makes it a crime to organize, direct or otherwise contribute to a terrorist bombing. Likewise, a recent Human Rights Watch report details the reasons why suicide bombings are a crime against humanity, and why those who endorse them – and the report makes an explicit reference to Yassin – are responsible for these crimes under international law. But Annan and the moral magnates of the European Union have consistently failed to make these condemnations. In effect, this creates a dangerous legal vacuum in which suicide bombings can be committed with impunity.

Interestingly, Israel has been reluctant to detail its own legal case in public. Maybe it thinks it won't make a difference, or maybe it is too focused on the strategic implications of its impending withdrawal from Gaza. More tragically, however, it seems Israel has fatalistically (and wrongly) internalized a sense that international law simply stands against its security-driven logic. Whatever the reason, Israel continues to compound public relations failures with poor use of international legal arguments. Mix that with the frivolous use of international law you can expect from the world's self-proclaimed moral authorities and you have a recipe for endless deformation of the law.

The late Israeli diplomat Abba Eban once said that because of the automatic majority that the Arab states command in the UN General Assembly, they could probably pass a resolution saying that the "world was flat and it was Israel's fault." And in the weird arena of world affairs, the people who denounce the rhetorical misuse of international justice that pander to various ideological agendas (and particularly an anti-American and anti-Israel agenda) are unfortunately few and far between. Until there is a change in this perverse state of affairs, the world of international law is doomed to remain a flat one, and more one-dimensional, reflexive condemnations of Israel can be expected. But, as was illustrated once again in the Yassin case, you can also expect that law won't have much to do with it.

Frederick Pinto has a degree in international law and is completing the Quebec bar. He is also editor of Maspeak, a Hillel-funded magazine.

Documentary examines world of messianic Jews

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Igal Hecht is no stranger to controversy. With his partner Ron Furman, Hecht established the aptly named company Chutzpa Productions in 1999.

Under this label, the duo has produced two controversial Jewish films, the fictional Camels of Nahor and the documentary Y.I.D. (Yehudim in the Diaspora).

Their newest film, The Chosen People, which premieres at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 2, is also bound to provoke heated discussion.

"The Chosen People is about the world of messianic Jews and what they mean to the rest of the Jewish world," Hecht says. "I spent a year with [the City of David Messianic Jews]. They opened up their homes and their synagogue to me."

The documentary, mostly filmed in Toronto, was also shot in Israel, Los Angeles and Budapest.

The film spotlights two sisters in their early 20s, Nicolette and Roanne Sochett, who recently converted to the messianic movement. The two talk frankly about their conversion and the rift it caused at home.

"Nothing sets Jewish parents off as much as Yeshua," Nicolette says, using the Hebrew name for Jesus.

The sisters are very devout and strongly committed to their beliefs.

"I didn't want to demonize messianic Jews," Hecht, 26, says. "They're very passionate about their faith."

Although Hecht believes the film is balanced, he is disappointed that Jews for Judaism, a counter-evangelical movement, isn't happy with it.

Rabbi Michael Skobac of Jews for Judaism told The CJN his group's main concern was there wasn't equal screen time.

"It's a simple enough observation, from watching the film, that it's not balanced," he said. "We get 13 minutes, they get 47. They have 10 speakers, five male and five female; we have five – all male. If the movie is exploring both sides, it doesn't do it in a balanced way."

But Hecht says the timing is that way because it is first and foremost about messianic Jews.

"I'm not sure what [Jews for Judaism] were expecting," he says. "I feel it is balanced, both sides have their views. But it is a movie that explores the messianic Jewish movement, not Jews for Judaism."

A Jewish woman confronts a Jews For Jesus pamphleteer in the film Chosen People.

The film is sympathetic toward the young converts interviewed, including, in addition to the Sochetts, a Russian boy.

But, on the other hand, the film's opening and closing words belong to the articulate Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman of the Jewish Russian Community Centre, who adamantly insists that messianic Jews can't be Jewish.

"In Judaism, Jesus is an idol," Rabbi Zaltzman says at the end of the film. "In Judaism, God is only one – God doesn't have the Holy Spirit and the Son. This is the dogma of Christianity that contradicts the essence of Judaism."

For the most part, The Chosen People stays away from theological arguments. In addition to Rabbi Zaltzman, Hecht shows Julius Ciss of Jews for Judaism explaining five reasons why Jesus can't be the Jewish messiah. But mostly, Hecht follows the converts as they pray, sing, cook dinner and talk about what their faith means to them.

Documentaries work well when a bit of luck, or perfect timing, add something that couldn't have been scripted.

One such scene is of a confrontation on a Toronto street between a young Jews For Jesus girl handing out a pamphlet to an unreceptive older Jewish woman.

"Don't you have enough Christians already?" the woman snaps to the younger one. "Why do you have to convert Jews? Why don't you convert the Muslims that are killing the Christians?"

"That's Ron Furman's doing," Hecht says of his partner. "He was there shooting that. He stood there for 45 minutes getting verbally attacked by Jews for Jesus. When stuff like that happens, it really adds depth to documentaries."

In another scene, Hecht is interviewing Rabbi Skobac in a parking lot. Jews for Judaism and City of David share premises side by side at the Main Exchange Plaza in Thornhill. During their interview, they are talking about Jeff Forman, a spiritual leader at City of David, when Forman pulls into the plaza.

As Forman walks past, brandishing newly polished shoes for a "bat mitzvah," the two exchange pleasantries like old friends.

"That was honestly spontaneous," Hecht laughs. "I was interviewing Mark outside for about 45 minutes and he just happened to be talking about Rabbi Forman when he drove into the parking lot. I was shocked. It was unbelievable."

The chief target of conversion appears to be new Jewish immigrants, mostly because they know little of their faith and are easily swayed.

"They have a tremendous desire to latch onto something spiritual," Rabbi Skobac says in the film.

Ciss, who briefly flirted with the movement, says in the movie he understands the draw.

"It's very tempting – they say you don't have to convert to anything. When the messiah comes, you'll be more Jewish than ever – a fulfilled Jew – a messianic Jew – a completed Jew."

Hecht says he got the idea for this documentary while toying with the idea of doing a film on the Jewish dating scene.

"We wanted to look at all streams – Orthdox, Conservative and Reform – when somebody told me there was another stream – messianic Judaism. I thought this topic could be an interesting movie. I've never seen one on them before."

Typical of Chutzpa Productions, The Chosen People is fascinating and thought- provoking.

"I believe The Chosen People will be controversial," Hecht says. "It keeps in line with the trend of Chutzpa Productions. We tackle subjects not a lot of people tackle – hopefully in a good way.

"I'm a controversial person by nature," he says. "I want to explore issues that I haven't seen other Jewish filmmakers do."

Hecht and Furman have spent much of the past year at York filming the controversy that's been brewing between Arab and Jewish students. The result, Protest at York University, will be released shortly.

They're also planning a sequel to Y.I.D., Y.I.D. 2 – Not In Our Name, which will look at Jews in North America who are opposed to Israeli policies and openly advocate and legitimize the Palestinian terror. It is scheduled to premiere at next year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

The Chosen People is showing on May 2 at 5:30 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema. For tickets, call 416-324-9121.b

Charest stresses commitment to promote tolerance

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After touring the burnt-out library at United Talmud Torahs (UTT), Quebec Premier Jean Charest told Grade 6 students he was reminded that the Holocaust began with violent acts such as this hate-motivated firebombing.

But he said he is encouraged by the denunciations of the attack by political leaders and all segments of Quebec society. "I think the lesson of the Holocaust – that people in leadership positions should be more vigilant, that it is important to speak up – has been learned," Charest said.

He promised that police will do everything possible to find the perpetrators, and he said the government will "do its share" in rebuilding the elementary school library at UTT's St. Laurent branch.

Most of all, though, he tried to reassure the boys and girls, encouraging them to talk about how they felt and telling them they are safe and that the vast majority of Quebecers appreciate the Jewish community.

"Life will return to normal," he told them. Gesturing out the window, he reminded them it is "still the same world."

He listened patiently to all their questions, which were often pointed. One boy asked: "What do you intend to do following this act of hatred against the Jewish community?"

He stressed his commitment to promoting tolerance and that Quebec is enriched by the diversity of its citizens. "We should denounce those who do not believe in these values," he said.

In response to Charest's question on why they think the firebombing happened, one boy replied: "People do not really, really like Jews, but it's not our fault. We got chosen for some reason and they didn't."

He asked the children if they were scared. One girl said she felt a little afraid, but knows this is "not another Holocaust because this time people understand and care about what is going on."

Charest, accompanied by Revenue Minister Lawrence Bergman and St. Laurent MNA Jacques Dupuis, spent almost an hour at the school on April 8, the first opportunity after Passover. The firebombing took place in the early morning of April 5.

In a sad irony, a CJN article headlined "Kids learn about themselves by studying the Holocaust" was still taped to the charred library door.

After emerging from the room, Charest said it "certainly leaves a strong impression when you see and smell this yourself. You see how violent the gesture was. It will stay in my memory."

Before leaving, Charest also met briefly with a group of parents. One wanted to know if the attack will be treated as a hate crime or a terrorist act.

"I see this as a hate crime, but one does not exclude the other," Charest replied, adding that it's the role of the prosecutor to decide on the charge, not the government.

As a memento of his visit, UTT executive director Sidney Benudiz and FEDERATION CJA executive vice-president Danyael Cantor presented Charest with a book salvaged from the fire titled Quebec, Je t'Aime/ I Love You, featuring the paintings of Montreal artist Miyuki Tanobe, as well as a cassette that had been gnarled beyond recognition. Charest said he will keep the items on display in his office.

"I'm sure it will attract a lot of attention. Every time I get a question, the story [of what happend at UTT] will be told. We can never tell it too many times," Charest said.

Benudiz told The CJN that the school has been inundated with messages of support and offers of material help – even someone offering to do free construction work – from across the country, as well as the United States and Israel.

He said the school is trying to instill in its 230 students, who returned to class last week after the Passover break, that as disturbing as the attack was, they should draw strength from this support.

Counsellors from Jewish Family Services were available for students needing any help. School officials are trying to make things as normal as possible, and issued a plea to the media the day before classes resumed April 15 for "co-operation in allowing our young students to enter the school in the morning with the least amount of disruption possible."

Benudiz said the school is "reassuring parents that there will be more visible security at the school and that their children will be safe." He added that UTT will continue to work with other Jewish schools to devise a common security strategy.

Benudiz said he expected the losses of the school will be a "minimum" of $300,000. At the time of writing, the school's insurance company had not yet decided what it would cover.

He said Education Minister Pierre Reid had told the school the government will contribute to the rebuilding, but gave no specific figure. In the meantime, the school has set up a fund to accept tax-deductible donations.

On the first day of classes, the chair of the English Montreal School Board, Dominic Spiridigliozzi, vice-chair Elizabeth Fokoefs, and representatives of four nearby schools visited UTT to present new books and offer interim library space in their facilities.

Several children's book publishers have also offered to help fill the shelves of the rebuilt library, Benudiz said.

Benudiz praised the quick action of firefighters, who contained the fire to the library, with only smoke damage to the second floor above. "The alarm went off at 2:15 a.m. By the time I got here at 3:15 a.m., the fire was out."

Monetary donations can be made to the UTT Library Fund, United Talmud Torahs, 4840 St. Kevin Ave., Suite 210, Montreal, Que., H3W 1P2, telephone 514-739-2291; or c/o FEDERATION CJA, 1 Cummings Square, Montreal, Que. H3W 1M6, telephone 514-345-2600.

Meanwhile, police are investigating the daubing with red paint of the Hillel headquarters on downtown Stanley Street over the Easter weekend. It consisted of lines and splotches but no words or identifiable symbols that might indicate the motivation.

Montreal students come to grips with fire bombing

Police will also be present at each school during opening and closing, and the community has been told patrols have been stepped up at other times.

Shayna Mestel, a student at the adjacent Herzliah High School who attended UTT, said the firebombing was the main topic of discussion at her family's seder table. There had been graffiti on the school in the past and security was always a concern, but she never thought she would see a violent act on this scale.

"I feel angry; this shouldn't happen. We are people like them, even though we have a different religion," she said.

"Even if they catch who did it, I know there are still a lot of other people in the world who do bad things.

"We worked hard to build up the library; now everything is gone… It gives me a bad feeling."

Vice-principal Birdie Goodman, who also teaches Grade 5, said the children asked a lot of questions and discussed things openly on the first morning back.

"Generally, I think they are okay. They mostly wanted to know about the future, what the new library would look like."

Parent Joel Greenberg, whose son Benjamin is in Grade 6, said he considers the fire "an attack on our home. I've gone through the gamut of emotions. At first I was mortified, then there was sadness and anger… Why take advantage of something so innocent [as a children's library]?"

Greenberg said guards are appropriate.

"I don't want Benjamin to feel like he is in jail, but there has to be more control of who is coming and going in the school.

"Security is part of all our lives since 9/11. I had to have my shoes x-rayed at the airport, but that's okay."

Greenberg was worried that this incident evidently required planning, but felt trying to draw conclusions about who did it and why is useless and dispiriting.

"Suggesting that this is an example of importing the Middle East conflict here only creates another layer of fear," he said.

In a letter to parents, UTT president Rachel Cohen and FEDERATION CJA president Sylvain Abitbol asked that they refrain from "idle speculation" on the perpetrators.

The only information the school had last week is that police are following a few leads.

The community has asked different levels of government to help cover the Jewish schools' increased security costs over the long term. UTT is taking tenders for the installation "as soon as possible" of security camera systems at its four campuses.

On display opening day were three binders filled with messages of support from political, ethnic, religious, cultural, labour and human rights groups, as well as individuals.

The school's students have been asked to draw a picture or write a summary about a book they have read, which will be displayed on the wall outside the library.

Corrie Sirota-Frankel, JFS supervisor of group services, said the children are coping well because they see that the adults have stayed calm.

"They will take their cue from us," she said.

But as with any trauma, there are immediate and long-term effects, Sirota-Frankel said, and parents have been asked to look out for any unusual behaviour. She said students should be allowed to express their fear, and be helped in finding ways of reducing it.

"They shouldn't be told not to be afraid or to pretend nothing has happened."

Karen Gazith, BJEC educational services director, said, "We have been so impressed by how the children are less concerned about themselves, than the school. They are more worried about the library being rebuilt, even if the librarian would still have his job. It's heartwarming."

Macdonald takes another potshot at Israel

On April 14, CBC-TV's The National newscast began with a breathtakingly biased report on last week's historic meeting between Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and U.S. President George W. Bush in Washington, D.C. Reporter Neil Macdonald, returning with a vengeance to a subject that can only be described as an old passion, was so critical of Sharon and the Israel-U.S. alliance that his piece was really a thinly veiled editorial.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The introduction by anchor Peter Mansbridge set the tone and signalled what was to come. Instead of acknowledging that Sharon, the main proponent of settlements, had done a historic about face and decided to unilaterally remove all settlements in Gaza and a handful in the West Bank (to start with), thereby turning control of the area to the Palestinians, Mansbridge said – contrary to what Bush repeatedly said in his prepared text – that the United States had departed from his "road map peace plan." He called Sharon's unilateral withdrawal a "so-called disengagement plan." So-called?

Macdonald began by saying that Bush in effect had "sanctioned… Israel's designs on Palestinian territory." He minimized Sharon's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza, with its "million fenced-in Palestinians," describing it as a means to achieve Israel's true objective: "It's the West Bank that Israel really wants, and Sharon, now with Bush's approval, intends to annex a large chunk of it."

Macdonald ignored the fact that, during the negotiations at Camp David in the summer of 2000, all parties understood that only a very small portion of the West Bank – mainly near Jerusalem, where about 75 per cent of settlers live – would be incorporated into Israel in any final status arrangements. Camp David did not founder on the settlement issue, which was clearly resolvable. Camp David – the best chance in 50 years, as even the Economist once put it, for the Palestinians to have a viable, contiguous state – failed when Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat insisted that Israel had no rights to holy places in Jerusalem, and that the Palestinian refugees had a "right" to "return" to Israel. By neglecting this historical context, Macdonald paints Israel as an aggressive land grabber.

Macdonald said "Bush is also walking away from the Palestinian refugees." In fact Bush, in reiterating his support for a two-state solution and reaffirming his commitment to the road map, said aloud what has long needed to be articulated: if the Palestinians truly want their own viable state they cannot expect Israel to absorb Palestinian refugees, as that would mean the destruction of Israel as a Jewish state.

Bush is facing reality, as the Toronto Star's Gordon Barthos acknowledged in his even-handed analysis, "Shaking that Mideast torpor," (April 15). Barthos wrote: "Bush's move marks an historic shift in American public diplomacy, to be sure. But [former president] Bill Clinton privately floated those very ideas back in 2000 at the Camp David summit. They've been an unwritten element in every credible peace plan. Both sides know it. What's new is that Bush has chosen to talk openly about it, to reward Sharon for getting out of the Gaza Strip and to nudge things along. Sharon's modest gain need be no great loss for Arafat."

Barthos wrote that its time for the Palestinian leadership to make the most of this new reality: "Rather than rail at Bush's support for Israel retaining its Jewish identity with slightly redrawn borders, Arafat should bow to reality, pounce on Sharon's historic Gaza pullout, declare victory and seed the ground for negotiations on Jerusalem and the West Bank."

After an extended clip of outraged Palestinian Authority negotiator Saeb Erekat, Macdonald ended his report with a one-sided rhetorical question: Why would Bush "choose at this moment to side so firmly and publicly with Ariel Sharon"? Instead, Macdonald should have attempted to provide a semblance of fairness – say, someone's positive comment on Sharon's plan, or perhaps a critical remark about Arafat for stymieing negotiations by refusing, contra the road map, to rein in the violence and terrorism.

Gala draws over 300 people as Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit ends

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Grand Hall of the Canadian Museum of Civilization, with its vast, open space and soaring totem poles, was a magnificent setting for the gala soirée that marked the closing of the exhibit "Ancient Treasures and the Dead Sea Scrolls."

Nearly 350 people from across Canada gathered to pay tribute to the exhibit and to the people who made its Canadian visit possible. Those who had not yet viewed the artifacts were given an opportunity to do so before the banquet began.

"As a representative of the State of Israel, as a Jerusalemite boy and for the entire staff of the embassy… I hope that for you this is just an appetizer and you will want to see the real thing in Jerusalem," said Ambassador Haim Divon.

Archbishop Marcel Gervais and Rabbi Reuven Bulka jointly blessed the participants. "In Judaism, no object is more holy than the Torah scrolls. This exhibit is wholly successful," Rabbi Bulka said.

The Canadian Museum of Civilization has reported a 20 per cent increase in the number of visitors since the exhibit opened, and attributes it to the extraordinary success of the exhibit and the accompanying series of eight weekly lectures by renowned biblical scholars and scroll experts.

"The success of this exhibition has been due to partnership,"said Dr. Victor Rabinovitch, president and CEO of the Canadian Museum of Civilization Corporation. "This exhibition represents the coming together of expertise from three major institutions – in collaboration, in research, in promotion and in design and installation," he said, referring to the Israel Museum, the Canadian Museum of Civilization and the Pointe-à-Callière, Montreal's museum of archeology and history where the scrolls were on display first.

"It is also an excellent example of partnership reaching beyond any one particular community," Rabinovitch continued. "This exhibition shows the origins and ideals shared between two of the world's great religions. Jewish and Christian visitors, secular and academic participants, have come together to promote, to understand, to share and to learn, in a manner that reflects the greatest of museum goals."

James Snyder, director of the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, praised the Canadian professionals who brought the artifacts to this part of the world. "The excellent curatorial collaboration did a wondrous job of bringing the objects together and bringing them to Canada and interpreting them in a way that would be meaningful to the audience here," he said.

World renowned cellist Ofra Harnoy delighted the audience with her performance. It was "a highlight of the evening… Ofra has done this out of the goodness of her heart and for the sake of the Israel Museum," said Norman Barwin in thanking her. Barwin, with Michael Walsh, co-chaired the Ottawa committee that promotes the Israel Museum and organized local activities around the exhibit.

Daniel Ben Natan, vice-president of the Israel Museum, made a special presentation to Babs Asper of Winnipeg in memory of her late husband, Dr. Israel Asper, in which The Community Rules Scroll was dedicated to the memory of the man who, it was said, embodied its principles.

The Community Scroll – Rule 1, 1-6: "The Master shall teach the saints to live according to the Book of the Community Rule, that they may seek God with a whole heart and soul, and do what is good and right before Him as He commanded by the hand of Moses and all His servants the Prophets… that they may abstain from all evil and hold fast to all good; that they may practise truth, righteousness, and justice upon earth…"

Funds raised at the gala will be used for preservation of the scrolls and programming for the youth of Jerusalem regardless of religion.

Morgan acclaimed as 17th CJC president

OTTAWA — Ed Morgan has been acclaimed as the new president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Moshe Ronen, chair of CJC's board of governors, announced last week.

Morgan, who becomes the CJC's 17th national president for the next three years, has been serving as chair of CJC's Ontario region.

"I am pleased to confirm that... we had a complete slate of outstanding national officers for Canadian Jewish Congress," Ronen said. "They will be officially assuming their portfolios at the upcoming CJC Plenary Assembly to be held at the Westin Hotel in Ottawa on June 13."

The slate is made up of:

Morgan; Victor Goldbloom, chair of the national executive; Prof. Rachael Turkienicz, associate chair of the national executive; Cary Green, treasurer; Marion Mayman, secretary; Calvin Goldman, honorary legal counsel; Moshe Ronen, chair of the board of governors; and Prof. Irving Abella, honorary president.

Outgoing CJC national president Keith Landy, praised his successor and the incoming officers.

"Congratulations to Ed Morgan and his team who will lead this organization for the next three years. Ed has demonstrated his leadership skills and talent as an effective spokesperson and advocate while most recently serving as CJC, Ontario region chair.

"His credentials and his experience with CJC and with many other organizations will make him a leader that the Jewish community can be proud of. The new officers bring an impressive blend of talent, expertise and accomplishment to the national table."

Tenured law professor at University of Toronto

Morgan, a tenured law professor at the University of Toronto, teaches and practises in the fields of constitutional, as well as international public and private and criminal law. He has also appeared as an expert witness in domestic and foreign courts on issues of international law.

Morgan has represented numerous organizations, including CJC, the Green Party of Canada, the Assembly of First Nations, the Canadian Association of Journalists, the Epilepsy Association of Toronto and NORML Canada in constitutional, human rights and public interest cases. He was lead counsel for the plaintiffs at the Supreme Court of Canada in Adler v. Ontario, which challenged the denial of public funding to Jewish day schools.

Morgan also regularly contributes opinion pieces to major newspapers and is a sought-after speaker and interviewee on issues of concern to the Jewish and general communities.

Hana's original suitcase destroyed by anti-Semites

A suitcase that was believed to belong to a 13-year-old Holocaust victim and which spawned a popular children's book, Hana's Suitcase, is actually a replica created by the Auschwitz Museum.

The replica suitcase was obtained on loan by the Holocaust Education Resource Centre in Tokyo and was used as an educational tool in education programs by Fumiko Ishioka, the centre's director. Believing it to be the original suitcase, Ishioka investigated the suitcase's history and traced it to Hana Brady, a 13-year old girl who took it with her in 1944 to Auschwitz, where she was killed. Ishioka also tracked down Brady's brother, George, who lives in Toronto. Brady had been unaware that his sister's suitcase still existed.

The CJN first reported on the suitcase in an article in January 2001. The article inspired writer Karen Levine to research Hana Brady's life and she authored the book that is published by Second Story Press.

On a recent trip to Europe, Brady and Ishioka learned that the original suitcase had been part of a Holocaust exhibit in Birmingham, England, in 1984, but was destroyed when anti-Semitic vandals torched the exhibit.

The Auschwitz Museum created a duplicate artifact, but did not inform Ishioka that it was not the original. It was George Brady's daughter, Lara Hana, who noticed in a vintage photograph that the handle of the replica suitcase didn't match the original.

The director of the Auschwitz Museum acknowledged the error and apologized for it, according to a news release from Second Story Press.

News that the suitcase was a replica "came as a complete surprise," said Levine. "But upon reflection I realized the integrity of the story is intact. The suitcase was a catalyst. It led Ishioka to the life story of young Hana Brady and to her surviving brother. No one would have behaved any differently knowing the suitcase was a replica."

"Hana's Suitcase has brought the lessons of history and a message of tolerance to thousands of children, and will continue to do so," said Brady. "If Auschwitz had not created a replica after the suitcase was destroyed, the story of my sister's life would never have been told."

First Holocaust Memorial Day marked in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The first annual Canada Holocaust Memorial Day was marked by more than 1,000 people at a ceremony on Sunday that began on Parliament Hill and continued at Ottawa's Congress Centre.

Participants from Montreal, Toronto and Kingston, including Kingston Mayor Harvey Rosen, arrived in Ottawa to show solidarity and to express appreciation to the government for passing legislation last year that created the memorial.

The event, chaired by Joel Dmitry of Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, was also sponsored by the Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, B'nai Brith Canada, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), Canadian Jewish Congress, the Israeli embassy, the Ottawa Holocaust Remembrance and Education Committee, and the Ottawa Vaad Ha'ir.

As the Peace Tower clock struck 2 p.m., the ceremony began with a march by members of the Jewish War Veterans of Ottawa. A moment of silence followed the reading of names of "a scant few victims" of the Holocast by Truda Rosenberg. Wreaths were laid beside the eternal flame in memory of the survivors, the State of Israel and various organizations.

The crowd then walked slowly and quietly down Wellington Street to the Congress Centre, where the ceremony continued.

Sara Breiner, co-chair of the Ottawa organizing committee and herself a child of survivors, welcomed everyone.

"It was a mere 40 years ago that my family came to this country, and who would have thought that I would be standing here today… our obligation is not only to remember, but also to prevent such heinous acts from ever being committed again," she said.

Breiner acknowledged the presence of diplomats from Russia, Argentina, Greece, Turkey, Kenya and Germany, as well as Canadian MPs and senators such as Senate speaker Dan Hayes, senators Marie Poulin and Mac Harb; NDP leader Jack Layton, MPs Elinor Caplan and Jason Kenny, former deputy prime minister Herb Gray and others.

Justice Minister Irwin Cotler paid tribute to the MPs who passed the memorial day legislation.

He also spoke of his parents, who taught him "there are things in history and in Jewish history that are too terrible to be believed, but they are not too terrible to have happened."

Cotler said there are four lessons to be learned from the Holocaust: the importance of remembrance; the dangers of hate speech, hate crimes and hate movements; the dangers of silence and the consequences of indifference; and the need to fight a culture of impunity.

"It is the duty of the government to bring war criminals to justice. There will be no sanctuary for war criminals… We will bring them to justice as a matter of universal justice and universal responsibility."

Memorial candles were lit by Cotler and Gray on behalf of the Canadian government; by Ambassador Haim Divon for the State of Israel and by Maj.-Gen. Edward Fitch for the Canadian Forces. Candles were also lit on behalf of survivors and children of survivors; partisan resistance fighters and the Righteous Among Nations.

Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon with his wife and daughter march in Ottawa ceremony.

"I wish, on behalf of the State of Israel, to pay tribute to the Parliament of Canada for this appropriate legislation to commemorate Yom Hashoah and therefore enabling us all to be here this afternoon," Divon said. "And I would like to tell you, the survivors, that you have been the messengers, you brought with you the message 'lizkor v'lo lishkoach,' remember and never forget."

The sponsors of the bill that created the memorial day – MPs Scott Brison, Art Eggleton, Richard Marceau, Scott Reid and Judy Wasylycia-Leis – were thanked by Dmitry and Leo Adler of the Friends of the Wiesenthal Center.

Senator Jerry Grafstein urged those present to continue to be vigilant.

In related news, on Monday, the B.C. government hosted a Yom Hashoah event in the legislature building in Victoria in which Premier Gordon Campbell addressed survivors and their guests.

'Mr. Sam's' spirit lives on in the castle he built

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The late Samuel Bronfman's imposing office is in the faux castle on Peel Street that was the Canadian headquarters of the Seagram Company.

It has been preserved right down to the old ashtray on the sill of the stained-glass windows.

McGill University, now the owners of the building, have paid tribute to Bronfman by keeping the wood-panelled office from which he ran the liquor company for decades, pretty much the way he left it when he died in 1971.

Bronfman had the building with its distinctive limestone facade and turrets constructed at the prime downtown site in 1928 after he founded Seagram.

The company was an amalgamation of Joseph Seagram & Sons, which he bought, and his own Distillers Corporation.

Sitting behind the majestic oak desk today, however, is Nancy Wells, McGill vice-principal of development and alumni relations. The building was donated to McGill in 2002 by Vivendi Universal. The French-based international entertainment and communications conglomerate acquired the property when it bought Seagram from the Bronfman family the year before.

McGill moved its development and alumni relations department into the building last fall.

"One can almost feel the power and spirit of Mr. Bronfman in his office and imagine all the conversations that took place here," said Wells, during the recent official renaming of the building as Martlet House, which refers to the three flying birds on the McGill coat of arms.

"It's a privilege to sit in this space, which was defined by a great Canadian businessman and philanthropist...We are tremendously grateful to the Bronfman family for being the driving force behind this generous gift from Vivendi Universal."

Originally designed by leading architect David Jerome Spence, the building was modeled after a 16th-century Scottish baronial castle, the Scottish style being a nod to the type of whiskey Seagram made. It even has a portcullis, a heavy grating that slides up and down, blocking the entrance.

Spence also oversaw the doubling of the building's size in 1931. Two more expansions followed in 1947 and 1955. Despite various renovations during the Seagram era, much of the wood-panelling and other vestiges of the original design have survived.

McGill has promised to preserve the Bronfman office, as well as a second-floor boardroom and the limestone facade for as long as it owns the property.

The five-story building provides McGill with 30,000 square feet of much-needed office space for about 100 staff who are responsible for keeping in contact with alumni, and fundraising activities. They were previously scattered in several locations.

The building was restored over several months in 2003 at a cost of $1.5 million by the architectural firm of Fournier Gersovitz Moss et Associes, which has an expertise in conservation and recycling of historic buildings.

Original workmanship on the first, second and third floors was painstakingly preserved, while ventilation, wiring and other basics were refurbished.

Partner Julia Gersovitz underlined how special the project was. "It's not very often that an office building is modeled after a castle. While the building is not officially classified as a heritage monument, one can certainly argue it has heritage value: it is the work of an important Canadian architect, it is a landmark building and it was the headquarters of a famous international company."

Samuel Bronfman's son Charles, said, "My family is delighted to see our relationship with the university continue with the donation of this Montreal landmark."

The Bronfman family has made a number of significant donations to McGill over the decades. Samuel Bronfman was a member of the university's board of governors, and his major gift was the financing of the faculty of managment's quarters.

Other contributions of note have been the establishment of the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada, the Saidye Rosner Bronfman Chair in Architectural History, the Minda de Gunzburg Chair in Oncology (named after the late daughter of Saidye and Samuel Bronfman), and the Seagram Sports Science Centre.

CELEBRATING 50 YEARS OF SEDERS: The Pomerantz family gathered in Thorold, Ont., to share Bubbie Freda's 50th Passover seder this year. Three generations of family came to the Niagara Peninsula from Thornhill, Toronto, Richmond Hill, Fonthill and Dundas, Ont., for the annual tradition. For several hours, the population of Thorold grew from its normal two – Freda and Gordon Pomerantz – to almost 30. The seder meal included Bubbie Freda's chicken soup and knaidlach, Aunty Joanie's tzimmis – a recipe passed down through the generations, spinach kugel imported from Dundas and kosher l'Pesach ketchup from Thornhill. Granddaughter Shauna Weinroth, 9, asked the Four Questions and the rest of the family shared in offering the answers. Bubbie Freda and Zaide Gordon are seen with grandchildren, back row, from left, Tyler Sharpe, Ryan Sharpe, Shauna Weinroth and Katie Mayerson; front row, from left, Justin Sharpe and Keith Mayerson.

Thanks again Toronto!

מה יהיה

בדבר אחד צודק שרון: הוא יכול לעשות את הפינוי הזה, בעוד שהשמאל היה פוגע את שרון בצד המתנגד.... גם את הגדה יכול שרון לפנות. אבל שישאר בינינו.

ישו ממלבורן- מאת יהורם פירוצקי

לאחר התלבטויות לא מעטות וקרב אבוד של המצפון נגד הסקרנות, הלכתי לראות את סרטו המדובר של מל גיבסון על ישו מנצרת, יהודי שהתקדם בחיים והפך להיות מצאצאו של נגר לגן של אלוהים. כמובן שללא מסע פרסום אדיר של ארגונים ועסקנים יהודיים בארה"ב שלא פסחו על אף מיקרופון, מצלמת טלויזיה או מערכת עיתון, קרוב לודאי שלא הייתי מודע ליצירה הקולנועית של מל. אך לאחר כל ההופעות המרשימות של הפעילים, קשה היה להתגבר על יצר הסקרנות והרצון לראות במה מדובר. וכך בעודי כרטיס כניסה שקניתי לסרט אחר כדי שחס וחלילה לא תגיע אף אגורה מכיסי הצנוע לכיסו המנופח של מל, נכנסתי לאולם שבו הקרינו את היצירה. כך נפל בחלקי הכבוד לראות את המסך את שיחזור שעות חיינו האחרונות של שולית הנגר מנצרת. ובמלים אחרות: במשך שעתיים תמימות מכבכים על המסך חיילים רומאים רפי מוח שמתעללים בבחור, חובטים, בועטים, מצליפים בעזרת כל מיני אביזרים משונים עד שהאיש הקדוש הופך משחקן אלמוני יפה תואר לקציצת בשר מהלכת על שניים. ואפילו לגבר קשוח כמוני שראה והנציח בשנות חיי מראות קשים בקוסובו ובוסניה, היה קשה לצפות בזוועות שמילאו את המסך.

ולסיום אזכיר את מרטין סקרוסיזה, במאי עם הרבה קבלות שהפיק וביים סרט על אותו נושא, שנכשל כשלון צורב בקופה למרות איכותו הקולנועית. לעומתו סירטו של גיבסון, שליגה גימל היא עבורו קומפלימנט, חצליח בעזרתם האדיבה של אירגונים יהודיים עם כוונות טובות להפוך את המיליונר האוסטראלי למיליארדר.

קבורה בארץ הקודש

בהמשך ל "חברים מספרים על ישו":

גוי אמריקאי נסע עם אשתו וחותנתו הישישה לארץ הקודש. לא נעים- נפטרה הזקנה בסיבוב פתח תקוות. אמר לו פקיד השגרירות האמריקנית: אתה יכול להטיס את הגופה לאמריקה ב-6000 דולאר, או לקבור אותה פה בארץ הקודש ב-150 דולאר.

חשב האיש וחשב ובסוף אמר: אני מטיס אותה לאמריקה. אמר לו הפקיד: לא חבל על הכסף!

ענה האיש: אצלכם בארץ הקודש שמעתי שקברו אחד לפני אלפיים שנה ושלושה ימים אחר כך הוא חזר לתחייה....אני לא יכול להרשות לעצמי דבר כזה עם החותנת שלי....

כנפיים שבורות.

"כנפיים שבורות", סרט ברמה אירופאית שנוצר בארץ הקודש, הגיע לטורונטו. מספרים לי שזה סרט ריאליסטי שנוגע בחיים. כדאי לרוץ, כי התסריטה עשויה להיות קצרה בלבד (אלה שהלכו לסרט של ישו קרוב לודאי שלא ירוצו). ב-Bayview Village.

Candy man thrives on matchmaking and planting trees

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

MONTREAL – When Nathan Scott learned last fall that his driver's licence wouldn't be renewed, the 86-year-old volunteer placed an advertisement in The Canadian Jewish News noting he would be unable to deliver 200 challahs door-to-door, as had been his custom every Rosh Hashanah since the 1980s.

The spry grandfather also informed CJN readers they could still rely on Scott "to tie the knot." As Scott puts it, "and not for money," that is, unless it's going toward trees in Israel. After 59 years of marriage, his wife Betty and daughters Robin, Susan, Judy and Barbra can vouch for his astute matchmaking ability.

Unlike Tevye, the father of five daughters in Fiddler on the Roof, Scott didn't need Yenta the Matchmaker. He spotted a perfect match for one of his daughters, who has been married 27 years, and another "fine gentleman" for his granddaughter, whose wedding he attended recently.

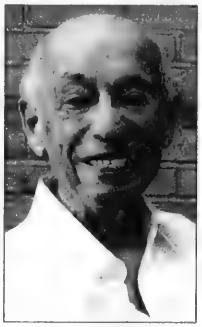
"The newlyweds expressed their gratitude by planting numerous trees in Israel," says Scott, who devotes five mornings a week to his labour of love at Jewish National Fund (JNF) offices.

This year alone, Scott raised close to $100,000 for trees for JNF.

"I have lots of contacts and so I'm able to call on a lot of people," says Scott, who keeps his trim physique by hopping on buses and taking brisk, long walks.

Since retiring 25 years ago, Scott has been attending early morning services at Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue. After services, he used to go for a swim at the YM-YWHA. Subsequently, he would trek to JNF, where he would spend the major part of his day.

Now that JNF has moved and he has to take the bus from Westmount to Cote St. Luc, it doesn't work out, he explains. "Now, I head for JNF right after services. But I do lots of walking, so I get my exercise."



Nathan Scott

Even bus drivers can't resist his charm, but Scott will tell you it's his Werther's Originals caramel candies that do the trick. Wherever Scott goes, he leaves a candy trail. Word of his candy exploits got back to Werther's head office, and company principals were so impressed with his finesse that they presented Scott with a huge box of the caramels.

Reflecting on his charitable pursuits, Scott says it began long before his retirement. Furthermore, if the family business, Scott LaSalle, had not closed, he says he would have continued working. Scott LaSalle was the second clothing company of its kind in Canada to become a public company. The business was founded by Scott's parents and built up by Scott and his brothers. Under the parent company, they had manufacturing and retail divisions.

Scott said no matter how busy he was at work, he always made time for family and community work. "I was still working when I was the chairman of Combined Jewish Appeal and my brother George also chaired it one year. A former administrator, Harris Gulco, got me involved in JNF."

Subsequently, Scott served as a national chair for JNF Canada. He recalls travelling and addressing Jewish communities throughout the country. Scott, a former Negev Dinner honoree, also has fond memories of his many missions to Israel.

"It's very serious what's going on in Israel now and so it's important for everybody to get involved and lend their support."

'Phytofoods' arm you against a variety of afflictions

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rosie Schwartz, dietician and author of The Enlightened Eater's Whole Foods Guide, is determined to change the way people eat.

"[To maintain] top-notch nutrition, we need a wide range of selections from all four food groups," says Schwartz, a nutritionist for 30 years and a spokesperson for the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

The key is to eat an assortment of "phytofoods," plant foods rich in disease-fighting compounds, which provide "an arsenal of weaponry against today's common afflictions," she says.

"We all know how important it is to eat a healthy diet that includes plenty of vitamins and minerals, but most of us know little about phytochemicals, compounds in plants that give them their colour, flavour and aroma.

"When consumed correctly, phytochemicals may reduce the risk of heart disease, cancer, osteoporosis and many other common yet serious ailments," she says.

Foods rich in these chemicals include greens such as broccoli, cabbage and brussels sprouts, as well as tomatoes, soy foods, whole grains, legumes and nuts, and berries such as blueberries and cranberries.

"Garlic, leeks, onions, scallions and chives can help fight some forms of cancer, high blood pressure and elevated blood cholesterol, and extra virgin olive oil contains a variety of substances including antioxidants that can provide extra protection against coronary heart disease. colon, breast and skin cancers," she says.

"Even mushrooms have phytochemicals, and when you add them to soup they are delicious."

Combining foods also helps, she says. "Tomatoes are a good source of lycopene, an antioxidant, and extra-virgin olive oil contains antioxidants. When eaten together, it boosts your body's absorption of lycopene."

"[Eating these foods] is something we can do to help protect ourselves against illness. There is no guarantee, but eating well does seem to have a good effect."

Schwartz says that as well as advising her clients to eat a good balance of foods, she teaches them to "tap into a proper meal pattern.

"If you eat enough protein at breakfast, you will eat less during the day. Without the right kind of breakfast, you will not be satisfied later in the day.

"You cannot make up for a poor breakfast at lunch. Breakfast affects your whole day. Without it your body prepares itself for famine. You tend to be tired, and you will crave food all day."

It is only in North America, she says, that breakfasts tend to be carbohydrate-based. "People in Japan, China and all over Europe eat proteins such as cheese, fish or eggs regularly at breakfast."

A good breakfast could be whole grain toast accompanied by at least 1/3 of a cup of cottage cheese, she says. "I recommend eating something as soon as you wake up. If you don't have time, eat a piece of cheese and fruit, and then have toast when you get to work."

ROASTED GARLIC HUMMUS

Besides being packed with soluble and insoluble fibre, chickpeas contain saponins, which have cholesterol-lowering and anti-cancer effects. Because the garlic is roasted, this purée is a milder version of the original. Serve with whole grain pita triangles or vegetable crudités. To roast garlic, preheat oven to 400. Slice 1/8 inch off the top of the head of garlic. Place on a double thickness of foil. Drizzle 1 teaspoon olive oil over garlic and wrap in foil to seal. Roast for 1 hour or until garlic is soft and forms a paste when a clove is squeezed. Unwrap to let cool. When cool enough to handle, squeeze garlic out from skins.

6 large cloves roasted garlic
2 19-oz. cans chickpeas, rinsed and drained
1/2 cup fresh lemon juice
3 tbsp. tahini (sesame seed paste)
3 tbsp. light mayonnaise
1/2-1 tsp. ground cumin
salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste paprika, for garnish (optional)

In a food processor, combine garlic, chickpeas, lemon juice, tahini, mayonnaise and cumin. Blend to a smooth consistency. Season with salt and pepper. Add more cumin, if desired. Transfer to a serving bowl and sprinkle with paprika, if using. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

CHICKEN, OLIVE AND ARUGULA SANDWICHES

Why buy a sandwich for lunch when you can dine on a delicious homemade one? This one shows that the garnishes make the sandwich. And garnishes can also substantially elevate the "phyto-power" of your sandwich. The olives, containing all the goodness of olive oil, and the dark leafy greens promote healthy arteries and good vision – all in one mighty tasty sandwich. When eating out, make note of tempting combos so you can add zest to your own sandwiches.

10 kalamata olives, pitted and finely chopped
1/4 cup light mayonnaise
1 tsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 tsp. balsamic vinegar
4 crusty whole grain rolls, split in half
4 grilled skinless boneless chicken breasts
1 bunch arugula, washed and trimmed

Stir together olives, mayonnaise, olive oil and balsamic vinegar. Spread 1 tablespoon of the olive mixture on bottom half of each roll. Top with chicken and arugula. Top with second half of the roll. Makes 4 servings.

CHICKPEA MUSHROOM BURGERS

For meat eaters and vegetarians alike, these are reminiscent of falafel. By substituting these for burgers made from meat, there's a double benefit: less artery-clogging saturated fat along with a hefty serving of artery-friendly soluble fibre and antioxidants.

3 tsp. vegetable oil
1 small onion, finely chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 cup chopped mushrooms (about 4 oz.)
1 10-oz. can chickpeas, rinsed and drained
2 slices bread, moistened with water and squeezed dry
1 tsp. ground cumin
1/2 tsp. ground coriander
1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. freshly ground pepper
4 pitas or crusty rolls (preferably whole grain)
sliced tomatoes, lettuce and spiced tahini dressing

In a large non-stick skillet, heat 1 tsp. of the oil over medium-high heat. Add onion and garlic; sauté until onion is softened, 3 to 4 minutes. Add mushrooms and continue to cook until moisture evaporates, another 2 to 3 minutes. Transfer mixture to a food processor. Wipe skillet to remove any of the vegetable mixture.

Eat foods rich in phytochemicals

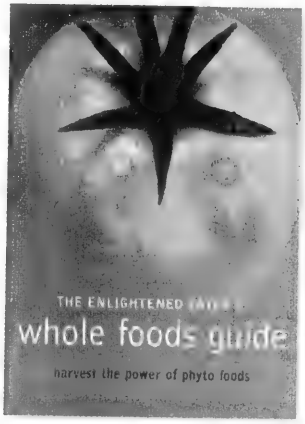
To the mushroom mixture, add chickpeas, cumin, coriander, salt and pepper; process until finely chopped. Shape gently into 4 patties. Add remaining 2 teaspoons oil to skillet and heat over medium heat. Add patties and cook for 4 to 5 minutes or until bottom is golden brown. Turn patties and cook another 4 to 5 minutes or until golden brown.

Serve in pitas or rolls, topped with tomato, lettuce and spiced tahini dressing. Makes 4 burgers.

BLACK BEAN CHILI

The goodness of chili in a flash. The range of ingredients provides a powerful phytochemical mix. This chili is packed with a rainbow of carotenoids and allium family members and their perks, topped off with a hit of both soluble and insoluble fibre.



2 tsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 cup chopped onions
3 large cloves garlic, finely chopped
1 green bell pepper, diced
1 cup ½ cubes zucchini (about 1 medium)
1 tsp. finely chopped jalapeno pepper
2 19-oz. cans black beans, rinsed and drained
1 20-oz. can whole tomatoes, coarsely chopped, with juice
1 cup frozen corn kernels
1 tbsp. chili powder
1 tsp. ground cumin
1 tsp. dried oregano
salt, to taste
3 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander, for garnish shredded light cheddar cheese, for garnish (optional)

Heat oil in a large, heavy pot over medium heat. Add onions and garlic, and sauté for 5 minutes. Add green pepper, zucchini and jalapeno pepper, then sauté another 3 minutes. Add black beans, tomatoes and their juice, corn, chili powder, cumin and oregano. Reduce heat to medium-low and simmer, uncovered and stirring occasionally, for 30 minutes. Season with salt. Serve garnished with coriander and light cheddar, if using. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

BANANA FLAX BREAD

Banana and flax make a great combination. Here they are in an updated version of a favourite from Schwartz's book The Enlightened Eater. Flaxseeds have it all in one little package: soluble fibre with its blood sugar and cholesterol-lowering perks, omega-3 fatty acids with their myriad advantages, and lignins and their anti-cancer action.

1½ cups whole wheat flour
2 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. cinnamon
¼ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
pinch of nutmeg
½ cup sugar
⅓ cup ground flaxseed
3 tbsp. wheat germ
2 eggs
1 cup mashed ripe bananas
¼ cup vegetable oil
⅓ cup carob or chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease and flour a 9 x 5-inch loaf pan. In a large bowl, sift together flour, baking powder, cinnamon, baking soda, salt and nutmeg. Stir in sugar, flaxseed and wheat germ. Beat eggs, bananas and oil together in a medium bowl.

Pour into the centre of the dry ingredients and stir only until the mixture is moistened. Stir in the carob chips. Pour batter into the loaf pan. Bake for 50 to 60 minutes or until a toothpick inserted into centre comes out clean. Cool for 10 minutes, then remove from the pan. Cool completely on a wire rack. Makes 18 slices.

DATE NUT BREAD WITH PISTACHIOS

Adapted from a recipe from the California Pistachio Commission, this one is sure to become a regular in your household. Vitamin E, phytosterols and a healthy fat profile – no wonder research shows that the pistachio is a nut your heart will love.

1 cup boiling water
1 cup dates, chopped
¾ cup all-purpose flour
½ cup whole wheat flour
½ cup natural pistachios, coarsely chopped
½ cup sugar
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
2 eggs, beaten
2 tbsp. soft margarine, melted
1 tsp. grated orange zest
1 tsp. vanilla

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9 x 5-inch loaf pan. In a small bowl, pour boiling water over dates and let soak until cool (do not drain). In a large bowl, stir together all-purpose flour, whole wheat flour, pistachios, sugar, baking powder, baking soda and salt.

In a separate bowl, combine dates with their soaking water, eggs, margarine, orange zest and vanilla. Stir wet ingredients into flour mixture and mix only until moistened. Spoon into the loaf pan. Bake for 45 to 50 minutes or until a toothpick inserted near centre comes out clean.

Cool for 10 minutes, then remove from pan. Cool completely on a wire rack. Makes 18 slices.

OBITUARY FOR SAM NERENBERG ז"ל

Sam Nerenberg passed away on Saturday, April 10, 2004 after a long illness. Jean, his wife of fifty-seven years, was at his side.

Sam was born on July 13, 1911 in Staszow, Poland. He is pre-deceased by his sisters, Sarah and Frieda and brothers Jack, Max and Harry.

Sam survived the horrors of the concentration camps at Pionky, Birkeneau and Auschwitz, but endured and went on to build a successful business and a warm, embracing family life.

After the war Sam re-met and married Jean (nee Greenberg of Opatow, Poland) and moved to Belgium where their son David was born. The family left Belgium in 1949 and settled in New York for 5 years before moving to Toronto, Canada in 1955 where Sam built a successful home building business. In 2001, when he was ninety years old, Sam and Jean moved to Dallas where their son, David Nerenberg and his family had settled in 1978.

Sam was a warm, gentle man, devoted to his family. His greatest pride and deepest joy was his family. He is survived by his wife Jean, son David, daughter-in-law Linda, grandchildren Jeremy (and Ann), Marly (and Stephen Goldblatt) and Rory, great grandson Julian and many nieces and nephews.

Donations may be made to The Dallas Holocaust Memorial Center, 7900 Northhaven Road, Dallas 75230

Israel may target Hamas leadership in Syria

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will consider attacking Hamas' compound in Damascus should the organization move its main power base to Syria following the assassinations of its former leaders Sheikh Ahmed Yassin and Abdel Aziz Rantisi in Gaza.

There is no proof at this stage that orders to carry out terror attacks are being delivered by Hamas leaders in Damascus to members of the organization in Gaza and the West Bank. However, during meetings held recently by Israeli political and security officials, participants agreed that should intelligence information point to Damascus as Hamas' nerve centre, the option of targeting the organization in Syria could be considered.

Given Hezbollah's increasing support for Palestinian terror, Israel will also consider attacking Hezbollah targets in Lebanon, according to Israeli sources.

Following the March 22 assassination of Yassin, his successor Rantisi deviated from Hamas policy and encouraged Hezbollah and Iran to become directly involved in the organization's terror activity. This was one of the reasons why Israel decided to assassinate him. Continued Hezbollah involvement in Palestinian terror would pose a serious risk to the lives of the Shi'ite organization's leaders, Israeli security officials have warned.

Shortly after Saturday's assassination of Rantisi, Damascus-based Hamas leader Khaled Mashal announced that the identity of the new Hamas leader in Gaza would not be disclosed.

Hamas has yet to decide on Rantisi's successor. In principle, Mahmoud a-Zahar, who was considered Rantisi's deputy, is supposed to head the organization. However, Israeli intelligence has learned that a-Zahar has sent signals to fellow Hamas leaders both in Gaza and overseas, particularly Mashal, that he does not want the top post, and certainly does not want it to be made public.

Israeli officials assume a-Zahar's reluctance is due to the killing of Yassin and Rantisi, as well as an assassination attempt against him last summer in which he was injured and one of his sons was killed.

The new Hamas leader in Gaza would not be disclosed

In all likelihood, a collective leadership arrangement will materialize in Gaza that will include a-Zahar. Other prominent Hamas figures who might play a role include Ismail Haniyeh, Sa'id Siam, and Nizar I'an.

A top Israeli security official said Sunday that any figure who replaces Rantisi will be a potential assassination target. "Hamas, as a whole, is a ticking time bomb," the official said. "If they end the terror attacks, we'll end the activity against their leaders."

Speaking at a Holocaust Day ceremony Sunday night, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said that "we will not cease to hunt down the killers of our children."

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon also vowed Sunday that Israel's policy of "making an effort on the one hand to advance a political process and on the other hand to hit the terror organizations and their leaders will continue."

The White House Sunday declined to criticize Rantisi's assassination, saying instead that Israel "has the right to defend itself from terrorist attacks," and urging restraint in the region.

But Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia said the killing was a "direct result" of encouragement from the United States "and the complete bias of the American administration toward the Israeli government."

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw termed the killing "unlawful" and "counterproductive," while European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana said, "Israel has a right to protect its citizens from terrorist attacks, but actions of this type are not only unlawful, they are not conducive to lowering tension."

Bush says return to Green Line 'unrealistic'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — U.S. President George W. Bush said last week that Israel has a claim on some West Bank areas and that "new realities on the ground" would have to be taken into consideration during final status negotiations with the Palestinians.

Bush was speaking at a press conference following a two-hour meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon at the White House.

Bush said Palestinian refugees should be settled in a Palestinian state and not in Israel, adding that he was committed to the security of Israel as a vibrant Jewish state.

"In light of new realities on the ground, including already existing major Israeli population centres, it is unrealistic to expect that the outcome of final status negotiations will be a full and complete return to the armistice lines of 1949," Bush said during a news conference with Sharon.

An elated Sharon said his disengagement plan would create "a new and better reality for the state of Israel" and emphasized it would improve the country's security and economy.

Sharon, who smiled ebulliently during the exchange with reporters, said he was encouraged by Bush's support for his plan, which the Israeli leader had sought as a way to boost his own party's support.

The statement and letters Bush and Sharon exchanged could go a long way toward helping the Israeli leader push his plan to scrap 21 Jewish settlements in Gaza and four in the West Bank through a binding vote in his right-wing Likud party on May 2.

"These are historic and courageous actions," Bush said about the Gaza withdrawal. "If all parties choose to embrace this moment, they can open the door to progress and put an end to one of the world's longest-running conflicts."

Both the Palestinians and Israelis have responsibilities in the search for peace, Bush said. Israel has "stepped up to those responsibilities," he said, and Palestinians must do the same.

The U.S. president said working together could help build democratic Palestinian institutions, and he said Sharon's plan could lead to a peaceful, democratic, viable Palestinian state.

He also said it is up to responsible Palestinian, Europeans and Americans to play a role in developing such a state.

Regarding the separation barrier being constructed by Israel in the West Bank, Bush said it should be a security barrier and be temporary rather than permanent.

When asked by a reporter if U.S. policy in the Middle East favours Israel, Bush responded by saying the United States is "tilted" towards peace. He also challenged the Palestinians to match Sharon's boldness and courage.

Meanwhile, a top-level meeting of the international quartet that is sponsoring the "road map" Mideast peace plan – the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union – is due to take place in Berlin on April 28, a senior European Union diplomat said last week.

Answering questions on Bush's support for Israel's claim to parts of the West Bank, Solana said the road map remains the basic framework for a final deal. Russia had earlier backed Palestinian Authority calls for an urgent meeting of the quartet to iron out apparent differences with Washington.

Not the next Balfour Declaration

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Whoever tries to present U.S. President George W. Bush's statements last week with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon as the second Balfour Declaration in terms of their importance to Israel is getting carried away. The most significant aspect for Israel was the emphasis placed on the fact that a solution for Palestinian refugees will be found outside the borders of the Jewish state, as Israel has long demanded.

In other words, if a "right of return" exists, it will be realized inside a future Palestinian state, and not inside Israel, which Bush once again defined as a Jewish state.

On the territorial front, however, Israel scored only a partial victory, and it would do well not to ignore Bush's words. The American leader again promised the Palestinians a viable state, and a state can't be viable when it's made up of patches of territory. Palestine will be a state whose borders will be determined in negotiations that take UN Security Council Resolution 242 into account, and not by a temporary separation fence being built today to thwart terror attacks.

In his comments, Bush did not mention settlement blocs, but Sharon will want to grab on to the president's comment that "new realities on the ground" will have to be taken into account. The settlement blocs are part of the new reality, but we must not forget that this reality has another side to it: the growth of Palestinian Jerusalem and the hundreds of thousands of Palestinians who have settled in the Jerusalem area and its neighbourhoods. The demographic change started on the Palestinian side, with a high birth rate and widespread poverty that serves as fertile ground for terror groups.

One shouldn't expect that Ma'aleh Adumim will be recognized as part of Israel because of the change in the reality on the ground, while the Palestinian neighbourhoods in the Jerusalem area that have expanded will not be equally recognized and allowed to become part of the State of Israel. The meaning of the new reality on the ground in Jerusalem cannot be that the whole of the city will be Israeli.

The main dilemma facing Bush was how to accept Sharon's plan for evacuating settlements, but not to make exaggerated concessions to the Israeli leader and harm America's standing as an accepted and credible broker between Israel and the Palestinians. Were Washington to lose its status as a mediator, this could also be harmful to Israel. A U.S. mediator is preferable to Israel over a European mediator working hand-in-hand with the United Nations and Russia.

Europe and the UN are pushing for full international involvement – something Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat has long demanded – even before any agreement has been reached between the sides, and even for the imposition of a solution on Israel.

Any mediator, therefore, who wants to be accepted by both sides can't afford to adopt final positions on matters of principle tied to a future final status agreement between Israel and the Palestinians. The area and borders of a Palestinian state, therefore, cannot be determined in talks between Bush and Sharon, or between U.S. National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice and Sharon's chief of staff Dov Weisglass.

What will remain to be negotiated between Israel and the Palestinians if cardinal matters are determined without the involvement of the Palestinians?

Sharon's plan drew compliments from Bush, who said he is taking brave steps that could lead to a historic process. Bush, however, repeatedly referred to these moves as a beginning. The expectation, therefore, is for the evacuation of more settlements to allow for the transfer of more territory to the Palestinians.

Arafat did not get a mention, but Bush expects the Palestinian leadership will also take brave steps to implement reforms and fight terror. A similar overture was made on a number of occasions – in Bush's speech in June 2002 in which he outlined his vision for the Middle East, and before that by former U.S. president Bill Clinton. Such steps were also mentioned in the "road map" peace plan, in the Mitchell Report and the Zinni mission. None of these calls however, have produced results, only more violence.

Passover exodus to Egypt

This year's Passover holiday saw a mini-exodus of Israeli tourists to Egypt, a modern reversal of the biblical story.

During the first 10 days of April, 27,000 Israelis visited the Sinai Peninsula. The majority entered Sinai after the first night of Passover.

Ya'alon: weapons in Iraq

Israeli army Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon still believes weapons of mass destruction will be found in Iraq. However, he said recently Israeli intelligence "always spoke of a capability of small amounts," and not something greater. "When we heard inaccurate statements by the British and the Americans, we made them aware of this, before the war. They said something on the nuclear subject and we made it clear to them that according to our information, this was not correct," Ya'alon said.

Terror averted in Jordan

A terror cell seized over a week ago in Jordan planned to carry out a large-scale chemical attack in a military intelligence base in the kingdom, according to the London-based Arab daily Al Hayat. Jordanian officials told the paper that security forces captured three car bombs containing chemicals. The cell entered Jordan through Syria at the end of March, with three cars laden with explosives and weapons.

Stability of Temple Mount

Six Egyptian and Jordanian engineers last week began testing the stability of the eastern wall of Jerusalem's Temple Mount. The appraisal comes weeks after Israel's Antiquities Authority reported the 2,000-year-old wall was in danger of collapse as a result of a Feb. 11 earthquake that measured five on the Richter scale. For the past year, another team of Jordanian workers has been repairing a bulge on the southern wall of the holy site.

Tunnel discovered in Gaza

Israeli forces on a tunnel-hunting mission in the Gaza Strip clashed with Palestinian gunmen. The Israeli army said its forces discovered an access point to an arms-smuggling tunnel buried 18 feet underground during the raid last week on the Rafah refugee camp. Terrorist groups use the secret passages to bring in weapons from nearby Egypt and fuel fighting in the Gaza Strip. At least 20 Palestinians were wounded in the gunfights with Rafah gunmen that were sparked by the raid.

A new Sabbath queen?

Madonna will not play on Friday nights during her upcoming tour, which includes Israel. The move by the singer comes as her interest in Kabbalah appears to be broadening. Though Madonna is not Jewish, "she is observing Shabbat on Friday evenings," her longtime publicist, Liz Rosenberg, told New York magazine.

Vanunu: What I did was not treason

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Nuclear whistleblower Mordechai Vanunu, who was due to be released from an Israeli jail on Wednesday after 18 years, says he does not believe that what he did constitutes treason or espionage.

"I claim that I wanted to tell the world about what was happening," he said in a recording of a meeting at his cell in Ashkelon's Shikma Prison last month with a senior defence establishment official and a Shin Bet representative.

When asked if it constituted treason, he said, "I will tell you in my own words: this is not treason, it is informing the world, unlike Israel's policies."

Vanunu said Israel should not have trusted him with sensitive information and that the "bigshot psychologists" from the Shin Bet and the Mossad spy security services should have spotted him as a potential security risk.

"You gave information to the wrong man," he was quoted as saying.

Vanunu went on to slam Israel.

"There is no need for a Jewish state," he said, adding that a Palestinian state should be established instead where the Jews can also live.

He also complained that no actions were taken against Israel after the details he revealed on its nuclear program.

"Despite everything that was published, nothing has changed. No one came to Israel and made demands [of it]."

When asked if that is what he wanted will happen, he said, "Just as they destroyed the Iraqi nuclear reactor, I want the Israeli nuclear reactor destroyed." Israel bombed the Iraqi reactor in 1981.

The former nuclear technician at Dimona's top-secret atomic facility also denied he is writing a book. "I write letters, I write my political opinions. Is that wrong?"

Mordechai Vanunu

He claimed the information he has on the nuclear reactor in the southern Israeli town of Dimona is not longer relevant.

"I've been inside for 20 years, everything has changed… science and technology have progressed in huge leaps, so what I saw seems to me to be very old. I don't think that the Americans or Europeans need this information. They do not need Vanunu to tell them. If they want information, they will get it… As for myself, I just want to repeat the things I already said and that were published."

Vanunu was snatched from Rome by the Mossad in 1986 after being lured into a rendezvous by a female agent, smuggled to Israel by yacht, tried behind closed doors and sentenced to 18 years for treason.

The recording of the interview has been passed on to a special public relations committee set up recently by government ministries to co-ordinate Vanunu's release. The tape was passed to Israeli television stations Channel 1 and 10 and will be broadcast Monday evening. Channel 10 passed the tape onto the Israeli daily newspapers Yediot Aharonot and Ma'ariv.

The Prisons Service decided to videotape Vanunu a short time after the audio tape was made, but without the defence officials' knowledge. A complaint was then filed with Attorney General Menachem Mazuz who is currently looking into the matter. Mazuz did, however, permit the public relations committee to publish the tapes in the media.

Vanunu has filed a complaint with defence officials against releasing the videotape, saying he was told that his privacy would not be infringed.

A ceremony is planned to mark the prisoner's long-awaited release. Peace activists and anti-nuclear campaigners from the United States, Britain, Japan, Ireland, Poland, Hungary and other countries have been arriving in Israel since last week. Those scheduled to attend included Nobel Peace Prize laureate Mairead Maguire of Northern Ireland, actress Susannah York, British parliamentarians Jeremy Corbyn and Colin Breed, and Reverend Bruce Kent, president of the British Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. Letters of support by playwright Harold Pinter, actress Emma Thompson and London Mayor Ken Livingstone were to be read during the ceremony outside the prison.

Joining the foreigners were a few hundred Israelis, who held a solidarity watch outside the prison gates Tuesday before welcoming Vanunu on his release the next day. Local and international television crews broadcast live from the scene.

Intel Israel heralds chip breakthrough

By ODED HERMONI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A team of Israeli researchers at Intel has achieved a breakthrough in chip development that promises to change the world of computing and telecommunications within five to 10 years.

For the first time, the team succeeded in developing electro-optical chipsets based on silicon wafers capable of converting electronic signals to optic signals within the chip. They have the potential to be mass produced at the same cost as standard electronic chips.

Intel believes the electro-optic chips developed during the past year and a half at the company's Jerusalem facility will replace the standard electronic chips used for communications between computer components, allowing this communication to be conducted at the speed of light – 10 times the current speed.

"Today, the fast processors operate at speeds of three gigahertz, but their surroundings still work at speeds of hundreds of megahertz and therefore don't succeed in exploiting their speeds," explained Amir Elstein, the co-CEO of Intel Israel and director of Intel's Jerusalem facility.

"When the chips, the processor and the ports of the computer speak at the same speed, which will be about 10 gigahertz, the computer's capability will be totally different," he added.

The new development will also change the multi-leg appearance of today's chipsets. "There will still be several legs on each chip, but most of the information will be transferred via a single optic opening of one optic port," Elstein said.

The company has not yet completed planning the production of the new optical devices, Elstein said last week, but added that Intel's Kiryat Gat plant may be involved.

Canadian remembers Rwandan genocide

By BLAKE LAMBERT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

KIGALI, Rwanda — Dancila Nyirabazungu, 50, cleans up the dirt, but not the remains of the dead, at Ntarama Church in Nyamata, located in a rural district of Kigali province.

Scores of neatly-stacked skulls line the shelves at the back of the building, sharing space with hundreds of bones. The floor is a swamp of tattered clothes and skeletal remains.

Nyirabazungu is bound to her work by memory and fate: This massacre site could have been her burial ground.

At the outbreak of the Rwandan genocide in April 1994, Nyirabazungu, her husband and two daughters came to this church about 90 minutes from the capital of Kigali to seek shelter.

On April 15, Rwandan soldiers and militiamen, who had promised to protect those inside, stormed the church with grenades and machetes.

"They broke down the church and threw in grenades as some also broke down the door to enter," Nyirabazungu told JTA. "As people were being hacked, I decided to lie down. And as they were hacked, all the dead bodies fell over me."

Hutu extremists killed 5,000 people at Ntarama Church, including Nyirabazungu's husband, two children and her in-laws' family.

Almost 50 years after the Holocaust and a promise from the international community that genocide would never again be tolerated, no one bothered to enforce that principle in Rwanda, a tiny central African nation.

In 100 days from April through early July of 1994, Hutu extremists killed at least 800,000 people, mostly Tutsi, in perhaps the most efficient orgy of murder in history.

That has led Gerald Caplan, a Canadian Jew and Africa expert, to establish an international project called "Remembering Rwanda" to ensure that the Rwandan genocide is never forgotten after the international community's failure to act.

The goals of the project include attracting international attention for the genocide on its 10th anniversary – which was marked April 7 – preserving its memory through documentation and education, and campaigning with like-minded groups against all genocides.

"I take from the Holocaust a universalistic rather than particularistic lesson," Caplan told JTA. "All that means is that I think that the Holocaust shows that 'never again' should be for the whole world."

Declassified U.S. documents confirm that officials in the administration of fomer president Bill Clinton knew what was happening in Rwanda but didn't intervene.

"Hutu security elements from the presidential guard, gendarmerie, and military yesterday killed several government officials – including the prime minister – took at least two hostages, and killed numerous Tutsi civilians in Kigali," the CIA's April 8, 1994, National Intelligence Daily said. "What remains of Rwanda's civilian leadership and moderate senior military officials appear unable to restore order."

A confidential U.S. State Department memo on the same day contained a similar message, indicating that the "Rwandan army is killing officials and Tutsis, and the UN is unable to control the situation."

Caplan blames the United States for refusing to allow reinforcements to be sent to the UN mission in Rwanda, and he faults Britain for fully backing the United States in the UN Security Council.

> 'The Holocaust shows that "never again" should be for the whole world'

Meanwhile, France, according to Caplan, is worthy of scorn for its involvement – which included sympathy, support and military training – with the Hutu regime before and during the genocide.

Caplan became immersed in the events of that period when he wrote a report called Rwanda: The Preventable Genocide for a panel of the now-defunct Organization of African Unity.

According to Caplan, the plan by a group of Rwanda's majority Hutus to exterminate the Tutsi minority can be compared to the Nazis' genocidal plan 50 years earlier.

"The most important parallel is that a small group of people wanted to wipe out an entire group because of who they were rather than what they did. And that parallel is exactly the same with Germany of the Nazis and the Jews," he said. "This small group of Hutu extremists decided that their world would be a lot better off, would be cleansed, would be sanitized, if there were no Tutsis left in this country."

The genocide failed to expunge the Tutsis and their memories from Rwanda. The Tutsi-dominated Rwandan Patriotic Front, whose army put an end to the genocide when it overthrew the Hutu regime, now runs Rwanda, albeit repressively. The Rwandan Patriotic Front's leader, Paul Kagame, was overwhelmingly elected president in August 2003 in an election that observers described as unfair.

In an effort to rebuild the country, Kagame and the Rwandan Patriotic Front have preached reconciliation by allowing killers to apologize for their crimes in exchange for early prison releases. They have also established village courts where victims and survivors can confront murderers, and have pushed people to accept the idea of "Rwandaness," an attempt to obliterate ethnic distinctions among the country's tribes.

Yet for all those efforts, Rwanda is still home to a population in extreme pain and suffering that may never heal.

Rwandans, especially Tutsis who suffered, feel a kinship with the Jews, which extends to Israel and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Caplan said. Kagame's government is probably the most pro-Israel in Africa, he noted.

"I've told Rwandans publicly that I was Jewish, and they suddenly thought they therefore understood why I was interested in them," he said. "Before that they couldn't understand – 'What was this white guy doing in our affairs? Why does he care?' When they discovered I was Jewish, it's suddenly as if a light went on for them."

Correspondence of Diplomacy

The following letters on the disengagement plan were exchanged by U.S. President George W. Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon during their meeting April 14 at the White House.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Thank you for your letter setting out your disengagement plan.

The United States remains hopeful and determined to find a way forward toward a resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute. I remain committed to my June 24, 2002 vision of two states living side by side in peace and security as the key to peace, and to the road map peace plan as the route to get there.

We welcome the disengagement plan you have prepared, under which Israel would withdraw certain military installations and all settlements from Gaza, and withdraw certain military installations and settlements in the West Bank. These steps described in the plan will mark real progress toward realizing my June 24, 2002 vision, and make a real contribution toward peace. We also understand that, in this context, Israel believes it is important to bring new opportunities to the Negev and the Galilee. We are hopeful that steps pursuant to this plan, consistent with my vision, will remind all states and parties of their own obligations under the road map peace plan.

The United States appreciates the risks such an undertaking represents. I therefore want to reassure you on several points.

First, the United States remains committed to my vision and to its implementation as described in the road map. The United States will do its utmost to prevent any attempt by anyone to impose any other plan. Under the road map, Palestinians must undertake an immediate cessation of armed activity and all acts of violence against Israelis anywhere, and all official Palestinian institutions must end incitement against Israel. The Palestinian leadership must act decisively against terror, including sustained, targeted and effective operations to stop terrorism and dismantle terrorist capabilities and infrastructure. Palestinians must undertake a comprehensive and fundamental political reform that includes a strong parliamentary democracy and an empowered prime minister.

Second, there will be no security for Israelis or Palestinians until they and all states, in the region and beyond, join together to fight terrorism and dismantle terrorist organizations. The United States reiterates its steadfast commitment to Israel's security, including secure, defensible borders, and to preserve and strengthen Israel's capability to deter and defend itself, by itself, against any threat or possible combination of threats.

Third, Israel will retain its right to defend itself against terrorism, including to take actions against terrorist organizations. The United States will lead efforts, working together with Jordan, Egypt and others in the international community, to build the capacity and will of Palestinian institutions to fight terrorism, dismantle terrorist organizations and prevent the areas from which Israel has withdrawn from posing a threat that would have to be addressed by any other means. The United States understands that after Israel withdraws from Gaza and/or parts of the West Bank, and pending agreements on other arrangements, existing arrangements regarding control of air space, territorial waters and land passages of the West Bank and Gaza will continue. The United States is strongly committed to Israel's security and well-being as a Jewish state. It seems clear that an agreed, just, fair and realistic framework for a solution to the Palestinian refugee issue as part of any final status agreement will need to be found through the establishment of a Palestinian state, and the settling of Palestinian refugees there, rather than in Israel.

As part of a final peace settlement, Israel must have secure and recognized borders, which should emerge from negotiations between the parties, in accordance with United Nations Resolutions 242 and 338. In light of new realities on the ground, including already existing major Israeli populations centres, it is unrealistic to expect that the outcome of final status negotiations will be a full and complete return to the armistice lines of 1949, and all previous efforts to negotiate a two-state solution have reached the same conclusion. It is realistic to expect that any final status agreement will only be achieved on the basis of mutually agreed changes that reflect these realities.

I know that, as you state in your letter, you are aware that certain responsibilities face the State of Israel. Among these, your government has stated that the barrier being erected by Israel should be a security rather than a political barrier, should be temporary rather than permanent, and therefore not prejudice any final status issues, including final borders, and its route should take into account, consistent with security needs, its impact on Palestinians not engaged in terrorist activities.

As you know, the United States supports the establishment of a Palestinian state that is viable, contiguous, sovereign and independent, so that the Palestinian people can build their own future in accordance with my vision set forth in June 2002 and with the path set forth in the road map peace plan. The United States will join with others in the international community to foster the development of democratic political institutions and new leadership committed to those institutions, the reconstruction of civic institutions, the growth of a free and prosperous economy and the building of capable security institutions dedicated to maintaining law and order and dismantling terrorist organizations.

A peace settlement negotiated between Israelis and Palestinians would be a great boon not only to those peoples but to the peoples of the entire region. Accordingly, the United States believes that all states in the region have special responsibilities: to support the building of the institutions of a Palestinian state; to fight terrorism, and cut off all forms of assistance to individuals and groups engaged in terrorism; and to begin now to move toward more normal relations with the State of Israel. These actions would be true contributions to building peace in the region.

Mr. Prime Minister, you have described a bold and historic initiative that can make an important contribution to peace. I commend your efforts and your courageous decision which I support. As a close friend and ally, the United States intends to work closely with you to help make it a success.

Sincerely,
George W. Bush

Dear Mr. President,

The vision that you articulated in your 24 June 2002 address constitutes one of the most significant contributions toward ensuring a bright future for the Middle East. Accordingly, the State of Israel has accepted the road map peace plan, as adopted by our government. For the first time, a practical and just formula was presented for the achievement of peace, opening a genuine window of opportunity for progress toward a settlement between Israel and the Palestinians, involving two states living side-by-side in peace and security.

This formula sets forth the correct sequence and principles for the attainment of peace. Its full implementation represents the sole means to make genuine progress. As you have stated, a Palestinian state will never be created by terror, and Palestinians must engage in a sustained fight against the terrorists and dismantle their infrastructure. Moreover, there must be serious efforts to institute true reform and real democracy and liberty, including new leaders not compromised by terror. We are committed to this formula as the only avenue through which an agreement can be reached. We believe that this formula is the only viable one.

The Palestinian Authority (PA), under its current leadership, has taken no action to meet its responsibilities under the road map peace plan. Terror has not ceased, reform of the Palestinian security services has not been undertaken and real institutional reforms have not taken place. The State of Israel continues to pay the heavy cost of constant terror. Israel must preserve its capability to protect itself and deter its enemies, and we thus retain our right to defend ourselves against terrorism and to take actions against terrorist organizations.

Having reached the conclusion that, for the time being, there exists no Palestinian partner with whom to advance peacefully toward a settlement, and since the current impasse is unhelpful to the achievement of our shared goals, I have decided to initiate a process of gradual disengagement with the hope of reducing friction between Israelis and Palestinians. The disengagement plan is designed to improve security for Israel and stabilize our political and economic situation. It will enable us to deploy our forces more effectively until such time that conditions in the PA allow for the full implementation of the road map peace plan to resume.

I attach, for your review, the main principles of the disengagement plan. This initiative, which we are not undertaking under the road map, represents an independent Israeli plan, yet is not inconsistent with the road map. According to this plan, the State of Israel intends to relocate military installations and all Israeli villages and towns in the Gaza Strip, as well as other military installations and a small number of villages in Samaria.

In this context, we also plan to accelerate construction of the security fence, whose completion is essential in order to ensure the security of the citizens of Israel. The fence is a security rather than a political barrier, temporary rather than permanent, and therefore will not prejudice any final status issues, including final borders. The route of the fence, as approved by our government's decisions, will take into account, consistent with security needs, its impact on Palestinians engaged in terrorist activities.

Upon my return from Washington, I expect to submit the plan for the approval of the Cabinet and the Knesset, and I firmly believe that it will win such approval.

The disengagement plan will create a new and better reality for the State of Israel, enhance its security and economy, and strengthen the fortitude of its people. In this context, I believe it is important to bring new opportunities to the Negev and Galilee. Additionally, the plan will entail a series of measures with the inherent potential to improve the lot of the PA, providing that it demonstrates the wisdom to take advantage of this opportunity. The execution of the disengagement plan holds the prospect of stimulating positive changes within the PA that might create the necessary conditions for the resumption of direct negotiations.

We view the achievement of a settlement between Israel and the Palestinians as our central focus and are committed to realizing this objective. Progress toward this goal must be anchored exclusively in the road map and we will oppose any other plan.

In this regard, we are fully aware of the responsibilities facing the State of Israel. These include limitations on the growth of settlements; removal of unauthorized outposts; and steps to increase, to the extent permitted by security needs, freedom of movement for Palestinians not engaged in terrorism. Under separate cover, we are sending to you a full description of the steps the State of Israel is taking to meet all its responsibilities.

The government of Israel supports the United States' efforts to reform Palestinian security services to meet their road map peace plan obligations to fight terror. Israel also supports the Americans' efforts, working with the international community, to promote the reform process, build institutions and improve the economy of the PA and to enhance the welfare of its people, in the hope that a new Palestinian leadership will prove able to fulfil its obligations under the road map.

I want to again express my appreciation for your courageous leadership in the war against global terror, your important initiative to revitalize the Middle East as a more fitting home for its people and, primarily, your personal friendship and profound support for the State of Israel.

Sincerely,
Ariel Sharon

Jewish film fest kicks off with Israeli world premiere

The 12th annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival will be running at three locations this year, a sign the event is getting bigger and better.

"The past few years have brought significant audience growth with approximately 25,000 people attending last year," said Helen Zukerman, the festival's co-founder and executive director.

"To accommodate this growth, we've added the 281-seat Al Green Theatre [at the Miles Nadal JCC] as a second venue."

This year's festival will kick-off May 1 at 9:30 p.m. with a gala opening night at the Varsity Cinema in the Manulife Centre (55 Bloor St. W). The opening night film is the world premiere of Behind Enemy Lines, by Israeli filmmaker Dov Gil-Har.

All other films and events will be held at the Bloor Cinema (506 Bloor St. W.) and the Al Green Theatre (750 Spadina Ave.)

"The way to describe this year's festival will have to be 'more,'" Zukerman said. "More theatres, more films and more free programs."

Each year, the festival selects the best films on Jewish themes from around the world. This year, it's presenting 88 films in 16 languages from 19 countries, including Canada, Israel, Russia and South Africa.

There are 21 feature films, 37 documentaries, 22 shorts and 8 international films originally made for television. There are 9 world premieres, 14 North American premieres, 19 Canadian premieres and 8 Toronto premieres.

In addition, there are 7 free programs, including the week-long series "A Conversation With...," which features an onstage conversation with one filmmaker/special guest each weekday.

The pre-festival box office is at 17 Madison Ave., 1st floor (Spadina & Bloor). Call 416-324-9121, or fax 416-324-8668.

Opening night tickets are $20, general admission is $10, and seniors and students are $6.

Weekday matinees (Monday to Friday before 5 p.m.) are $6. An "All-You-Can-Sit" pass is $200. "The Regular Deal" – your choice of 20 films – is $125. The "Weekday Special" – all films before 5 p.m. – is $60.

Hot Docs film fest showcases Middle East problems

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Billed as North America's biggest documentary film festival, this year's edition of Hot Docs runs in Toronto from April 23 to May 2. More than 100 documentaries will be screened, among them several from Israel.

Omnipresent Israeli army checkpoints in the West Bank and Gaza are an integral component of Israel's never-ending effort to keep suicide bombers at bay. But to the Palestinian inhabitants of the territories, the checkpoint is a smouldering source of personal inconvenience and national bitterness and humiliation.

Israeli soldiers at a checkpoint in the West Bank question two Palestinians.

Yoav Shamir's unadorned Checkpoint, shot between 2001 and 2003, focuses on the impact these prickly emblems of Israeli authority have on Palestinians. The checkpoints guard the entrances and exits of Palestinian towns such as Jenin, Nablus and Khan Yunis. They are manned by young, heavily-armed, occasionally confused soldiers whose task is to stop terrorists and facilitate the movement of legitimate travellers.

Weighed down by an awesome responsibility, the soldiers are called upon to exercise sound judgment and sensitivity. Often, they let visitors through without any fuss. But when the gates are closed, the Palestinians are deeply offended. The cumbersome vetting process is unpleasant, both for Israelis and Arabs.

Citing a curfew, two soldiers brusquely turn away a truck driver. He wonders how he can get home. Not our problem, they reply indifferently.

A couple with two sick children are told to return tomorrow. It seems like a capricious decision. But an ambulance whose passengers require chemotherapy and surgery is waved through after a few probing questions. A prospective bridegroom is on a mission to deliver henna to his bridegroom. After a quarrel, the soldiers back off and let him through.

A group of Palestinian children are permitted to cross a checkpoint, but their northern European chaperon, a pastor, is denied permission to pass. "I hope you can go back to your country soon," he says in a tacit political statement. A soldier sheepishly asks if he can photograph him. Their conversation is the only moment of levity in the film.

Its closing vignettes are tense. Soldiers engage an enraged Palestinian man in a shouting march. As a Palestinian crouches in the rain, waiting to cross, a soldier says meanly, "Let him wait."

"We're humans, they're animals," another soldier observes.

"Film this, see what they do to us," an old man with a red-checkered keffiyah blurts out, venting his anger over a refusal.

And so it goes. Checkpoint, which will be screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 5, documents these strained encounters with a fair measure of detachment.

No. 17, by David Ofek, unfolds against the sombre backdrop of a Palestinian terrorist attack. Two years ago, an Israeli commuter bus near Megiddo was blown up by a suicide bomber, killing 17 passengers.

When pathologists were unable to identify the charred remains of the 17th passenger, an investigation was launched. The police concluded that the victim, a male, had been an illegal foreign worker. He was buried in a Christian cemetery.

No. 17, which is rarely less than riveting, is told from Ofek's viewpoint. Having made it his business to solve the mystery, he leaves no stone unturned as he interviews surviving passengers – including some new Russian immigrants – and keeps in touch with the police.

The stories they tell of the flames and explosions that tore apart the bus are horrific, yet they lead Ofek no closer to the truth. The identity of the victim finally emerges, thanks in no small part to Ofek's persistence and the skill of a Tel Aviv newspaper sketch artist.

No. 17 will be shown at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 9.

Ronen Amar's quirky, off-beat My Family's Pizza is set in Netivot, a ragged Israeli development town in the Negev largely populated by Moroccan Jews.

Maxim, a temperamental young man addicted to Coca Cola and sleep, has returned to Netivot after working in a relative's pizzeria in New York City.

Eager to capitalize on his experience, Maxim decides to open his own pizzeria, even though Netivot has no shortage of such outlets. Maxim's short-term goal is to open just before Passover, the busiest season, when observant Jews throw out all their chametz.

Complications ruin his plan to go into partnership with a friend. In desperation, Maxim recruits his parents, Rachel and Yishai, as partners. Yishai, a diamond polisher, invests in the pizzeria. He also delivers pizzas. Rachel's role is to keep Maxim's unpredictable emotions in check, especially when glitches surface.

My Family's Pizza, directed with skill by Maxim's brother, is an unusual and appealing film.

James Miller's graphic but choppy Death in Gaza leaves a viewer in a depressed state of mind. Miller, a British documentarian who was killed in Gaza during an Israeli incursion last May, fixes his steely gaze on Palestinian children who have been mentally and spiritually scarred by the intifadah.

The youngsters in this disturbing film have been radicalized by the continuing violence. They hate Jews and display contempt toward Israelis, play with toy guns, deem peace to be impossible and value "martyrdom" above all else. The adults in their lives perpetuate the idea of armed struggle, pump up their rejectionist values and brainwash them with the nonsense that a "ticket to paradise" awaits them. Worst of all, the menacing masked fighters who confront the Israeli army in Gaza recklessly regard these kids as cannon fodder. It's depressingly clear that a nihilistic culture of death has enveloped Gaza, and its implications can only make one shudder.

The Lebanese chanteuse Fairuz is a beloved and revered figure in the Arab world, a shining symbol of incorruptible purity and goodness. Her plaintive songs about romantic love, the physical beauty of Lebanon and the plight of Palestinian refugees touch a deep chord.

In We Loved Each Other So Much, Jack Janssen presents Fairuz as a unifying force who transcends the ethnic and political conflicts that virtually gutted Lebanon during its last civil war in the 1970s and 1980s. Portrayed as an alluring but ever-so-distant personality, she brings the quarrelsome people of Lebanon, some of whom yearn for an idealized past, together under one roof.

Esaias Baitel, a French Jew whose father survived the horrors of Auschwitz, joined a neo-Nazi street gang, the Rockers, in order to gain a better understanding of the anti-Semitic mindset. Later, he joined a rival gang, the Degenerates. Of course, he kept his Jewish identity secret. Baitel's brief reminiscences of his strange sojourn are revealed in a 10-minute film, The Zone, which is long on photography but short on substance.

BOOK BY RYERSON GRAD DAN BAR-EL EXPLORES NURSERY RHYME ACCIDENTS

Ever notice how accident-prone characters are in the world of children's nursery rhymes? Humpty-Dumpty falls from a wall and cracks apart, Jack and Jill tumble down a hill, and so on. Dan Bar-el has also noticed this suspicious phenomenon. He is the Vancouver-based author of Things are Looking Up, Jack, a fast-paced story for children that attempts to solve many of these mishaps.

"All is not right in the land of Mother Goose," he writes. "People and things keep falling down and it is not merely coincidental. There is trouble afoot. It is up to King Jack and his sister Princess Jill to get to the bottom of the mystery."

A former student at Ryerson University in Toronto, Bar-el is the son of Avihu Bar-el, former director of the Toronto Jewish Media Centre, and Shirley Bar-el, former teacher at United Synagogue Day School. He is planning to visit Toronto in May for some readings and book signings. His book is published by Orca Publishers of Victoria.

Ballet Gala: The Koffler Centre's third annual gala "Stars of the 21st Century" showcases brilliant principal dancers from the National Ballet of Canada, the American Ballet Theatre, Bolshoi Ballet, Munich Ballet and Madrid's Victor Ullate Ballet.
Produced by Solomon Tencer and Nadia Veselova-Tencer, formerly of the Kirov Ballet, and now the directors of the Koffler School of Dance and the Academy of Ballet and Jazz, the event is a fund-raiser for the Koffler Centre's cultural programming.
Toronto Centre for the Arts, 5040 Yonge St. Tickets $145 to $45, 416-872-1111. Sunday April 25, 5:30 p.m. For details, call 416-636-1880, ext. 271.

Sympathy For the Devil?: Pianist Anton Kuerti and cellist Kristine Bogyo are performing a May benefit concert on behalf of Mordechai Vanunu, the Israeli technician who served 18 years in an Israeli prison for revealing secrets about Israel's nuclear weapons program to a London newspaper in 1986.

Kuerti has corresponded with Vanunu and written sympathetic articles about the man whom, as Vanunu has said, Israel has long considered "public enemy number 1." The concert is meant to celebrate his anticipated release from prison on April 21 and to raise funds to help him re-establish himself. It will feature the music of Beethoven, which Vanunu has said was an inspiration to him during his long incarceration.

Willowdale United Church, 349 Kenneth Ave. Sunday May 9, 7:30 p.m. Tickets ($30) are available at This Ain't the Rosedale Library, 483 Church St., or by phone at 905-849-5501. For an additional $30, concertgoers may attend a reception following the concert.

New Volume from Simchovitch: Toronto poet Simcha Simchovitch recently published a new collection of poetry. The first poem in Out of the Abyss: Collected Poems is titled There and begins: "There my life unfolded./ With all my sense I absorbed/ my Jewish world in Poland,/ before it was defiled and erased/ in six ghastly years/ of blood-inundation and Divine eclipse."

Born in Otwock, Poland in 1921, Simchovitch came to Canada in 1949. He is very much a Holocaust poet who writes in Yiddish, English and even Hebrew. But as critic Adam Fuerstenberg has noted, his poetry also "reflects a love and accommodation with his adopted country, which is very unlike that of the other writers who were Holocaust survivors."

At 290 pages, Out of the Abyss presents hundreds of poems translated from the original Yiddish, most from previous Yiddish collections but including many not published before.

It's good to see that this pre-eminent Canadian Yiddish poet, who won a Jewish Book Award for Yiddish translation several years ago, remains active. A collection of Simchovitch's articles and reviews from the Yiddish Forward and other Yiddish publications is due out soon. To order Out of the Abyss, write to the S. Simchovitch Book Fund, 17 Tillplain Rd., North York, Ont. M3H 5R1.

Russian and Hebrew Writers: Hebrew Union College Press of Cincinnati has brought out Between Snow & Desert Heat: Russian Influences on Hebrew Literature, 1870-1970. Author Rina Lapidus presents 10 essays making specific comparisons of the works of writers such as Gogol and Mendele, Y. D. Berkowitz and Tolstoy, Lermontov and Tchernichowsky.

Actor sees Fiddler as 'Hamlet of musicals'

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Sam Moses, who stars as Tevye in the musical Fiddler on the Roof at Stage West in Mississauga until June 27, says he's thrilled to be in "the Hamlet of musicals" for the fourth time in his career.

The show, based on Shalom Aleichem's writings, "runs the gamut of emotions. It is a huge privilege to be able to do something like this," the veteran actor said.

Although he was born in India as a Sephardi Jew of Iraqi descent, Moses said there are similarities between his parents and Tevye, who lives in the fictional European shtetl of Anatevka and tries to pass on Jewish traditions to his five daughters in the face of societal change and the rise of anti-Semitism in Czarist Russia.

"It is all about the human condition, it doesn't matter whether it is about Sephardim, Ashkenazi, Japanese or Indian – they all tell the same story and it is the evolution of their lives and how they cope with it," he said.

"The things that parallel Tevye and what my parents had to deal with – with 11 children, including six girls – was getting the girls all married off and having to give them dowries, which is the same thing with the dilemma of Tevye."

His parents also faced another similar situation. In the play, one of Tevye's daughter spurns an arranged marriage and marries outside the faith. When Moses' family came to Canada, he and his four brothers married non-Jews.

"My parents didn't like it at all. I realized in my mind that I could not expect them to understand what I did, because it would mean pulling away everything that they believed in," he said. "I could not ask them, because I would put their backs up to the wall and they would have to make a decision, and this decision paralleled with Tevye."

Moses defends his decision.

"To me, religion should be a living religion. It is wonderful to understand the history, but you have to progress too and bend some rules. Otherwise it becomes a religion of the past.

"It is a sensitive issue, but I think it needs to be spoken," said Moses, who has been seen most recently on television in Global's Train 48, as well as in CBC's This is Wonderland and The Newsroom.

Moses, who started his career dancing with the National Ballet of Canada, also completed a pilot recently titled Spicy Fusion, in which he stars.

Many Canadians will remember the sought-after character actor as the zany count in the Spumante Bambino TV commercials that ran for 15 years. He also appeared in CTV's Pig and Whistle Show and on CBC's Wayne and Shuster comedy specials.

His film work includes parts in Ghostbusters, Moscow on the Hudson and Adventures in Babysitting.

For tickets to Fiddler on the Roof, call the Stage West box office at 905-238-0042 or 1-800-263-0684.

Queen of Crass Comedy to perform in T.O.

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

The name Roseanne brings to mind a list of numbers: nine years of the 1990s TV comedy Roseanne, four Emmy Awards, $25 million per season, three marriages, five children, 51-years-old.

Roseanne Barr is offering another number for Toronto residents – one night of comedy at the Hummingbird Centre on April 28. While her star power has dimmed significantly since her show ended in 1997, this working-class Jewish girl from Salt Lake City, Utah, plans to return to her stand-up roots.

Roseanne Barr

"It's been difficult raising five kids and a grandson," Barr says from her Los Angeles home, her distinct trailer-park twang in every syllable. "But I wanna do what I want, say what I want. I'm an entertainer, a performer, so doing live shows is how I've always envisioned living my 50s."

Her fans may have hoped for a Barr that would keep churning out her classic show, featuring the dysfunctional Connor family. Roseanne became an unusual addition to the1990s comedy lineup by showcasing blue-collar problems and a crass parental unit. Barr won an Emmy Award as best actress in a comedy series in 1993, and the show garnered two Golden Globe and two American Comedy awards, as well as receiving the prestigious broadcasting accolade, the Peabody Award.

But it was Barr's private life that attracted the most headlines, from her off-key rendition of the American national anthem at the 1990 World Series and subsequent crotch-grabbing to her marriage to actor Tom Arnold (whom she mud-wrestled on a Vanity Fair cover).

After their split, the overweight entertainer had gastric bypass surgery and shed 80 pounds, and then underwent extensive plastic surgery on her nose, breasts, stomach and face. Her 1994 book My Lives detailed a horrendous childhood of abuse, while also revealing the conflicts on the Roseanne set, which included lawyers forcing Barr to read her scripted lines.

And even though she's a grandmother today, it seems Barr hasn't changed.

"I want to get into porn now," she says, half-jokingly. "I wish people would stop remembering the old me, and realize that I look great nude."

Back when she was three years old, Barr was accepting different compliments: her family encouraged her to dive into the comedy world after she entertained them at Shabbat dinners.

By 18, she moved into an artists' colony in Colorado, and after numerous stints at comedy clubs, Barr became known as the "Queen of Denver Comedy." She appeared on The Tonight Show and it wasn't long before ABC brought her talent to the tube. Roseanne debuted in 1988, and has since been syndicated in 150 countries.

Does the Queen of Crass Comedy like what she sees on TV now?

"It sucks," she proclaims, "and the comedies aren't funny, they're just boring."

Barr admits cooking and eating are her two passions, and she plans to publish a cookbook that will "definitely be high in fat, sugar and all that good stuff." Weight jokes aside, Barr is also a cow – specifically, the voice of a plucky bovine character in the new Disney animated movie Home on the Range.

Being behind the scenes suits Barr just fine.

"I'm not much of a Hollywood socializer," she says. "I'm too neurotic to leave my house. I usually stay in bed and worry about everything."

That alarmist attitude is fuelling her upcoming North American tour.

"The world is going to end in two years, if we continue on this path," she says. "We have to change the way we think, because there's so much hate in this world."

Barr saves her praise for a country she views as exempt from self-destruction.

"I want to move to Canada," she says. "You guys have better laws, are better informed, and are just so cool."

I hear some crackling on the phone line, and Roseanne says to her youngest son, eight-year-old Buck, "Honey, get off the cord. C'mon, get off."

In that moment, shades of the old Roseanne return – the fictional mother juggling troublesome kids and a hectic lifestyle.

For tickets to Barr's performance April 28 at 8 p.m. at the Hummingbird Centre, call Ticketmaster at 416-872-2262.

Kay's most recent book more magical than the rest

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

While there is no shortage of fantasy books, there is only one Guy Gavriel Kay. Certainly, if you go by the critical consensus, the 49-year-old Winnipeg-born Torontonian's books are a cut above the rest. The Washington Post was typically effusive, calling his latest novel, The Last Light of the Sun (Penguin Canada), "historical fiction of the highest order, the work of a man who may well be the reigning master of the form."

That may sound like hyperbole, but Kay's legion of devoted fans would likely agree. They propelled his book into a second printing two weeks after its initial release, in both the United States and Canada. With numbers like that, it's not surprising that Kay has been translated into more than 20 languages.

The Last Light of the Sun takes its cue from the time of Alfred the Great, circa the eighth and ninth century, when the Vikings, English and Welsh were interacting with each other. It's the story of three diverse cultures, fictionalized as the Anglcyn, Erlings and Cyngael.

> 'Historical fiction of the highest order'

Like all of Kay's writing, The Last Light of the Sun is a literate, complex, unpredictable and fascinating depiction of a familiar world that is, nevertheless, not like our own. Magic plays a larger part in his newest novel than it has in some of his past books, such as A Song for Arbonne and the two books that make up the Sarantine Mosaic (Sailing to Sarantium and Lord of Emperors). In those novels, Kay had mostly eliminated elements of the supernatural, going against the grain in a genre where magic is ubiquitous.

"What I do is regard the use of the supernatural as one of the tools in the writer's arsenal along with present-tense narrative, unreliable narrator, the outsider viewing a culture," Kay says. "On a case-by-case, book-by-book basis, [magic] is more or less appropriate to that story."

Kay compares his use of magic in The Last Light of the Sun to William Shakespeare's use of a ghost in Hamlet.

"What struck me," says Kay, "is that we don't know if William Shakespeare literally believed in ghosts. We know the Elizabethans had a very strong belief in ghosts. We don't know enough about Shakespeare, [but] what we do know is that the people he was writing about did.

"It struck me as interesting that if you're writing about people in a time and place, [it's] a valuable exercise to embody their world in the way that they believed it to be. So that if they believe in what I call the half world, I can make it so, as Star Trek would say."

Kay says, "What that let me do in the book is sharpen the focus – I use that phrase a lot because it's one of the things I'm trying to do with fantasy and history – on the tensions that exist in times of transition. This was a world shifting out of pagan, pantheistic, polytheistic belief toward a monolithic belief in the one god. People are wrestling inwardly with what their faith tells them to be and what they see as the evidence of their eyes and senses to be the nature of the world."

In dealing with such subjects as religion, feminism, the arts, war and empire, Kay's work invariably prompts comparisons with events in the real world. But he prefers to disguise historical figures and peoples within his fantastical settings. He has created waves in the literary field by publicly assailing writers such as Margaret Atwood, Michael Ondaatje and the late Timothy Findley, who have used real historical figures as protagonists in some of their novels.

"Somebody dead cannot sue for libel, but somebody alive can," Kay says. "Does that make it ethically appropriate to say whatever you want about somebody dead because they can't sue you?

"We have no trouble saying Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will is a superlative technical exercise in filmmaking, but it's morally repugnant."

Kay feels books that use genuine historical figures are problematic in the same way.

"We can say this is a very fine novel, but I have a problem with this aspect of what's it's doing with a real life."

His views notwithstanding, it's tempting to try to figure out who Kay's creations are supposed to be. He has alluded to his Judaism in his work in both explicit ways and less obvious ones. Tigana, perhaps his best novel, for example, revolves around a magic spell that prevents anyone from uttering or even remembering the name of the people whose memory has been expunged after a calamitous defeat in war.

Guy Gavriel Kay

But when asked whether he will ever write an explicitly Jewish book, he says, "I don't like anticipating what I will do. When I finish a book, I have no idea what I'm doing next."

At the moment, he says, "I'm immensely caught up in thinking about Middle Eastern politics," and adds that one can extrapolate events from the past to understand the present, something he tries to do in his work.

The outspoken Kay, who studied for the bar but never practised law, has made some waves by strongly defending Israel in opinion pieces in the National Post. His genesis as a columnist came about, he chuckles, when "I used to read something in the newspaper in the morning and fulminate and rant to my wife for 20 minutes or half an hour about what idiocy this was. What the Post lets me do, instead of doing it tomorrow over coffee, is carry my coffee upstairs to the computer and write a response to it [now]."

Kay's connections to Israel extend beyond his articles. He will be the guest of honour at an upcoming science fiction/fantasy convention taking place there in August. The Sarantine Mosaic has been just published in Hebrew and he expects his latest novel to be published in Israel soon.

That overseas publication not only allows him to make a living from his writing – rare for any Canadian writer in any field – but also lets him take his time between books.

"When I get up in the morning, I'm grateful for that," Kay says. "Because of the 20-21 translations [of each book], I'm able to take three years to write a book. I'm able to take my time to get it close to right as I can."

Healthy eating means knowing what to avoid

First of a two-part series

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

An important aspect of maintaining our health is having an understanding of the toxins we should avoid. We are continually exposed to toxins in our environment and, although our bodies "detoxify" naturally every day, toxic residues remain and accumulate in our fat, tissues and organs, resulting in numerous health complications. Not only is the current North American diet high in fat and deficient in nutrients, but our health-care system focuses on crisis care and on treating disease rather than preventing it. What we need to do is rejuvenate and purify our bodies before any serious degeneration takes place.

Many of us assume that if we are disease-free, then we are healthy. But health is not just the absence of disease or symptoms. It is a function of our energy and vitality, our ability to think clearly and our sense of joyful living. How many of us live our lives feeling merely OK and attribute our lack of vitality to the "normal" signs of aging? Yet we can enjoy good health at every age. We just need the means to tap into our energy and vitality.

There are a number of symptoms that may indicate our body needs some form of "internal cleansing" or "detoxifying." For example, frequent fatigue and lack of energy, chronic constipation, excess weight, powerful food cravings, recurring headaches, frequent colds and flus, insomnia or sleeping too much, and wide mood swings all tend to be linked with a need to detoxify.

In this article, I will focus on some of the dangers associated with the use of pesticides in food.

Consumer demand for easily prepared foods and a wide variety of fresh foods has caused us to significantly alter the foods we eat. Farmers are pressured to produce higher yields per acre and, consequently, they are using an ever-increasing amount of pesticides. In an effort to maximize convenience, manufacturers are over-processing our foods, stripping them of nutrients and adding harmful ingredients such as preservatives, artificial colours and flavours. As a result, we have to search much harder to find wholesome foods.

Although there are many benefits to eating numerous fruits and vegetables throughout the day, there are also hidden dangers. The more we eat large quantities of regular produce, the more we expose our bodies to pesticides. In the United States, the Environmental Protection Agency has listed pesticides in our foods as one of the most pressing health and environmental issues of our times. Children are especially vulnerable to pesticide consumption, and some health advocates have claimed that exposure to pesticides may be tied to learning disabilities and hyperactivity.

What can we do? We can buy organic produce. Granted, the current selection and variety of organic produce may not be extensive, and it tends to be more expensive. However, the benefits far outweigh the costs. Not only is organic produce pesticide-free, but it also contains more nutritional "bang for bite."

Continuously exposed to toxins in our environment

If we do buy regular produce, we should wash (and re-wash) it very carefully, making sure to carefully clean in all of the crevices. As well, we should avoid buying produce from countries where the governmental controls and regulations may be less restrictive. Try to purchase produce that has been grown locally (or in the United States), and that is in season. As nice as it is to bring home beautiful plums, peaches and strawberries in the wintertime, we should think carefully about how these "beautiful" fruits got to Canada, and where they came from. (Although DDT has long been banned for use as a pesticide in North America, it is still exported to other countries where they may be more permissive, and slower to ban such items.)

Conduct your own taste and smell test. If all you can taste/smell is chemicals, then you shouldn't buy that product.

By avoiding pesticides and other toxins that I will describe in my next article, we can begin the process of "detoxification," cleansing our bodies and living a more vibrant and active life.

Remember: a person who is in a high state of health is neither too fat nor too thin, has plenty of energy, sleeps well, digests foods comfortably and efficiently, has a healthy immune system and exhibits a general zest for life.

ACTION-PACKED MISSIONS TO ISRAEL FOR JEWISH PROFESSIONALS & LEADERS

Shurat HaDin, a Jewish legal rights institute based in Israel, is inviting doctors, attorneys, accountants, programmers and other professionals from around the world to participate in the Ultimate Mission, an intensive and action-packed series of briefings and field tours with Israeli security, military and intelligence officials.

The focus of a recent feature article in the Washington Post, the nine-day mission explores the strategic dangers to the Jewish state from Arab violence and Islamic extremism. It also presents a rich and exciting program of recreational and cultural events. Included are briefings by top Shin Bet and Mossad operatives, Israel Defence Forces undercover agents who carry out targeted assassinations and deep penetration raids into Arab territory, first-hand inspection of the controversial security fence, a small-aircraft tour of the Galil, and much more.

"No other tour has ever presented the hardcore realities of Israel's struggle for survival like the Ultimate Mission," Nitsana Darshan-Leitner, director of Shurat HaDin, said of a previous mission. "The briefings by the Mossad, Shin Bet and IDF officials amazed the group and exhibited the extreme challenges Israel is facing in the war against the terrorists."

Travel dates are May 2 thru 11. Another mission is planned for June. For details, visit www.israellawcenter.org/ mission.shtml, or call 212-591-0073 (U.S.) or 972-8-973-3336 (Israel). E-mail info@israellawcenter.org.

Hasbarah Leadership Mission: HonestReporting.com and Hasbara Fellowships are sponsoring a mission to Israel for people who care deeply about Israel and are working to correct the many misrepresentations about it in the media and on campuses. The mission offers an intensive training program to give Jewish leaders the tools to be even greater advocates for Israel.

Participants will get to meet many important newsmakers and receive briefings from Itamar Marcus, director of Palestinian Media Watch; Caroline Glick, managing editor of the Jerusalem Post; Gideon Meir, director of Israel's hasbarah department and other leading government spokespeople. They are also slated to fly to the northern border following the Green Line, visit and comfort terror victims, tour the security fence and other places in the news, and enjoy a spiritual and rejuvenating Shabbat.

Travel dates are June 20 to 27. Accommodation is at the David Citadel Hotel. Cost is $2,940 (double) excluding flight. Visit www.honestreporting.com/mission/contact.asp Jews of the Ottoman Empire: Currently on view in New York, the exhibition "Jewish Costumes in the Ottoman Empire" presents a selection of paintings, based on old postcards, depicting traditional Jewish attire in the Ottoman Empire from the 16th to 19th centuries.

TRAVEL TALK
By Bill Gladstone

Curator Sylvio Ovadya has been collecting illustrations of Ottoman Jewish clothing for decades, but it wasn't until 1999, when he discovered some miniatures at a bazaar, that he was inspired to assemble the present exhibition. The paintings were brought to the United States with the assistance of Turkey's foreign affairs ministry and are scheduled to travel to key American cities to highlight "the history, culture and traditions of two peoples who have lived together in friendship for centuries."

On view thru May 7 at Sephardic House, Center for Jewish History, 15 W. 16th St., Manhattan. 212-294-8350.

Wiesel on Cruise: The Life, Liberty and Legacy cruise (May 12 to 24 from Curacao to Charleston, S.C.) was conceived in conjunction with the National Foundation for Jewish Culture in New York as a part of the celebration of the 350th anniversary of Jewish communal life in the Americas. The itinerary includes various places where the Jews who fled Recife, Brazil stopped, and where Jewish communities have thrived. A two-day excursion to Havana is also included. Elie Wiesel is a guest lecturer, as are Theodore Bikel, Aviva Ben-Ur, Eli Evans and others. Travel Dynamics, 212-774-1519. Visit www.traveldynamicsinternational.com/jewish_heritage/index.html

Israeli bobsled team looking for 'one good man'

JERUSALEM — The Israeli bobsled team will be holding tryouts for the fourth and final member of their historic first team.

Any Israeli who meets the athletic requirements for the sport is eligible. This "one good man" will live, train and compete with the Israeli team on Olympic tracks in the United States, Canada and Europe to qualify for the 2006 Winter Olympics in Torino, Italy.

Tryouts will take place at the Canada Centre in Metulla on May 11 and at Kfar Macabbiah in Ramat Gan on May 12. The finals will take place at the Wingate Institute on May 14th.

Athletes must be at least 1.75 metres (5-9) tall and weigh at least 100 kg (220 lbs.).

Aspiring bobsledders will be tested for their ability to run 30 metres in less than four seconds and perform a vertical jump of greater than 70 centimetres (2.3 feet), bench press at least 120 kg (265 lbs.) and do a power clean of greater than 100 kg (220 lbs.).

The winner will join Aaron Zeff, a former U.S. Air Force fighter pilot, and John Frank, a former NFL star with the San Francisco 49ers who created the Israeli bobsled team in 2001. Along with David Greaves, a nationally ranked sprinter from Winnipeg, and coached by Ross Dominikovich, former captain of New Zealand's Olympic bobsled team, the Israeli bobsled team has already established itself a serious contender in international events.

The ultimate goal for the Israeli team is to qualify to represent Israel at the 2006 Olympics.

"When you think of Israel, bobsled is not the first thing that comes to mind – yet," says Zeff, the driver/pilot for Israeli team. "Our primary goal is to bring bobsledding and the opportunity to compete in this thrilling sport to each and every Israeli. We want the Israeli team to be a source of national pride during the 2006 Winter Olympics and beyond."

"We're serious athletes with purpose and ambition," said Frank, the team's brakeman. "We are looking for the last piece of the puzzle – a young, ambitious, and talented Israeli athlete to be an integral member of our winning team."

The team members all hold Israeli citizenship and are sanctioned by the Israeli Olympic Committee.

For details, e-mail bobsled@ruderfinn.co.il or visit the team's website at www.israelibobsled.com.

Nets' Frank in first playoff as head coach

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

New Jersey Nets all-stars Jason Kidd and Kenyon Martin recently made it clear they want Lawrence Frank back as their coach in the fall. Three anonymous team sources told the New York Daily News last week that he will have the interim tag dropped next season regardless of how the club does in the playoffs.

One source said Nets CEO Rod Thorn is expected to negotiate a new deal and extension for Frank after the playoffs. The NBA's Atlantic Division Champions opened their post-season run over the weekend against cross-river rivals, the New York Knicks, in a best-of-seven series.

Frank, a 33-year-old Indiana University graduate, became the youngest coach of any major North American professional sports team on Jan. 26 when he replaced Byron Scott at the helm.

The two-time defending Eastern Conference champions had been struggling at 22-20 when Frank took over, but won their next 13 games – giving their new coach the best start in pro sports history.

The late Buddy Jeannette (1947-48, Baltimore Bullets) and Kurt Rambis (1999, Los Angeles Lakers) won their first nine decisions.

"Quite simply, we have really, really good players" Frank said in the midst of the record run, refusing to take credit for the team's reversal of fortunes.

"They're a very resilient group, so when a coaching change was made, I think everyone just kind of looked and evaluated what they could've done more.

"Now, this is a group that's been to the finals two years in a row, so we're not lacking in talent, character, or anything like that. We just needed to get back to our foundation, the basics. We're just doing what we've done in the past – no real changes – and I think that's what we're seeing."

Scott, who has the most wins in the franchise's NBA history (149), reportedly drew criticism from players over his preparation, communication skills and in-game adjustments.

At five-foot-eight, Frank is also the league's shortest coach and the only one of 29 never to play pro or college ball. Primarily due to his height, he didn't even make his high school team.

He grew up in a Conservative Jewish home in Teaneck, N.J., and called his first head coaching job at any level a "great opportunity," but downplayed the importance of it coming in his home state. Frank had served as a Nets assistant for the past three seasons.

He attended Indiana University strictly to be a team manager for coach Bobby Knight. While he started out wiping the floors and cleaning the locker room, Frank was later allowed to perform entry-level coaching duties at Hoosier practices.

After graduating in 1992 with a degree in education, Frank was recommended by Knight to former Raptors coach Kevin O'Neill, who at the time was coach at Marquette University.

O'Neill later hired Frank as an assistant at Tennessee and considered bringing him to Toronto when he got the job last summer, but the Nets wouldn't allow Frank to talk to other teams.

After working for O'Neill for five years without a day off, Frank was burned out and left the game in 1996. He tried his hand at commercial real estate with his older brother Steven, but lasted only six weeks.

"Kevin has given me a whole lot more than many people I know," said Frank, who landed his first NBA gig as an assistant with the Vancouver Grizzlies in 1997.

"Kevin has been a tremendous influence in my life. He's reinforced the impact of a work ethic and is a super coach."

Katz a key component of McMaster hoops squad

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

McMaster Marauders basketball coach Joe Raso thinks guard Ben Katz is already one of the best shooters in the country, but the Ontario University Athletics (OUA) West coach of the year says Katz's goal next season should be to focus on becoming one of Canada's best players.

Ben Katz, the son of Humber College coach Mike Katz, is certainly making a name for himself in Canadian basketball circles, earning first-team conference OUA all-star honours after a stellar third season with the Marauders. His 16.5 points per game helped lead the Hamilton school last month to its 11th national championship appearance in the past 12 years.

Katz struggled in the team's opening-round elimination game against Calgary, fouling out with just 10 points in 26 minutes. He responded with a couple of solid outings in subsequent games to end the season on a somewhat positive note.

"It still means something when you're playing at the nationals, even if it is consolation," said Katz, who scored 24 points, including Mac's first eight and 14 of their first 17, as player of the game in the Marauders 93-75 consolation final win over Brock University.

"It was good to get a couple of wins and get used to winning on that court."

The 6-2, 200-pound arts and science student from Toronto had an exceptional season in 2003-04. He was named most valuable player twice – at the McGill Redbird Classic as well as at the Raptors Invitational.

For the season, Katz sunk 49 per cent of his field goal attempts and 46 per cent of his three-pointers. He added 56 assists and 35 steals and was good for 4.2 rebounds per game.

Katz, 21, was coming off an injury-plagued year in which he missed significant time with a torn quad muscle and mononucleosis. Raso believes he was having an all-Canadian season before he hurt his ankle late in the first half of the campaign.

"The only thing stopping him from breaking the school record was probably me," he recalled of Katz's 26-point first half effort in a game against Lakehead University in November.

"He has been a tremendous asset here, a team leader without question. Being the son of a coach certainly doesn't hurt you," Raso added.

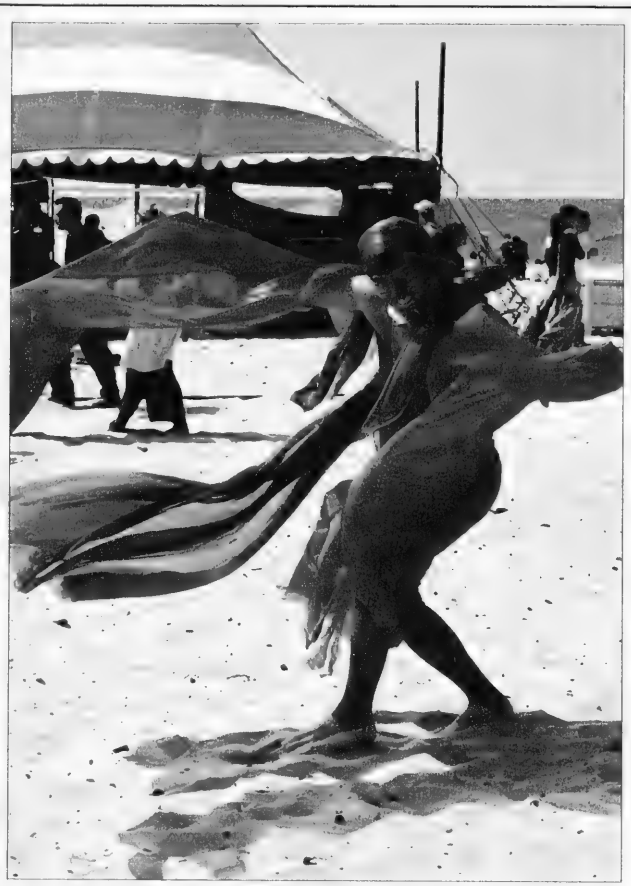
Having been around the game pretty much his entire life, Katz says his father has had a big influence on him.

"He's always been there to help me out if I wasn't playing well and has given me advice from a distance," he said.

Father and son got a little closer than usual when McMaster and Humber matched up against each other in the Raptors Invitational. Ben and the Marauders were victorious, but Katz says it was a difficult game to play and felt a little bit strange to compete against someone who's always been in his corner.

Mike Katz, who played for the 1977 and 1981 Canadian Maccabiah teams, is expected to be asked to coach the national squad at next summer's games. If that indeed does happen, Ben would jump at the opportunity to go along for the ride.

"I've never been to Israel," he said. "I would love to go over there."



BOOMBAMELA: For the fifth year running, the four-day Boombamela festival, described by its organizers as "a festival of love and peace," attracted some 50,000 young Israelis to Nitzanim beach just north of the Gaza Strip during chol hamoed Pesach. The secular event has little to do with the festival and more to do with having a good time. The organizers say they were inspired by the 43-day Kumbh Mela ritual along the Ganges River in India, where nearly a million Hindus plunge into the river's holy waters. [Israeli photo]

NOT YOUR TYPICAL GREEK SALAD
(Greek Country Salad)

This is not the salad with feta and olives that most of us know, but a version popular in the Greek countryside.

Dressing:
1 tbisp. fresh lemon juice
1/2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. honey
1/3 cup extra-virgin olive oil

Whisk together lemon juice, salt, and honey in a large bowl and add oil in a slow stream, whisking until blended.

Salad:
6 cups spinach or baby spinach
1 cup watercress sprigs, trimmed
1/2 cup chopped fresh dill
1/4 cup fresh flat-leaf parsley
1/4 cup thinly sliced scallion
2 tomatoes, sliced thinly

Add salad ingredients to dressing and toss to coat. Season with salt and pepper.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I love my mother dearly, but I think I am at my wits' end with her. I have two young children, and after receiving strict instructions not to give them any sweets, she is forever sneaking around with cookies and chocolate.

I've even heard her say to my son, "Enjoy sweetheart, but don't tell your mother." I've tried everything I can. I have sat her down and explained my feelings about giving them candies. I've yelled at her as well, something that I can't remember ever doing before. We were both very upset and I was sure I had reached her after she said she understood and promised it would never happen again.

It wasn't two weeks later that I caught her giving them each a piece of chocolate.

I've run out of ideas, so I'm turning to you for some.

Peeved Parent

Dear Peeved Parent

Obviously your mother is not doing this just to be defiant. It's her way of communicating her love.

It's common for many grandparents to spoil their grandchildren. A little spoiling is a natural part of their relationship. What I think is less common is for the grandparent to totally disregard the wishes of the parent.

There are still a couple of avenues you can try. Instead of lecturing and screaming, listen to what she has to say. Ask why she feels she can't respect your rules. After she thinks it through, together you can come up with a strategy you can both live with. How about indulging them with small toys instead of sweets? Maybe a book or puzzle they could work on together? It would certainly give them all more quality time than a chocolate bar.

Another option is to let her hear it from their physician. Sometimes an authority figure will be able to get through where you can't.

Although this is very frustrating for you, don't forget the reason behind it is pure. She is showing her love and wants them to be happy at any price. She is a good bubbie who just needs to be refocused.

Yom Ha'atzmaut despite the odds

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Sometimes it hurts to be a Jew and a lover of Israel. It does, because the world frequently muddies our faces with the grunge of inhumanity and then chaotically wipes it away, leaving a jumble of muddle behind.

Despite the hardships of being Jewish, however, we are lucky. We are lucky because we belong to a people that has stood tall in the face of the murderous ambitions of Hamans, Hitlers and now Hamas. We have successfully outmanoeuvred the naysayers, anti-Semites and Jew-haters to establish the State of Israel, one of the finest examples ever of human creativity.

Jews are characters in a classic yarn, although this should not make us haughty. Our story reads like a fable, yet sits spine-vertical on the non-fiction shelf. Many Jewish characters are extraordinary and from diverse places such as Morocco, Poland, Argentina, Australia, Yemen, Canada, United States, Mexico, Liechtenstein, India, Pakistan, Zimbabwe and the Ivory Coast. Few Jews ever forego membership and most of them would rather die than be forced out.

The chapters in our history are dotted with adaptability, courage and intellect. They reflect unpredictable outcomes yet maintain a consistent flavour. The setting for so much of the story – Israel – is a parched land choked by the smugness of the desert, a slice of geography sought after by kings, traders, merchants and bullies.

This terrain was fought for and won by settlers of the Yishuv and World War II soldiers, a tattered band of Holocaust orphans straight off crusty and brittle boats, and by fiercely brave and steadfast Jews in Toronto, New York and Paris.

The story of our peoplehood smacks of fiction, yet is unmistakably true.

This Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel turns 56 years old, but indeed it is much older. Late at night, when the golden hue of Jerusalem becomes a nocturnal shadow, one can hear the foundation of the country settling, and an exhale that echoes from its guts like one from the weariness of an old woman.

Yet Israel is the main address of the Jewish people, a haven for Jewish "pariahs" from other countries, and the headquarters of Jewish inventiveness, Torah learning and our "way." It is a special space where the mystical averah d'arah (the air of the Land) extends outside its own limits into the dwellings and nishamot (souls) of Diaspora Jewry.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut 5764, party for Israel in the extreme. Buy a colossal chocolate cake and place 56 candles in it. Sing Hatikvah and Yom Huledet Samayach at the top of your lungs so everyone or absolutely nobody except you can hear.

On Israel's 56th birthday, remember the regular family living in Be'er Sheva, or Rosh Pinah or Safed, whose fathers and sons fought in every war, whose mothers and sisters clutched their bellies in anguish waiting to hear the voices of their loved ones on the front. And remember the family on Bathurst Street whose members donated their personal treasures toward the security of our homeland, and the quiet Associated Hebrew Schools student who encouraged her fellow students, in the early years of the Jewish state, to pen letters of love and support to children in Israel.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut, celebrate your identity as a Diaspora Jew and our particular partnership in the divine keepsake called Israel. Remember that we have lost Israel before and should never ever take its existence for granted. Celebrate the bequest of our Jewishness and its core values, which are based on a craving for peace and justice and a voracious inquisitiveness to reveal the mysteries of truth within life.

I love being a Jew. I love Israel. Happy Birthday, Israel. Happy Birthday to the Jewish people. Am Yisrael Chai.

And God brought us to this place and gave us this land, a land flowing with milk and honey. – Dvarim 26

Sharon vows peace breakthrough

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon vowed Monday to do everything in his power "to bring about a breakthrough that will lead to the longed-for peace."

Sharon was speaking at the official ceremony marking the start of Yom Hazikaron (Memorial Day) events, at which Israel remembers its fallen soldiers and the victims of Arab terror at 43 military cemeteries.

Later in the day, addressing a state memorial ceremony for victims of terror attacks, Sharon declared that Israel "will hunt down to the bitter end those who seek to harm us," but he reiterated a pledge to make "painful concessions" for those genuinely desiring peace in the region.

"Despite our enemies' opposition to peace," the prime minister said, "we will take steps that could open the door to peace."

French insurance firm to compensate Iraqi Jews

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Three Iraqi Jews who fled their homeland in the 1950s will receive compensation for the insurance policies they purchased when they were still Iraqi citizens and the owners of assets and property there, Jewish officials in New York said last week.

'Breakthrough' for those who fled in the 1950s

The officials said the Iraqi case was the first time Jews who fled an Arab country were being recognized as eligible for compensation, and that they would receive payment in the coming days.

The payments are also being seen as a potential precedent in the campaign to secure reparations for some 850,000 Jews forced to flee anti-Semitism and anti-Jewish violence in Arab countries in the wake of Israel's creation in 1948.

"This is a breakthrough and justice has been done in an area that has been neglected for years," said Ilan Steinberg, director-general of the World Jewish Congress.

Teen Arrested for Hate

OAKVILLE, Ont. — A 15-year-old Oakville teen has been suspended from school after being arrested last week for uttering threats in connection with what police describe as "hate-motivated" e-mails sent to a student of Israeli descent. Halton police said the e-mails, sent April 15 and 16, were anti-Semitic in nature and included a Nazi swastika. The suspect, who cannot be identified because of his age, was placed in a diversion program after showing remorse and agreeing to counselling, police said.

Survivors Honoured

TORONTO — In a ceremony at Queen's Park, Ontario Citizenship and Immigration Minister Marie Bountrogianni, Israeli consul general in Toronto Ya'acov Brosh and Premier Dalton McGuinty last week recognized 11 Holocaust survivors named by Canadian Society for Yad Vashem as its honorees for 2004. The 11 Ontarians are: Abby Beker, Bronia Rohatiner Beker, Sam Brown, Tovia Dwosh, Harry Goldlist, Esther Bluma Krakowski, Maria Rabinovici Leib, Irving Milchberg, Helen Schwartz, Gaby Weisz and Maryka Weisz, all of Toronto.

CISEPO Honoured

TORONTO — The Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), based at Mount Sinai Hospital and the University of Toronto, and its founder Dr. Arnold Noyek, were given one of three "Power of Humanity" awards earlier this week by the Canadian Red Cross, Ontario zone, at a gala dinner. Founded in 1984, CISEPO tries to foster Mideast peace through joint Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian health projects. The other winners were Dr. David Lynch of the Good Shepherd Centre and Dr. Lynn Marshall of Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre. Jordan's Queen Noor gave the keynote address.

Haifa U Scholarship

VANCOUVER — A Vancouver couple has created a scholarship fund at Haifa University to help Israel Defence Forces officers earn a degree in education and switch from the military to the classroom. Arthur and Judy Dodek will sponsor two students in the three-year program, which is headed by Haifa U's dean of education Ruth Linn, with $2,000 (US) annually. The Dodeks say they hope others will join them as sponsors.

Imprisoned Nazi Dies in Italy at 92

ROME — Karl Hass, a former Nazi officer sentenced in Italy for his role in the wartime massacre of 335 civilians in Rome, died last Wednesday at age 92.

Hass, a former major in the Waffen SS who had been under house arrest since his 1998 conviction, died in an old age home in Castel Gandolfo, near Rome.

Born near the northern German city of Kiel in 1912, Hass was sentenced to life along with fellow Nazi officer Erich Priebke for their role in the 1944 Fosse Ardeatine massacre, in which 335 men – 75 of them Jews – were shot dead in a reprisal by German troops for an attack by the Italian resistance that killed 33 German soldiers.

Priebke, 91, lives under house arrest in Rome.

WORLD

Cash to FSU Survivors?

NEW YORK — Most of the money left from the $1.25 billion (US) Swiss banks settlement will likely go to poor Holocaust survivors in the former Soviet Union (FSU). Last week, the special master appointed to advise U.S. District Court Judge Edward Korman, who is overseeing the money's distribution, echoed Korman's opinion that survivors in the FSU are the neediest and should receive much of the money. So far, Korman has approved $593 million in restitution for Swiss account holders or their heirs, slave labourers of German firms that used Swiss banks, Jewish refugees from Switzerland and various humanitarian programs.

Thousands March

OSWIECIM, Poland — Some 7,000 Jewish students and Holocaust survivors from Israel and more than 20 other countries took part in the "March of the Living" in Poland on Holocaust Martyrs and Heroes Day. Participants included Poles, Americans, Canadians and Israelis, who walked about three kilometres to Auschwitz and Birkenau. The march has been held annually since 1988 to educate a new generation of Jews about European Jewish history.

Grants Spur Programs

NEW YORK — Six U.S. universities will launch new courses on Jewish culture next September after each receiving $50,000 (US) grants last week to do so. Temple University, the State University of New York at Albany, the University of California at Davis, the University of Denver, the University of Miami and the University of Massachusetts at Amherst received grants from the Posen Foundation, which funds the New York-based, secular humanist Center for Cultural Judaism.

Toronto students help to rebuild UTT library

Sending books, cash to Montreal

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

The kids come from Bosnia, Yugoslavia, Somalia, Turkey and China. They've experienced famine, war and death. They know hatred when they see it.

When students from the All Rights Committee (ARC) and the Student Parliament at the Islington Junior Middle School heard about the firebombing of the United Talmud Torahs (UTT) library in Montreal earlier this month, they responded quickly and collected $440 and 250 books to help UTT rebuild.

Currently home to one of the most diverse student bodies in the city, Islington is one of the oldest public schools in Toronto. A picture of a log cabin with a handful of boys, girls and their teachers standing awkwardly in their Sunday best features prominently on its walls. The caption underneath reads "Islington School House, 1832."

Now, the teachers talk with pride about the fact that racist acts almost never happen at their school.

And when they do occur, they are dealt with immediately by the All Rights Committee, an extracurricular student group made up of 10 Grade 8 students that promotes tolerance at the school, explains 14-year-old Joshua Song, an ARC member.

When the UTT arson happened, "we wanted to show the Jewish people that we care and that we think it should stop," Sarah Gaikwad, 13, says.

"It was also discussed in our Holocaust studies group," adds Miriam Dokic, 13, referring to another school program.

"We talked about how we would feel if this would happen to us here," says Senka Zahirovic, 14.

Legacy of "small-town" Jews

From the editor's desk

Jews have been in Canada since the early 18th century. Young Esther Brandeau from Bordeaux, disguised as a young non-Jewish man, is considered to have been the first Jew to set foot in New France. As is well chronicled, however, she went back to Europe because she refused to convert to Catholicism (all other religions were prohibited by French decree in la Nouvelle France). But Jews, as Jews, soon began arriving to the new Canadian frontier nevertheless.

Canada's Jewish population was boosted by two immigration surges, one before World War I and one after World War II. In 1882, approximately 2,500 Jews lived in Canada. By 1914, the figure rose to more than 100,000. Today, some 375,000 Jews live here.

While the vast majority of Canada's Jews in the early decades of the last century gravitated to the country's largest urban centres such as Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg, many also migrated to smaller urban areas such as Vancouver, Hamilton and Ottawa, as well as to small-town communities.

Queen's University historian Gerald Tulchinsky has documented the formations and transformations of Jewish communities of Canada and elaborates upon them in his book Taking Root: The Origins of the Canadian Jewish Community.

He eloquently explains the unique challenges that small-town Jewish families faced in remaining Jewish.

"They lived among non-Jews, and their children were often the only non-Christians in the public schools they attended. It might be said, therefore, that they lived on a kind of cultural frontier between the Jewish and non-Jewish worlds; they were more directly exposed, on the one hand, to those influences which drew them away from their identity as Jews, and on the other, to the need to understand, assert, explain, and defend that identity on almost a daily basis."

We "large-city" Jews – the majority of Canadian Jewry in 2004 – have forgotten, if indeed we ever knew, how strong the communal identity that was nurtured, by necessity and sheer will, in our "small-town" coreligionists.

The example of Peterborough, Ont., is remarkably telling. I am familiar with only a small aspect of the story. But I tell it with great admiration.

Among the wave of pre-World War I Jewish immigrants to Canada was Peterborough's first rabbi, ordained in the famous Ponevezh Yeshiva in Lithuania, Rabbi Philip Black. Rabbi Black and his wife Annie had four children: Ruth, Aaron, Morris and Isadore, all of whom were generous and ethical stalwart figures and fine exemplars of their faith and their people.

When he passed away in 1970, Morris Black instructed his children in his will that "we must have faith in God and hope that the passing of a human is not the end. In place of mourning, teach others the value of study and education. A wonderful heritage has been given unto us."

Further to their father's instructions, the family established an annual public speaking and essay contest for elementary and middle-school students. The Morris Black Public Speaking Contest has now completed its 33rd year. Some 25 years ago, the contest moved from the environs of Peterborough to Vancouver and Hamilton, where Morris' older son Larry and his younger son Rick settled respectively.

In both communities, in memory of Morris Black from Peterborough, students from grades four to nine choose a topic from a specified list and make a presentation before a group of their peers, family and friends.

This past February, some 150 people attended the Jewish Community Centre in Hamilton to hear presentations from 55 students. The topics were not cliché-ridden; they were thoughtful. Here are just a few:

- How would I respond to anti-Semitic comments or jokes from a peer?
- What I hope to teach my children.
- Is now the right time to visit Israel?
- I feel most Jewish when...
- Why is Judaism like a stained glass window? Or, Why is Judaism like a falafel?
- Twenty ways we can show our support for Israel now.

There were too many "winners" in each city's contest to list them in this space. But I do wish to excerpt briefly from the winning submission by Grade 7 student Jeffrey Shafran from Vancouver:

"Kol Yisrael araivim ze la'zeh – every Jew is responsible for one another. Many people believe either that the Diaspora Jews are responsible for the Israeli Jews or that the Israeli Jews are responsible for the Diaspora Jews. But we are all responsible for each other. Neither is more important than the other...

"Our commitment to one another goes beyond the giving of money...

"We are responsible to help each other morally, physically and spiritually."

That the contest continues to this day nearly 34 years after Black's death is a powerful example of inter-generational, religious continuity, a moving testament to enduring, filial love, and an inspiring legacy of the strength of the communal security of yesterday's "small-town" Jews.

BUY ISRAEL MARKETPLACE:

Beit Rayim Synagogue and United Synagogue Day Schools sponsored a Buy Israel Marketplace on Sunday, where merchants sold Israeli products. The goal was to help the Israeli economy by increasing the profile of the products in the Greater Toronto Area. Five per cent of sales will be donated to victims of terror.

IN MEMORY OF SLAIN ISRAELIS: Ruth Goldberg, whose son Yechezkel was killed in a terrorist attack in Jerusalem in January, lights the memorial candle at the recent Yom Hazikaron assembly in honour of Israeli soldiers killed in battle and victims of terrorism. Yechezkel's brother Ronn Goldberg said Kaddish. Included in the ceremony held at Beth Tikvah Synagogue was the Order of the Day by IDF Chief of Staff Maj. (Res) Eitan Glazer, the chanting of K'El Maleh Rachamim by Beth Tikvah Cantor Tibor Kovari, several readings and a choir performance by students of United Synagogue Day Schools and Bialik Hebrew Day School. Savings from tax credit's repeal lower than Liberals projected

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS) is calling on parents of children in private schools to re-invigorate a pressure campaign in the wake of reports that savings generated by Ontario's cancellation of the Equity in Education Tax Credit will be much lower than the provincial Liberals had projected.

In an e-mailing, the association encourages parents to write to MPPs and say "the government has returned to full state-sponsored religious discrimination against our children."

The actual cost of the tax credit in 2002 – the only year it was in effect – was $29 million, according to an internal ministry of finance document dated Nov. 24, 2003, obtained by the OAJDS in January through a freedom of information request.

The $29 million is far less than even the OAJDS' own estimate of $45 million in savings for 2002.

By extension, the association says, the cost of the EETC in 2003, when the credit's rate was to double from 10 per cent of tuition to 20 per cent, would have been $60 million.

However, Queen's Park pegged the savings generated by the credit's cancellation at $165 million in 2003 and a healthy $450 million in 2004.

During last fall's election campaign, the Liberals campaigned on eventual savings of $500 million with the scrapping of what they called the "private school tax credit."

Now, the government acknowledges that actual savings in 2004 will be lower than its projections.

The credit was cancelled in December, retroactive to Jan. 1, 2003. The move triggered anger and disappointment in the Jewish community, which charged that Ontario was returning to discriminating against religious minorities who opt out of the public or separate school systems.

"We knew what the numbers were all along and we're disappointed the government didn't listen," OAJDS co-chair Ira Walfish told The CJN.

Last December, the OAJDS, along with other stakeholders, made submissions to the government during hearings on the proposed retroactive cancellation of the EETC.

The association argued that the two per cent of Ontario's non-Catholic religious groups deserve to be funded like Catholics; that the United Nations had ruled against Ontario on its funding policy; and that retroactively cancelling the EETC was "mean-spirited and that it would hurt tens of thousands of hard-working, middle and lower income parents."

All along, "we believed that the cost [of the credit] was substantially lower than the government's projections."

Even in the OAJDS' wildest projections, savings generated by the EETC's cancellation could never have surpassed $350 million, Walfish said.

"But that was never really possible," he explained. "It assumed that every one of the 100,000 students [in the Jewish system] filed; it assumed the rate at a maximum of $3,500 [per student]; and it did not take into account the federal charitable credit."

Walfish said the Liberals projected savings of up to $500 million "never made sense. They made it up."

Queen's Park last week countered that the debate misses the point: The Liberals cancelled the EETC because of their support for an already cash-strapped public education system.

"It doesn't become good government policy if it is only $20- or $30- or $50- or $100-million," finance minister Greg Sorbara was quoted as saying. "It is bad public policy to use taxpayers' money to fund private education in Ontario."

Walfish doesn't buy that argument.

"I don't think it's a money issue," he said, citing last week's announcement by the Liberals to limit class sizes in the public system to 20 students. "The cost of that will be astronomical. The amount [the tax credit] would cost is minuscule by comparison."

Walfish concedes the tax credit matter is closed, "but it's important to keep the issue alive and engage the Liberals."

The goal is still "full funding, not a tax credit."

Petition hopes to sway gov't on faith-based schools

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

When it comes to ending educational discrimination in Ontario, Aryeh Snitman says you should never say never.

For the past few months, Snitman, whose children go to the United Synagogue Day School, has used the Internet to rally parents against the current provincial policy that funds Catholic education and excludes all other faith-based schools.

Since January, he has gathered more than 5,000 signatures on a petition requesting funding for religious schools "on the same basis by which funding is made available to Catholic schools" in Ontario.

The "Equal Education Funding Petition," states that "blatant religious discrimination of this kind has no place and should not be tolerated in a multicultual, pluralistic country like Canada."

It goes on to say that "equal treatment of all citizens by government is one of the foundations on which democratic society is based."

The petition asks readers, regardless of their religious affiliation, to make their views known to Premier Dalton

Perlasca film ponders: Would we do the same?

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

"A man has to do his duty," pronounces the screen version of Giorgio Perlasca in a rare reflective moment after being asked about his motives. Why is he, an Italian Catholic businessman, risking his own skin to issue life-saving documents to Jews in the dying days of World War II? Surveying the war-ravaged rubble of Budapest around him, he replies, "Perhaps because I have to."

The cinematic rendering of Perlasca, the largely unknown hero of the Holocaust who rescued as many as 5,000 Hungarian Jews from certain death, rings true for the man's real-life son.

"He just thought he was performing his duties as a human being," Franco Perlasca told The CJN following last week's screening of the Italian docudrama Perlasca: An Italian Hero. "Anyone else would have done the same thing."

That's the central moral dilemma the stunning two-hour movie posits. Would any of us in the same position risk our lives to save total strangers? And if so, could we keep it a secret for 45 years?

It's a thought that played on the minds of the 250 or so leading lights of Toronto's Italian and Jewish communities, who came together April 19 for a special reception and screening of the film, made for Italian television and shown widely in Europe.

At a fundraising reception on the executive floor of the Royal Bank prior to the screening, guests donated $1,000 per person to a variety of charities, including the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, Jewish National Fund, the Perlasca Foundation, Villa Columbo charities and the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Jewish National Fund announced that from its share of funds raised, a forest in Perlasca's honour will be planted near Haifa.

RBC Financial Group's charitable foundation announced a $1-million donation toward the creation of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights in Winnipeg, a dream of the late media mogul Israel Asper. The funds were accepted by Asper's daughter, Gail Asper.

The donation was cheered by Toronto Police Chief Julian Fantino, who delivered a stirring speech against anti-Semitism, as well as by aviation entrepreneur and Jewish philanthropist Walter Arbib, who saw the film last year on Italian state television and organized the Toronto screening, and Mary Siklos, director of Toronto's Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, 11 members of whose immediate family, including her mother, owed their lives to Perlasca.

There wasn't a dry eye in the house when Siklos hugged Franco Perlasca in gratitude. "It was a tremendous honour," Siklos said later. "The son of the rescuer meeting the daughter of the rescued."

But the evening's centrepiece was the movie (subtitled in English), which has been likened to Schindler's List. Unlike the entrepreneurial Oskar Schindler, and more like the Swedish war hero Raoul Wallenberg, who rescued as many as 100,000 Hungarian Jews with fake passes, Perlasca acted out of pure altruism, dangers be damned.

A meat importer stationed in Budapest, he declined to return to his native Italy after the fall of Mussolini in 1943. Following the German invasion of 1944, he blustered his way into Spain's embassy and revealed himself as a former fighter for Franco's fascists during the Spanish Civil War.

The Spanish ambassador put him in charge of safe houses that sheltered Jews who had already received protective papers and flew the neutral Spanish flag.

But when the Spanish envoy fled to Switzerland in late 1944, Perlasca boldly announced that he was the legation's consul and used the more Spanish-sounding name "Jorge." Without Madrid's knowledge, he and a secretary continued to crank out the protective documents, and he roamed a dangerous city handing them out.

Time and again, using bluff and bravado, the pretend diplomat stared down Nazis and dreaded members of the pro-Nazi Hungarian Arrow Cross militia. In one famous instance, he pulled two 12-year-old boys from a long line of children headed for an Auschwitz-bound train, and put them in his car.

Instantly, an SS officer approached and tried to pull the boys out.

"This car is extra-territorial!" Perlasca shouted. "It has diplomatic immunity. Look at the license plates. Look at the Spanish flag."

The Nazi pulled out his pistol. The argument escalated.

That's when Wallenberg himself appeared and joined the fray until a dapper Nazi colonel pulled up and coolly told the SS man to let the boys go.

"Their time will come," he said.

"Who was that?" Perlasca wondered.

"You don't know?" responded an astonished Wallenberg. "That was Adolf Eichmann."

The scene is rivetingly recreated in the film, which isn't easy to watch. Its shots of destruction rival those of The Pianist, while its depiction of executions is brutally honest.

Perlasca, though clearly no soft touch, is also depicted in full. He can't hide in disgust and grief upon discovering mounds of corpses.

Following the liberation of Hungary by the Red Army in January 1945, Perlasca returned to Italy – and obscurity. He never mentioned his exploits, not even to his wife, until a group of women he'd saved found him living in Padua.

In a 1990 magazine article, his story poured out and in short order, the self-effacing Perlasca was paid the highest civilian honours by Spain, Italy, Hungary and Israel, which conferred the title of Righteous Among the Nations. He died in 1992 at the age of 82. Even in his advanced years, as the film shows using televised footage, he called on young people to renounce violence. The message was received at a special screening for high school students also on April 19 and in a showing for the public that evening. Organizers say a general release of the film is being planned.

Crying into the wind

The United Nations Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR) meets each year in regular session for six weeks in Geneva between March to April. This year's session, the 60th, concluded last week on April 23 and once again it failed to condemn, or even cast any light, on the world's most egregious abuses of humanity.

Unless Israel is on its agenda, it is not likely that the UNCHR will attach any priority, let alone urgency, to human rights violations committed by Arab states. That is not surprising, given the predominance of Muslim, Third World and "non-aligned" states on the 53-nation body.

How else can one explain the commission's tepid report last week on the widespread killing and murderous brutality by a government-supported Arab militia against the black African residents of the western province of Sudan known as Darfur?

Newspapers have reported extensively on the atrocities being committed there.

"The United Nations estimates 750,000 black Africans have been forced out of their homes by Arab militia," wrote Kelly McParland in the National Post. "Tens of thousands have died; more than 100,000 have fled to Chad, while hundreds of thousands more cower near the border telling stories of executions, rape, torture and pillage."

According to U.S. Ambassador to the UN Richard Williamson, some 30,000 people in Sudan have died in "racial and ethnic targeting." He rejected the commission's response as inadequate and demanded stronger UN action in the wake of "the horrific events" unfolding there.

But Williamson's lament will be like that of Cassandra's, a cry into the wind, unheard, unheeded and forgotten.

But it is a cry that must bend the hearts of all decent peoples and western governments. First and foremost, there is, of course, the horrible victimization of the black Africans in Darfur that must be immediately stopped. Lives must be saved. In addition, however, there is the need to arrest the marginalization-into-irrelevancy of the UNCHR, so painfully, though poignantly, illustrated by the Darfur case.

When it is not whipping Israel with absurdly false accusations – such as that Israel deliberately infects Palestinians with the AIDS virus or contaminates the Palestinian water supply – the UNCHR is assiduously avoiding the true human rights tragedies around the world.

Our government has a role to play in trying to reverse this unfortunate state of affairs at the UNCHR. Canada should be in the forefront, rallying our allies, trying to restore purpose, clarity and honesty to the proceedings of the UNCHR – for the sake of the goodness that could flow throughout the world from a human rights watchdog of integrity, and for the sake of the countless suffering victims of real human rights violations, such as the black Africans of Darfur.

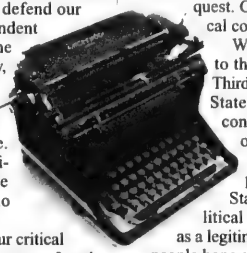
Greetings to Diaspora Jewry

On the occasion of Yom Ha'atzmaut, I am pleased to send you greetings from Jerusalem – the eternal capital of the State of Israel and the Jewish people.

The Jewish state was forged in struggle. Fifty-six years later, although still wielding the sword to defend our nation, we can boast proudly of an independent Jewish democracy that continues to lead the world in fields such as medicine, technology, agriculture and the arts.



The war of terror launched against our country 3½ years ago has not broken our spirit or extinguished our desire for peace. Today, we remain firmly committed to eradicating the threat of terrorism facing the State of Israel, while simultaneously leaving no stone unturned in our pursuit of peace.

We must also act vigorously to achieve our critical objective of bringing one million new immigrants to Israel over the next decade. A strong and vibrant Israel, energized by the contributions of these olim, is the key to Jewish survival in our homeland and throughout the Diaspora. At this historic juncture, the future of the Jewish people rests entirely in our collective hands. Now, more than ever before, we need you here with us.

United together, we can move forward and realize our shared dream of peace, security and prosperity in the Land of Israel.

Chag Sameach.

Prime Minister, Israel

Short memories

In the article "Jews, non-Jews unite against anti-Semitism" (CJN, April 1), about the community rally against anti-Semitism late last month, Ron Csillag writes, "On the day of the event, Vancouver NDP MP Libby Davies, who attended the rally, put forward a resolution in the House condemning the rash of anti-Semitic attacks 'in the strongest terms' and calling on international agencies 'to combat the scourge of anti-Semitism in Canada and globally.'"

Do we have such short memories? Is this not the same woman who, along with NDP MP Svend Robinson, attended another rally outside Concordia University in September 2002 to protest against former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's right to free speech and the right of his audience to hear him, giving succor to Israel's enemies and perhaps fuelling the flames of anti-Semitism?

I should be happy she introduced a resolution against anti-Semitism in Parliament?

America's democratic quest

I take issue with Mel Shipman (Letters to the Editor, CJN, April 8), who disagreed with Robert Fulford's article "Canada, America and Israel and the future of freedom," which appeared in the March 18 issue of The CJN.

Getting information about the United States by reading the Walrus is like (getting information about Israel by??) reading the Guardian or listening to the BBC or the CBC. The United States is succeeding admirably in its democratic quest. Canada has succeeded admirably in political correctness.

Why do many of our nation's finest emigrate to the United States? Why do citizens of the Third World risk their lives to get into the United States? Because they are willing to work and contribute. They are not looking for handouts or to fight ethnic wars from their homelands.

Shipman should read the Emma Lazarus poem etched in stone at the base of the Statue of Liberty. In our weird world of political correctness that accepts suicide bombing as a legitimate form of protest, her words give decent people hope and courage.

Far be it from me to detract from the many credits that Anna Morgan deserves, but the picture of me on your front page (CJN, April 22) is not one of them. That credit goes to Stephen Epstein, one of Toronto's finest photographers and a person dedicated to the Jewish community. Indeed, he somehow managed to instantly remove the 10 pounds that Anna has been telling me for years to get rid of. Artistic achievement is underappreciated in modern society, but for that flattering picture, Stevie deserves recognition as one of the best.

Anti-Semitism should not define us

The lessons offered by Elliott Malamet's article "Anti-Semitism should not define us" is front-page material that should become our mantra.

Harvard professor Ruth Wisse has said the Jewish people would not have survived if the Passover Haggadah was only a retelling of our experience as slaves. "Negative identity" is easy to sell on television in a superficial victimhood/politically correct world, but it does not last.

Malamet understands that the contributions of our ethical principles must be what define us, not the morality of those who hate us. That it is not either shows a laziness, a failure of our educational system or a consequence of being a minority. But Malamet's admonishments should not be surprising to Canadian Jews. After all, if you ask Canadians about our national identity, we would say, "I do not know what it means to be Canadian, I just know I am not American."

Peace is back in style

By STEPHEN SCHEINBERG

In recent months, a peace discourse has begun anew in Israel. The number of proposals seems to grow every day, and includes the Geneva initiative, the Nusseibah-Ayalon peace petition and One Voice Israel, with its endorsement by Hollywood stars such as Jason Alexander, who recently visited Israel. Add to these Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza disengagement initiative, which has offered a right-wing scenario for a kind of peace. During the past three years of violence, little was heard of peace but much about "destroying the terrorist infrastructure," "targeted assassinations," house destructions and the like.

The mood of Israelis is captured in their humour during the recent period. One story has it that a Canadian journalist witnessed an old man praying at the Western Wall every day as she passed there. Finally she asked him, "What are you offering your prayers for?"

He replied that he came to the wall to pray for peace.

That's wonderful, she intoned. "What does it feel like?"

"It feels," he responded, "like talking to a wall."

Such humour reflected not only the pessimism of this recent period, but a lack of trust in the Palestinians and a preference for military force over diplomacy.

Today, strong voices for peace are being heard again. Politicians, active and retired military personnel, rabbis and many others are once again stepping forward and urging negotiations. Most important, the Israeli peace movement has revived to mobilize tens of thousands of people. On Nov. 1, more than 100,000 people assembled in Rabin Square in Tel Aviv to demand new attention to political solutions to the conflict. Many Israelis and Palestinians have expressed their sympathy for new peace proposals.

Why has this shift taken place? Why are large segments of the Israeli public again considering prospects for peace? There are seven important reasons:

• Economics. The economy of Israel is in serious trouble. Foreign investment has slowed to a trickle, domestic investment has sharply declined and economic growth is near zero. In the heady days of Oslo, Israel averaged six to seven per cent growth per year. Now, one-fifth of Israelis, and one-third of the nation's children, live in poverty. Clearly, capital detests instability, and in an era of globalization, it has many choices other than Israel. It is not too difficult for many Israelis to grasp the connections between peace, security and the economy.

• Morals. Three years of conflict have had a ruinous effect on Palestinian lives. One may properly blame the corruption and bad leadership of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and his cronies for Palestinian suffering, but the occupation and the closing of borders have also played an important role. It is not merely the Palestinian economy that has suffered, but also Palestinian lives, which are too often dominated by the Israeli military. Checkpoints, house destructions and the like are daily insults to a proud Palestinian population. Some Israelis harden their hearts in the name of security and necessity, but others voice their moral outrage. Some soldiers refuse to serve in the occupied territories and some air-force officers also reject such duties. Avraham Burg, former Knesset speaker and an observant Jew, has voiced this anguish, saying that Israeli democracy, the meaning of Zionism and the very foundation of the state are threatened by the occupation.

• The United States in the Middle East. We all know that U.S. President George W. Bush's Iraq venture is not turning out as planned. Many members of the Bush administration had hoped Iraq would be the initial autocratic domino to fall and spread its new democratic influence to the entire Middle East after it first spread to Arafat and the Palestinians. However, the end of the Iraq conflict is not in sight and members of the Bush administration are now joining with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who recognized that the burden of Sharon and the settlers he supports was one the Iraq invaders should not carry as they try to retain some friends in the Middle East.

Paul Wolfowitz, U.S. assistant secretary of defence, recently endorsed the Nusseibeh-Ayalon peace petition and had harsh words for what he called the Israeli security "wall." U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell also wrote an encouraging letter to the principal negotiators of the Geneva agreement and met with them in Washington.

However, the American position was best developed by U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Carl Ford in a briefing to the Senate Committee on Intelligence and Research. Ford's briefing, which also reflected the position of the CIA, said any Israeli-Palestinian agreement must be advanced by U.S. pressure on Israel regarding the settlements, and is essential to stability in Iraq. Yet, while one should not expect too much from the Bush administration before the elections in November, many Israelis are aware that their present government does not hold a blank cheque from the United States.

• Bankruptcy of the Military Solution. It is now becoming evident to many Israelis that a purely military approach to the Palestinians cannot work. It deprives the latter of all hope and it may create more shaheeds or martyrs. These suicide bombers are not merely crazed Islamists, they are also products of a social environment that gives them little room to hope for a better future than martyrdom.

In late October, the Israeli army's chief of staff Moshe Ya'alon held an unusual press conference in which he expressed his disagreement with a government policy that offered no political solutions. Many observers believed he saw another uprising in the making and refused to take the rap for it. Similar sentiments were voiced by four former chiefs of the Shin Bet who in mid-November sharply criticized government policy, the occupation, the security fence and suppression of the Palestinians. One of them, Avraham Shalom, said, "We must once and for all admit that there is another side, that it has feelings, and that it is suffering and that we are behaving disgracefully."

• Demography. Israelis, despite Sharon's denials, are aware that they will soon become a minority in the land between the Mediterranean and the Jordan (historic Palestine). The London Sunday Telegraph recently reported that Israeli out-migration has reached approximately 200,000 people since the year 2000. At that rate, and with only a trickle of new immigrants coming to Israel, the spectre of a Palestinian majority looms ever closer.

Some scholars think that point will come in 10 to 15 years. Israel will then have only four options when the Palestinian demand becomes "one man, one vote":

• a bi-national state, which effectively means the end of Israel;

• some form of transfer (a euphemism for ethnic cleansing);

• continuous warfare in the face of world opinion demanding observance of democratic voting norms; or

• a plea for a two-state solution, though the time for that will have passed as Palestinians recognize the potency of their majority status.

Of course, Sharon's Gaza initiative is also a response to the demographic issue. The prime minister and his supporters hope for a unilateral redrawing of borders that would sacrifice a handful of Gaza settlements for American guarantees on the major West Bank settlement blocs, leaving the majority of Palestinians outside of Israel.

• Politics. The Israeli left needs a peace platform as well as a social platform to attempt to regain a significant share of public support. Former Israeli justice minister Yossi Beilin has parlayed his Geneva prominence into a leadership of the new leftist party Yahad. For his part, Avraham Burg may be using the same tactic within the Labor Party. A few months ago, Burg could hardly be distinguished from his competitors, but his identification with Geneva could stand him in good stead in a leadership contest.

Even the ranks of the rightist Likud have been stirred by the new peace initiatives. It is notable that one of the leading contenders for Sharon's crown, Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, has seen fit to offer his own proposition, calling for a unilateral separation of Israel from a rump Palestinian entity. Of course, in right-wing circles, even a threat to abandon some settlements and outposts can set off a storm, and posters linking Olmert with Hitler have already appeared, and a large settler rally recently booed at the mention of Sharon's name. The Olmert-Sharon unilateral separation proposal is, of course, not a peace plan but a design for salvaging most of the settlements and leaving a rump Palestinian entity, but militant settlers fear a domino effect and resist giving up anything.

• The New Middle Eastern Neighbourhood. Important changes are being signalled in the Middle East and relieving some of the security pressure on Israel. First, one of Israel's main enemies, Saddam Hussein's Iraq, has been destroyed and it will be years, if ever, before it could pose a danger to Israel. Elsewhere in the region there are interesting signs, including a new peace overture by Syrian President Bashar Assad and the renunciation by Libya of weapons of mass destruction. Even Iran's crackdown on reformers has been viewed as a sign of weakness. No one is suggesting this is now a nice neighbourhood for Israel to have to live in, but it may be changing for the better and enhancing opportunities for peace.

Despite these changes, it is never wise to be overly optimistic about peace prospects in the Middle East. Arafat and Sharon are not known as great peacemakers. Arafat's health appears to have improved and he has recently come out on top in a battle for control of the Palestinian government. Given the ongoing corruption allegations against Sharon and his sons, it is impossible to guess how long he may last. Even if Sharon falls and an election is called, there doesn't appear to be a Rabin-like figure to oppose him or his potential successors, meaning there is no opposition leader who would not only advocate peace, but who would also give the Israeli public assurance that their security would be better off in his hands.

Many Israelis and Palestinians are rethinking their positions and turning from conflict to hopes for peace. Can Palestinians eschew tragic violence and death and find their way to nonviolent action and negotiation? Can Israel again become a light unto the world, a restored democracy, and reclaim the idealistic Zionism that once called for peace? I have a faint glimmer of hope, for the silence has been broken and thousands of people on both sides are demanding a peaceful resolution to their painful conflict. Jews in the Diaspora can make a critical difference if they turn from their unthinking support of existing government policies to the support of a secure, democratic Israel living in peace with its Palestinian neighbours.

On judgment

We all know the maxim, "Don't judge someone until you have walked a mile in their shoes." There is also the related expression, "Don't judge a book by its cover." We frequently pay verbal homage to such sentiments. Rubbish! How can we walk in someone's shoes? We can never know the full context or story. We always get a sense of things by seeing what appears before our eyes.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

We judge everyone, all the time, everywhere. That is what we humans do. Favourably, this is called critical thinking, perceptive analysis or "people smarts." All such labels acknowledge that humans engage in constant evaluations that require the capacity of judgment. It is part of our faculty of thought, of intelligent differentiation, of enabling us to make distinctions so we can function and make appropriate choices.

Yet, we must also recognize that the above aphorisms are part of our popular heritage precisely because there is something problematic about judging others. It is presumptuous, because we presume to know. Additionally, perhaps those statements caution us because we are afraid of the judgment of others. What are they saying about me? Are my clothes right, or my words, my allegiances, my thoughts? Sometimes this process yields the worst sort of political correctness. We wield a powerful tool in judging others, and we succumb to control by others in deferring to their judgment.

Many years ago, I attended the funeral of a friend's daughter. The girl was very young and it was a terrible tragedy. The funeral was very difficult, to say the least. I remember well my reaction to the eulogy. I thought it was terrible. I thought the rabbi was terrible. He did not draw out our emotions – no tears burst forth. He gave a rather brief and, to my mind, dry speech. Not what I was expecting. I judged and found him wanting.

Imagine my surprise when my friend – the mother – told me privately how grateful she was. You see, she had asked the rabbi to help her get through the ordeal. She did not want to break down during the funeral. She needed to keep her mourning private. So he did the right thing and helped her. How was I to know? I couldn't have. Hence my reaction was inappropriate, and the rabbi's behaviour was appropriate. I have tried to remember that lesson, but it is difficult.

Obviously, there are forms of judgment that are appropriate and others that are not.

So how to distinguish them? I do not have any failsafe guidelines, just a warning to be careful, to remember my story, to try to understand context, to be generous, and to be humble.

I've got a little list

"As some day it may happen that a victim must be found
"I've got a little list – I've got a little list
"Of society offenders who might well be underground
"And who never would be missed – who never would be missed." (The Mikado)

What a charming thought: to have a list of malefactors at whose door all our society ills could be laid.

This is what Kalle Lasn, editor of Adbusters magazine, came up with in his most recent issue. His list of prominent American "neocons," with Jews marked with big black dots, purports to identify the dangerous cabal leading the western world to destruction. Who is at the bottom of this mystery? The Jew!

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Lists can be benign or malicious, depending on intent. What, in true rabbinic fashion we ask, is a benign list? Laundry and grocery lists. Lists of people invited to your seders. A list of Nobel Prize winners. A list of Righteous Gentiles.

The most famous and redemptive list, I believe, is the list of 1,500 or so Jews saved by Oskar Schindler during the Holocaust, for which he will always be remembered.

That list is the antithesis of Lasn's.

More in keeping with Adbusters' intent was the list U.S. senator Joseph McCarthy brandished in the 1950s. "I have here," he claimed, "a list of Communists." Except that he had no such list. His attack on American liberals, especially those in that hotbed of that Jewish conspiracy, Hollywood, broadened until it had destroyed the lives of thousands, among them many Jews. There's a list Adbusters could love.

The neo-Nazi movement has long lists of Jews it imagines, in its delusional world, to be the enemies of Christianity. These lists often include former U.S. presidents Franklin Roosevelt and Dwight Eisenhower who, although of course not Jewish, are identified with the liberal democratic tradition that neo-Nazis despise.

What is Adbusters' rationale? According to the National Post, Lasn said that if his list "were a list of dentists or firefighters… that would indeed be offensive." (Why would you identify Jewish dentists or firefighters in the first place?) The thought leads back to the Nazi practice of identifying, then rounding up, the Jews of Europe for extermination.

But Lasn slyly adds that because neo-cons "are the most influential political/intellectual force in the world right now," he feels obligated to "put them under a microscope." Their undue influence, he argues, deforms American policy toward the Middle East, and Israel in particular.

I have no problem arguing with the neoconservatives of this world. I find their ideology to be limited, narrow, and sometimes laughable, and right now, they do seem to rule the roost in the United States, for better or worse. But I have a big problem with identifying them with some sort of Jewish conspiracy. That thought brings up another list, that of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, who also supposedly ruled the world.

So Adbusters and the Nazis have something in common. Both think Jews rule the world. Both make lists of these evildoers and publish them as a public service, so we will all know whose fault it is when things go wrong. Never mind that today's actual political heads of state are good church-going Christians – it's the Jews hiding in the shadows that we must keep an eye on.

It's sad to think that someone sincerely believes that by identifying the Jews in a movement – any movement – he will bring about a better world.

How effective will Lasn's list be? Not very. The Mikado's "little list" was scary, but love trumped his evil plans and conquered all. So, too, will Jews go on being conservatives, liberals, socialists and capitalists, just like everyone else.

The Adbusters list weakens the efforts of that magazine to speak out on other issues. But Lasn doesn't get it, and continues to defend the indefensible. Next time he wants to make a list, he would be better off listing companies that pollute, that mislead and cheat their shareholders, or market their products falsely.

That is information we need, as good consumers and citizens. Save the secret cabals for the movies.

Obie, zichrono livrachah

In December, my wife and I attended a reading by Sheldon Oberman at McNally Robinson Booksellers in Winnipeg. "Obie" was reading excerpts from his recently published twelfth book, Island of the Minotaur: Greek Myths of Ancient Crete. It was more than a typical public reading, though. It was a triumph of sorts, a victory celebration. Like some of the heroes of ancient myths, Obie had fought a demon – in his case, cancer. He had won, or so it seemed, and was returning to his cheering followers.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

While he looked older and sounded a bit different, his deep voice was still captivating, and his words were still enchanting.

Obie's victory, though, was short-lived. The cancer returned aggressively and on March 26, one of Canada's greatest writers and storytellers died at the age of 54.

The exploration of cultures and folktales inspired Obie, and a couple of his books highlight Jewish themes. The Wisdom Bird: A Tale of Solomon and Sheba retells a folktale, blending Jewish, east African and Yemenite versions. The multi-award winning The Always Prayer Shawl is a touching and powerful story about the passing of time and the endurance of tradition. A two-volume collection of Obie-written Jewish folktales will be published in the near future.

His other books include The White Stone in the Castle Wall, a wonderful tale about Toronto's Casa Loma; The Lion in the Lake, a charming, bilingual alphabet book; and The Shaman's Nephew, a collection of stories about Inuit life at the Arctic Circle, for which Obie was short-listed for a Governor General's Award. His work also included film, theatre, short stories, articles and children's songs. More information about Obie and his work is available at http://www.shelonoberman.com/index.shtml.

Here in Winnipeg, though, Obie will be remembered for more than his writing. He worked for three decades as an English, journalism and drama teacher at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, the city's Jewish high school. For hundreds of students, including me, he was an icon: the guy who always had a colourful story to tell, the teacher whose unique curriculum left more than a few parents scratching their heads. He was deep, innovative and never dull. He took risks and encouraged his students to do the same. With Obie, you didn't just study literature, you studied life. He taught his students to observe, absorb and express. He taught with zeal, never going through the motions.

And for those of his students who pursued further study and work in writing and communications, we can all claim some lasting inspiration from Obie. His passion for words, characters and stories was sincere and contagious.

I will miss Obie. He was a creative soul and a grand inspiration. A reminder that you can find your muse, create stories and discover meaning anywhere you look – at home, on your travels, in your job and from the past.

Coincidentally, I wrote about Obie in my first CJN column in February 2002. I told of a project he developed in which he asked his students to learn and write their family stories. He gathered the submissions and produced a bound text that serves as a powerful tapestry of Jewish history.

I say coincidentally, because I've decided to make this my last CJN column. It's been a delight writing for this outstanding paper, but it's time to move on. I've experienced top-notch copy editing from a talented crew, and great motivation from editor Mordechai Ben-Dat. And it's been an honour to share this page with many fine writers, especially the legendary Rabbi Gunther Plaut.

The biggest thrill, though, has been hearing from readers across Canada and even a few from elsewhere. Because of the e-mail this column has generated, I've discovered family in Israel I never knew I had; hooked up with distant cousins who told stories of my late father that I had never heard before; and I even picked up some tips on parenting and how to avoid caffeine-withdrawal headaches on Yom Kippur.

Thank you all. It has been a pleasure.

Rising U.S. casualties in Iraq raise questions

On April 15, The New York Times published a full-page spread containing the head-and-shoulder photographs of 64 American soldiers killed in Iraq in the previous week. The calm faces of the deceased, the vast majority under the age of 30 and bursting with youthful vigour, summoned up jolting memories of the horrendous casualties the United States sustained in Vietnam in the 1960s and 1970s and in Lebanon in 1983.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The U.S. death toll in Iraq is rising to intolerable levels and eroding support for the American mission there. Seven hundred U.S. soldiers have been killed since last year's invasion, and April has been the cruellest month of all for the Americans in this strife-torn tribalistic country. So far this April, more than 100 troops have fallen, as many as in the 2003 invasion.

With American and coalition forces facing a Sunni rebellion in Falluja, a Shiite insurrection in Najaf and an upsurge of fighting along the Syrian frontier, the prognosis for the future is at best uncertain. It seems clear that the United States underestimated the problems it would encounter in Iraq, which has rarely known a moment of quiet since Saddam Hussein's invasion of Iran in 1980 and of Kuwait in 1990.

Planning for worst-case scenarios, American commanders have prepared for a lengthy campaign to quell the twin uprisings, the worst since the revolt against the British in 1920, and the Bush administration has extended the tours of about 20,000 U.S. troops. Meanwhile, Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, one of the chief backers of the war to unseat Saddam's Ba'athist regime, has acknowledged his surprise at the high level of violence throughout Iraq.

In retrospect, the Americans made three miscalculations. After the long, dark night of Saddam's brutal dictatorship, they assumed that they would be welcomed as liberators, a school of thought propounded by U.S. Vice-President Dick Cheney; that their allies, the Iraqi exiles, would be accepted as legitimate representatives of the Iraqi people; and that the Shiites would back them without reservations. None of these assumptions, which appeared reasonable, has panned out.

A virulent strain of anti-Americanism – fuelled by Arab nationalism, Islamic fundamentalism, lingering resentment of the West's colonial legacy in the Middle East, the lack of security (as exemplified by last week's bloodbath in Basra), massive joblessness and American support of Israel – has enveloped Iraq.

In the main, the exiles have been met with suspicion and derision, while the Iraqi Governing Council – a 25-member advisory board established by the Coalition Provisional Authority, headed by Paul Bremer – is widely regarded as a compliant adjunct of the American administration. As for the Shiites, who comprise almost two-thirds of Iraq's population and who suffered egregiously under Saddam, they have embraced the Americans with less-than-tepid enthusiasm.

The most important Shiite figure, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, has consistently criticized the American occupation and opposed the modalities for transferring authority to an interim Iraqi government on June 30. In addition, he has tacitly supported the uprising mounted by Moktada al-Sadr, his deeply anti-American colleague. Sadr and his followers paranoically believe that the United States wants to uproot Islam in Iraq, steal its oil and deny the Shiites a credible voice in a future Iraqi government. Sistani, however, has called for a peaceful resolution to the current crisis, which was triggered by two separate events: the closing on March 28 of Al Hawaza, a radical Shiite weekly published in Baghdad and reflecting the views of Sadr, and the gruesome murder and mutilation of four American security guards in Falluja – a Sunni stronghold – three days later.

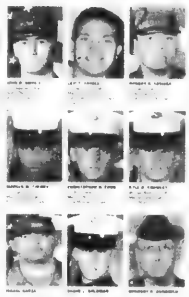
In Falluja, where fierce fighting has raged on and off for the past three weeks despite a truce, and where the Americans have taken serious casualties, U.S. marines have been forced to engage in classic block-by-block urban warfare. The Americans have promised to call off their offensive – which has killed some 600 insurgents and civilians – if the rebels give up the Iraqis who murdered the four Americans and turn over their heavy weapons.

Southward in Najaf, a Shiite holy centre where Sadr is barricaded with his Mahdi militia, the marines have yet to launch an offensive. They are caught between the imperatives of maintaining order and not alienating moderate Shiites. Be that as it may, the United States is determined to disband Sadr's Mahdi Army, which has 3,000 to 10,000 fighters armed with rocket-propelled grenades, mortars and light weapons.

Having learned the lessons of Israel's ill-fated occupation of southern Lebanon, the United States is trying not to sink into the quagmire that swamped Israel.

Israel's objectives in Lebanon were basically twofold: to establish a new, friendly order and to contain Palestinian terrorism. Israel's first goal fell by the wayside when Bashir Gemayel, Lebanon's newly elected, pro-Israel Christian Maronite president, was assassinated by Syrian agents in 1982. With Gemayel suddenly out of the picture, Lebanon was taken over by politicians generally hostile to Israel and in Syria's pocket.

Israel did manage to decapitate Palestinian terrorism in Fatahland, a slice of rugged Lebanese territory adjacent to the Israeli border. But in the process of pacifying southern Lebanon, Israel prolonged its stay and thereby alienated and angered the Shiites, who, having borne the fallout of Palestinian attacks against Israel, had welcomed Israel's 1982 invasion.



The rest is history. Deeply resentful of Israel's occupation, the Shiites formed Hezbollah, which gradually challenged Israeli hegemony in southern Lebanon. Supported by Syria and Iran, Hezbollah conducted an increasingly effective guerrilla war against the Israeli army.

Mindful of Israel's bitter experiences with the Shiites in Lebanon, the United States will do everything in its power to court the Shiites of Iraq. Next to this priority, Washington's overarching aim is to foster the creation of a pro-American free-market democracy that will serve as an example to the Arab world, which is bogged down in authoritarianism and sectarianism. On April 13, President George W. Bush reaffirmed his intention to stay the course, fight terrorism and build a stable democratic order in Iraq. But he knows full well that the U.S. project there is utterly dependent on Shiite goodwill and that without their co-operation, the current violence could yet ripen into a full-fledged uprising.

As the Americans besiege Falluja and Najaf, they have also been busy on a third military front. In a bid to choke off the flow of foreign fighters into Iraq from Syria and Iran, the U.S. army has aggressively patrolled these porous borders, built an earthen barrier along the length of the Syrian frontier and fought running battles with insurgents. And in a forceful demarche, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell has again warned Syria to better control its border. Amid these developments, U.S. troops are struggling to keep open vital supply lines that have come under attack in the last month.

The prevailing climate of insecurity has overshadowed two major political challenges that must be addressed without delay: Who will govern Iraq after June 30? Can the so-called "coalition of the willing," assembled by the United States with such painstaking care, be preserved in the face of incessant turmoil?

Washington's plan until recently was to transfer sovereignty to the Iraqi Governing Council. But in an about-face related to the current difficulties, the Bush administration has taken the advice of the United Nations and decided to replace the council with a more representative caretaker government. It is a good idea. The United States should share the burden of rebuilding Iraq with the United Nations. Washington cannot do it alone.

Neither should the United States assume full responsibility for stabilizing Iraq. In the past two weeks, Spain, Honduras and the Dominican Republic have announced plans to withdraw forces from Iraq. If additional countries pull out, the insurgents will surely be emboldened. And so it is incumbent on the United States to staunch the hemorrhaging by persuading allies to help keep the peace in Iraq.

All things considered, as Globe and Mail columnist Jeffery Simpson noted last week, the United States is embroiled in an unenviable bind in Iraq. As he put it: "The more the United States remains, the more it will be resented. The faster it departs, the greater the chances of chaos."

For the stake of stability in the Middle East, Washington needs to resolve this vexing paradox as soon as possible.

Lost 85 pounds six years ago, and has easily kept it off!

85 lbs. lighter ...

6 yrs. & counting!

I was overweight nearly my entire life. Everything revolved around food.

Carrying an extra 85 pounds is hard work. I was always tired. I looked for excuses to stay home. I spent a lot of time in bed.

The truth is I was hiding. My weight embarrassed me. I was a spectator.

I tried everything: pre-packaged food, shakes, every weird diet. I counted, weighed, measured and starved. I lost my weight once with medication. I gained it all back plus 70 lbs.

When I finally visited Positive Changes Hypnosis, the weight just melted off. My doctor asked me how I lost it. She is now recommending Positive Changes Hypnosis to her patients.

I get compliments galore. I'm wearing a lot of my daughter's clothes. She's 15 years old.

Overweight hurts. I know. I was there. Don't be left to wonder what might have been....Pick up the phone and call now!"

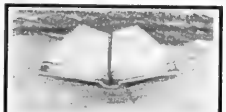
The peril of lashon hara in a wired world

It is hard to keep the mitzvah of "don't be a tale bearer" in our age of communications. These days, we have a lot more tools at our disposal to get ourselves into trouble – phones, e-mail, cellphones, instant messaging, ICQ, text messaging – than we used to. In our modern world, we have a lot of easy opportunities to speak, or message, in hurtful and negative ways.



Rabbinic Reflections

In fact, among the many and varied mitzvot of the Torah, it could be that our modern era has trampled on this mitzvah more than on most others.

The Torah instructs us on the proper use of speech. We must tell the truth. We must not hurt another person with words. We must not say bad things about someone else. And, as we learn in our parshah, we must not tell stories.

There are actually two separate mitzvot. The first and maybe more famous is "lashon hara." I cannot tell you about how rotten Chaim is. I cannot say to you "Chaim is a nice guy at home, but in business, a bigger thief you'll never find."

The second mitzvah is called "rachilut" – tale bearing. I cannot tell you what Chaim said about you. I cannot say to you "Chaim said you are a nice person, but in business you are a complete fool."

To put it simply, I cannot say bad things about Chaim to you, nor bad things Chaim said about you to you.

Our Torah ethics extends this even further, into the area of innuendo, into the area of "don't get me started on Chaim," or "Chaim is such a nice person," since this will lead to negative talk.

Back to our modern era. Different times in history present different challenges when it comes to mitzvot. Today, idol worship is not a big challenge. One hundred and 50 years ago, communication was very limited. Of course, speaking directly, in person, always presents good opportunities to speak about other people and can degenerate into negative speech. But besides direct speech, a century-and-a-half ago, one could only communicate with others through letters, or maybe via telegram.

When we write a letter, we think about each word, so maybe that time delay from mind to pen is enough to reflect on whether we should say something bad or not. Certainly, in a telegram – as the Chafetz Chaim says – every word costs, so we are careful about what we say.

Today, words literally fly through the air with the greatest of ease. E-mails, cellphones, text messaging, instant messaging with eight people at once – wow, that gives us a lot of opportunities to say a lot of lashon hara, a lot of rotten things.

The mitzvah also includes not accepting the negative things. We can't hide behind the fact we aren't saying all those negative things we read in newspapers, hear on talk radio, or see on TV, because hearing them is also forbidden.

The blessing of the age of communication presents us with far too many opportunities to trample on the Torah's high standard of speech. We must be more diligent, more than in any other era in human history, to make sure that we don't hear or say negative things about others.

Yet another mixed blessing of the march of progress.

Anti-Semitism in Canada: Why now?

Across the country, the firebombing of a Jewish day school in Montreal appalled Canadians. Why did it happen? Why now?

I see four root causes.

First, the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11 radicalized anti-American and anti-Jewish sentiment in Canada and around the world. Much of the far left has always considered America and Israel as a single enemy and the primary source of evil in world affairs. While Sept. 11 demonstrated to most people that there are much nastier people around, the far left wasn't prepared to give up its vision of America the evil.

Guest Voice

For example, in his essay "The War in Afghanistan," U.S. political commentator Noam Chomsky argues that America's actions in that country were a far greater moral wrong than the terrorist attacks themselves. Much of the left followed Chomsky's lead. But some people, many Canadians among them, defended their vision of American evil by adopting the notion that the United States and/or Israel (or simply "the Jews") were responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks.

Such conspiratorial thinking, which in Canada used to belong exclusively to neo-Nazi propagandists such as Ernst Zundel, suddenly became mainstream. Three Toronto Star columnists have promoted the notion of Sept. 11 as an American plot – Michelle Landsberg, Thomas Walkom and Antonia Zerbisias. Zerbisias went so far as to recommend an anti-Semitic web site to her readers (a recommendation that she only partially disowned after B'nai Brith called her on it.)

Second, opposition to the American-led war against Saddam Hussein popularized anti-Americanism throughout Canada and licensed its expression. When Liberal MP Carolyn Parrish said, "Damn American, I hate those bastards," she likely generated more support for her party, not less. And when Canadians opened the door to anti-Americanism, its anti-Jewish twin also snuck in.

Why did America invade Iraq? The answer, according to some conspiracy-minded Canadians, is that America is controlled by Jewish neo-Conservatives, a cabal that puts Israel's interests ahead of America's and, more generally, plots for America to conquer the world.

For example, in his recent article titled "Why Won't Anyone Say They're Jewish?" Kalle Lasn, editor of the Canadian magazine Adbusters, produces a list of American neo-conservatives with a dot (or perhaps it's a little yellow star) beside each Jew. "Half of them are Jewish," he writes, in case his readers can't count. And, he says, they control "Rumsfeld's Defence Department."

Lasn adds, rather darkly, "One wonders what Israeli-American relations, and indeed what American relations with the rest of the world would look like if [they]… were also in charge at [the U.S.] State [Department]."

This idea of Jewish puppet masters is simply a rehash of the century-old myth of the Elders of Zion, which was so fervently embraced by Adolf Hitler.

Third, the train bombings in Madrid showed that terrorism works. The bombers of the Montreal day school simply followed the Madrid example, but, fortunately, they burned only books, not people. Next time, according to a note left by the firebombers, they might do worse.

Fourth, and most importantly, anti-Semitism in Canada has been activated by the continual portrayal of Israel as murderous and monstrous, not just by the far left, but in mainstream media and by mainstream politicians.

To give just one example, CBC Radio's Mary Lou Finlay opened a recent interview with a representative of the Palestinian Authority by asking him for his reaction to the Israeli "murder" of Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin. I assumed she'd made an embarrassing slip, until Russ Germain introduced a later segment of the program with a scripted line about the world crying "bloody murder."

Have you ever heard anyone on the CBC refer to any of Hamas' deliberate killings of Israeli civilians – men, women or children – as "murder"?

The CBC's condemnation of Israel's "murder" of Yassin and Canada's foreign minister's condemnation of the assassination were mere peeps in the worldwide outcry against Israel. That outcry that was louder, more widespread and vastly more heated than have been any objections to the hundreds of killings and thousands of injuries Yassin's terrorist organization has inflicted on ordinary people going about their daily lives.

That outcry was surely heard by the people who firebombed the Montreal Jewish day school. When they wrote that their attack was retribution for the killing of Yassin, I imagine they expected scattered applause for their actions. Surely, they were surprised that Canadians unanimously denounced their attack, with the Toronto Star and the CBC as appalled as everyone else. Then again, perhaps the bombers are familiar with hypocrisy.

Jewish entrepreneurs

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

If you're a Jewish entrepreneur and want to make contact with other businesspeople, look for advice for your venture or seek funding for your startup, Jewish organizations on the World Wide Web can help. Today, we'll tour some of the most interesting ones. Remember, though, that you can't always tell an organization by its website so always check out any group before joining – especially if it charges a membership fee.

The goal of the "Tribe of Angels Jewish Business Network" is to connect Jewish investors, Jewish startups and Jewish talent. According to its site, "Tribe of Angels is the Jewish community's oldest and largest business network. We bring together Jewish industry leaders to develop business, identify new ventures, develop partnerships, and source talent." Check out some TOA members at the site's online resource guide. [www.tribeofangels.com/]

Networking, of course, means extending your scope beyond your city and province. If you are trying to find a contact in another city, its local Jewish business group is a great place to start. The Jewish Center for Business Development has been operating in Baltimore since 1992. [www.jcbd.org/] Looking for a contact in New Jersey? Try the Cherry Hill Jewish Business Network. [www.chjbiznet.com] There is also Detroit's Jewish Entrepreneurs Network [www.thisisfederation.org/JEN/], the Jewish Business Association of Colorado [http://tinyurl.com/39xsh], the Jewish Business Community Networking of Seattle [http://tinyurl.com/3bp4e] and Austin's Jewish Business Network. [www.austinjbn.org/]

On this side of the border, the ProMontreal Entrepreneurs program helps with advice about business creation and access to a fund that provides capital for young entrepreneurs. A powerful memoir of struggling with faith

The Spiral Staircase* by Karen Armstrong, Random House, $35.95.

As a young woman growing up in England, Karen Armstrong had such a strong religious faith that she joined a convent in 1962, when she was only 17. She stayed there for seven years until doubts about her own worthiness and a harsh regimen forced her to leave.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The author recounted these bittersweet experiences in an earlier book, Through the Narrow Gate. Despite her best efforts, she failed dismally in her youthful strivings to find God.

In an unfamiliar and often hostile world, her unremitting struggles to achieve emotional stability and find spiritual meaning were unsuccessful. At Oxford University, her doctoral thesis was rejected. The head mistress of a private girls' school in London found her teaching inadequate and her personality unappealing.

Crestfallen, dejected and physically ill, Armstrong came close to an emotional breakdown. Ultimately, she found her calling as a scholar dealing with comparative religion and the sacred texts of Christianity, Judaism and Islam. Success came with her book The History of God, which was translated into 40 languages. She became an international celebrity and popular media personality.

Today, Armstrong is a part-time professor to rabbinical students at London's Leo Baeck Seminary. What is noteworthy and surprising about The Spiral Staircase is how she discovered ideas about Judaism that transformed her religious thinking.

A visit to the Western Wall in Jerusalem, for example, was a kind of revelation.

"There were black-caftaned Orthodox, with their ear locks and huge fur hats, as well as men and women dressed in ordinary clothes," Armstrong writes. "I watched a young Israeli soldier bind his tfillin to his arms with a thick strap as he bowed and prayed before the wall. Judaism was not the superseded faith of my blinkered mediations. It had a life and dynamism of its own, and was as multifarious as Christianity. It had continued to grow and develop."

Armstrong was also intrigued by the role of study in Jewish religious life.

"Certainly, the rabbis who compiled the Talmud insisted over and over again that 'when two or three study the Torah together, the Divine Presence is in their midst.'"

She learned that in Judaism, the study of Torah and Talmud had never been as goal-directed as some modern scholarship. Indeed, the process of study itself was as important as the content.

Armstrong took to heart the golden rule of Hillel (70 BCE–10 CE), who taught that you must first discover what distresses you and then refrain from inflicting similar pain on other people. She writes that this is the essence of religious life.

In time, Armstrong came to admire all western religions and could not regard any one of them as superior to any of the others.

"None of them had a monopoly of truth. Working in isolation from one another, and often in a state of deadly hostility, they had come up with remarkably similar conclusions. This unanimity seemed to suggest that they were onto something real about the human condition."

Powerfully engaging, candid and adventurous, The Spiral Staircase is a description of a many-sided spiritual journey that offers challenging and refreshing approaches to formal religion and ecumenical awareness. I highly recommend it.

Jenin 'massacre' film a compelling documentary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jonathan Van Caspel

Two years ago, the British and European press almost single-handedly created the enduring myth that the Israeli army perpetrated crimes against humanity in a Palestinian refugee camp in the West Bank town of Jenin.

In a typically hysterical banner headline, the Independent, an otherwise respected London daily, blared,"A monstrous war crime."

Adopting a similar line, The Guardian – a daily that supported the 1917 Balfour Declaration – compared Israel's offensive in Jenin to Sept. 11.

So much for objectivity.

These events are the subject of Jenin: Massacring Truth, a compelling Global TV documentary aired on April 28.

Written and directed by seasoned Canadian correspondent Martin Himel, the film, which features vivid battle footage from both sides, skilfully disposes of the blatant lie that Israel stands guilty of committing war crimes in Jenin.

Filmed in Israel, the West Bank, Europe and other locales, Jenin places the controversy in its proper context.

Palestinian attackers had been wreaking havoc on Israel since the outbreak of the intifadah. In March 2002, they went too far, killing some 130 Israelis. For Israel, the final straw was the Park Hotel Passover suicide bombing, which killed 29 Israelis.

In response, the Israeli army launched Operation Defensive Shield, designed to destroy the terrorist infrastructure in the West Bank.

Among the targets was the Jenin refugee camp, where 25 per cent of the attacks had originated. Janine DiGiovani, a correspondent on the staff of The Times of London, notes that Palestinian fighters deliberately lured the Israeli army into the refugee camp.

Israel could have bombed the camp from the air, but instead sent in the infantry. In fierce battles, 13 Israeli soldiers fell, a loss of life Israel could have largely avoided had it deployed its air force.

The Palestinian Authority, which had done virtually nothing to curtail the bombers of Hamas and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, spread the falsehood that hundreds of Palestinian civilians had deliberately been killed by Israel. Saeb Erekat, a leading PA official, cited a figure of 500.

Reporters, some gullible, some malicious, bought the story, hook, line and sinker. Against all journalistic conventions, they failed to check the facts.

If they had bothered to do so, they would have learned that the Palestinian death toll was much lower: 26 civilians and 23 fighters. (By contrast, when NATO aircraft bombed Serbian positions in Kosovo in 1999, hundreds of civilians were killed.)

Israel protested, but was demonized as an outlaw state. Only later did the world learn that there had been no massacre. In separate reports, the United Nations and the watchdog group Human Rights Watch absolved Israel of the alleged crime.

In Jenin, Himel – a dogged reporter who has worked in Israel for many years – examines the events under review with a dispassionate eye.

He interviews Jonathan Van Caspel, an Israeli paratrooper who fought in Jenin and deeply resents the accusation that he is a war criminal.

He also talks to reporters who covered the fighting, some of whom seem contrite about having played fast and loose with the truth.

And he speaks to an Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade commander who battled the Israelis in Jenin. His comments are of little interest beyond his observation that the Palestinians were ultimately routed by giant Israeli bulldozers.

Far more interesting are the observations of journalists who have no personal axes to grind or political agendas to pursue.

Olivia Ward, a Toronto Star correspondent who reported from Jenin, disputes an outlandish claim by DiGiovani that the destruction in Jenin was worse than in Grozny, the capital of Chechnya.

DiGiovani is no impartial observer. She claims that a "strong Zionist lobby" in the United States influences American media coverage of the Middle East. For good measure, she asks Himel whether he is an Israeli or Jewish.

British reporters such as DiGiovani left the impression that the camp had been "pulverized" by Israel. But in actual fact, only a relatively small area – some 400 square metres – was destroyed. Everything else in Jenin was left standing, but no one seemed to care.

Israel, unjustifiably, was branded as a heartless aggressor.

In an excellent observation, James Reynolds, a BBC correspondent based in Jerusalem, points out that first impressions stick.

Once the news got out that Israel had supposedly committed war crimes in Jenin, much of the world believed the calumny. To its credit, the American media was skeptical.

Unfortunately, Himel leaves the Canadian press out of the discussion, his interview with Ward notwithstanding.

As he conclusively proves, Israel cleared the Jenin camp of terrorists without breaching the rules of war. Yet, these calumnies were recycled by Mohammed Bakri in his film Jenin, Jenin and are alive and well on the Internet.

"Unbelievable," fumes Van Caspel.

But that's the gospel truth.

Church member drums up support for Montreal day school

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

After spending 18 years as an elementary school teacher and another 17 as a principal, Patricia Carson knows the important role books play in the lives of young students. It's that love of books that prompted the Toronto resident to personally donate around 100 of her own books to Montreal's United Talmud Torah Day School, the victim of a recent firebombing.

"I had this whole case full of children's books and I figured that the poor kids at the Montreal school could really use them. It was the perfect place to send them. Those children need books as soon as possible."

Carson's reaction to hearing the news about the firebombing was one of disbelief and outrage.

"I found out about it the next day in the newspaper," says Carson. "When I read that they had only managed to salvage 25 books from that library, I literally cried. I know just how much books and libraries are used by students. In fact, most of the curriculums are built around the library as they try to instill the kids with a love of books. I was appalled. I couldn't believe that somebody could do something so horrible."

Not satisfied with just her own donation, Carson – a member of Toronto's St. Matthews Anglican Church - put a notice in her church bulletin and set up a collection bin inside the church prior to a recent Sunday service, asking for book donations.

"We're asking our members for money and books – preferably new books – to go to Montreal," says Carson. "Also, I'm the chair of a local political action group of retired teachers and I told them 'we have to do something about this.' The guys agreed and a couple of them brought books to UJA that made their way to Montreal last week. We'll also be asking for donations at our annual meeting in May."

UJA Federation's UTT Library Fund has already raised $40,000. To contribute to the fund call the UJA Hotline at 416.631.5705.

Torontonians open their homes and hearts for Pesach

For several Toronto families, this year's Passover celebration took on even greater significance as they opened their homes - and their seders - to new immigrant families.

Through a project created by JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto – recent immigrants are matched with Toronto families looking to perform a mitzvah by inviting them to their seders.

"This year's seder was very touching," says Laura Orzy, who, along with husband Rick, and her three children, invited a family from the former Soviet Union to enjoy the Pesach festivities.

"We've been doing this for about 10 or 11 years now," says Laura. "We want to teach our children that it is very important to invite strangers to your seder, to open your home to people who don't have anywhere to go, to make them feel welcome in their new home."

"Not only are the host families performing a mitzvah, but their generosity reflects the face of Toronto's Jewish community, which is what we want newcomers to see," says Suzanne Solnik of JIAS. "This type of program is also another opportunity for recent immigrants to make connections, network, and integrate comfortably into their new community."

For Gennady Liokumovich, a native of Kazakhstan, who came to Toronto with his wife and two children in January, the invitation to a Toronto seder was an incredible gesture of kindness.

"They didn't know us, but this very lovely family invited us into their home for Pesach," says the 48-year-old. "We were so happy to celebrate this holiday in our new country with our new friends. As the seder went on, they took the time to explain to us what was going on and what everything meant. They still call us to see how we're doing and to see if they can help us in any way. We are starting to build a real relationship with them."

Penny Fine, along with husband Hugh and their two daughters invited Irit Kalkan and her son Vadim – recent immigrants from the FSU - to this year's seder, and according to Penny, her own family got as much out of the experience as the guests.

"Meeting these people and having them in your home really tends to broaden your understanding of what the holiday of Passover truly means," she says. "To talk with others from different places, who have had such varied life experiences, gives you a true feeling of connection to the worldwide Jewish community. So many of these people have suffered such hardships, it also reminds you that we, as Jews, fortunate enough to live in Toronto, should not take things for granted."

Hoops at Hillel a life lesson

It's often been said that sports and politics don't mix, but an ambitious student at Hillel of Greater Toronto at the University of Toronto, may have proved that the opposite is true.

Doron Berger, 23, a fourth-year student studying economics and political science decided that an international basketball tournament featuring teams representing the diverse cultures on campus would be good for morale.

"We held a Canada versus Israel basketball game a while ago, so I thought that we should try it on a larger scale, an international scale, by extending it to the entire campus community," says Berger, a native of Ashdod, Israel, who came to Toronto in 1989.

Berger then began soliciting teams from each of the U of T's cultural communities and quickly there were eight teams involved, including Canada, China, Croatia, Israel, Italy, South Korea, Russia and Turkey.

The tournament ended with an exciting final game between Team Israel and Team Croatia that the Croatians won. Despite the loss, Israel's Roman Brailovski was voted as the tournament's most valuable player, at an awards ceremony at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, to which all the student groups involved in the tournament were invited.

But for Israeli team captain Gregory Bloch, 23, a native of Rehovot, the tournament was clearly about more than just dribbling and shooting.

"It's about respect," says the fourth-year computer science and economics student at U of T. "This tournament allowed us all to come together – from a wide range of backgrounds – to enjoy each other's company and we treated one another with nothing but respect. Usually the various student bodies at U of T keep pretty much to themselves. This tourney showed what can be done by people of all backgrounds when there is respect and cooperation."

According to Moshik Galanty, Hillel's Israel arts & culture coordinator, the timing of the tournament couldn't have been better.

"To host such a wonderful, multicultural event, and just after the new Wolfond Centre opened at the U of T, is a double celebration," says Galanty. "To see so many young people come together, as friends, regardless of their differences is very inspiring."

"Normally these different cultural groups don't interact that much," says Lisa Isen Baumal, director, Wolfond Centre. "This event gave each group its own sense of pride and helped them build bridges with one another in a non-threatening atmosphere of sportsmanship. It was a very 'feel-good' thing to be part of, and our hope is that we'll do this again next year."

Hillel of Greater Toronto, supported by UJA Federation, is the voice of Jewish students on campus.

Team Israel finished as runner-up to Team Croatia at the recent Hillel International Basketball Tournament at the Wolfond Centre.

New task force created on community security

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

UJA Federation has announced the formation of the Jewish community's first Task Force on Community Security, in the wake of recent antisemitic attacks.

Through the task force – chaired by Warren Kimel - security evaluations will be performed at Jewish schools, community centres and other Jewish institutions throughout the GTA on an ongoing basis, and any necessary changes or improvements will be made. These assessments will be made in conjunction with police authorities.

Following the announcement of the task force, Leslie Gales, chair of the UJA Federation Board, and Ed Morgan, incoming national chair, Canadian Jewish Congress, met with provincial Attorney General Michael Bryant and Monte Kwinter, Minster of Safety and Correctional Services, to discuss security for Toronto's Jewish community.

"The meeting was very positive," says Gales. "We talked about our community and what it has been doing to ensure the safety of our community and especially our young students. We made it clear that although we are doing plenty, we still need the government's support because when it comes to hate and hate-crimes, it's not only a 'Jewish' problem, but also an issue that affects the entire city. Mr. Bryant and Mr. Kwinter both responded with understanding and support."

"It was very encouraging because both the ministers were fully supportive of our Jewish community and condemned hate crimes in the strongest possible terms," adds Morgan. "We did impress on them that while our community is committing resources to the security of our schools and community centres, the issue of safety must be a public responsibility first and foremost."

Dr. Seymour Epstein, executive director of UJA's Board of Jewish Education recently held a meeting with administrators of BJE affiliated schools and representatives of community centres to discuss security measures.

"We reviewed the current security arrangements of our Jewish schools and institutions, and discussed ways to improve the situation," says Paul Shaviv, director of education, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). "We want our community to understand that the safety and security of our kids is the first priority for all of us. It was stressed that every school must have systems in place to deal with any possible emergency. Still, the general consensus was that the eyes and ears of parents, students, and staff are the best security devices of all."

Armand LeBarge, Chief of Police, York Region responds to several recent antisemitic incidents in Thornhill.

Twenty-seven headstones in Toronto's Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park Cemetery were overturned in March.

In Memoriam

Benjamin Schneider
1912 – 2004

UJA Federation mourns the loss of Benjamin Schneider, executive vice president of the United Jewish Welfare Fund (the predecessor of UJA Federation) from 1962 – 1975. Schneider went on to become the founding executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park (Pardes Shalom Cemetery) from 1975 until his retirement in June 1999, at which point he was made an honourary director.

"I refer to Ben as the wise counsel to prominent Jewish leaders throughout our community," says William C. Dratman, President of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park. "He was a loyal gentleman who was confident in his opinions and at the same time valued and maintained confidences."

Rolling up her sleeves for Israel

A Yom Ha'atzmaut perspective

By DEBORAH MILLER,
Project OTZMA participant

Having recently celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut, I think back to many of the wonderful community celebrations that I have attended in Toronto. The fact that I am now living, learning and working in Israel helped make this years celebration very special and even more meaningful. For me, L'shana Haba'a B'Yerushalayim has moved from a dream to a reality and I am so proud to be here celebrating with Israel in Israel. Am Yisrael Chai!!

It all started on August 17, 2003 when I stepped off an El Al plane at Ben Gurion Airport and arrived in Israel as a Project OTZMA participant. Now celebrating its 18th year, Project OTZMA is a volunteer and educational program sponsored by UJA Federation. It is dedicated to bridging the gap between young diaspora Jews and Israel, with the goal of creating the next generation of Jewish leaders. Project OTZMA participants ("OTZMAnikim") spend 10 months volunteering in communities throughout Israel, learning Hebrew and improving their knowledge of Jewish and Israeli history, traditions, and texts.

OTZMAnikim share the experience of learning Hebrew with new immigrants (olim) at Ulpan Kalanit in Ashkelon. One of the most moving experiences I have had while in Israel took place when all the students at the Ulpan came together for a Shira B'Tsibur, a community sing-a-long of sorts. Together with the new olim, OTZMAnikim sang Israeli songs in Hebrew, expressing our shared love of Israel and our solidarity as one community of Jews.

Of the many songs we sang, one song in particular, Od Lo Ahavti Dai ("I have not yet loved enough"), was particularly powerful. The song describes several different ways in which Jews work to build Israel and a community – planting trees, working on irrigation, building houses, etc., with the singers lamenting how they haven't yet had their chance to contribute. They end by asking themselves, 'if not now, when?' Singing these words surrounded by young olim who had chosen to make Israel their home and my fellow OTZMAnikim, who chose to spend the year volunteering to contribute to and strengthen the State of Israel, filled me with an enormous sense of happiness, peacefulness, and pride.

These feelings became even stronger when I continued my day helping to clear the site of ancient ruins at the Ashkelon National Park. Almost oblivious to the sun and heat, I hacked down weeds taller than I am with a renewed sense of purpose. I, too, had come to Israel to contribute to and help build the land, and I knew that I was not waiting for an unspecified future date to begin my work. Before coming on OTZMA, many people asked me why I would choose to stay in Israel at such an uncertain time. What I felt to be true then has become even clearer for me now. I had not yet completely committed myself to supporting Israel and I could no longer wait indefinitely to begin.

"And we wondered whether it was a racist person who didn't like Jews [who did this] or a teenager who wanted to commit vandalism," Sarah says.

Whatever the cause, the public school students decided they had to take action and began a campaign to raise money for books.

"Every single class in the school donated something," says Anne Potocnik, a Grade 8 teacher affectionately called Mrs. P. by her students.

Some kids only had pennies or nickels to contribute, but in four days they managed to collect enough to make a sizeable shipment to UTT and a meaningful statement against intolerance.

The ARC has initiated several other programs, including informal educational activities that discourage racism.

"We take apples into kindergarten classrooms and show that while the fruit may all have different colours on the outside, they're the same on the inside when you take off their skin," Josh explains.

The group also discusses Herb Carnegie's philosophy of "Future Aces." As a black man growing up in Toronto in the 1940s, Carnegie was denied a career in the National Hockey League because of his race. He went on to a successful career in business.

His Aces philosophy attempts to pull together positive and attainable goals that help guide students toward achieving the best in themselves.

The kids really have to think about the issues, Potocnik says. For example, ARC used to be called the Anti-Racism Group, but its name was changed this year by Sarah, who is from India, because it was felt that the original name was too limiting.

The group was renamed so that discrimination based on gender, body size or religion would be included, explains Potocnik, who guides the ARC. She handpicks the kids according to their leadership skills. They also have to show interest in other people.

The teacher says the students almost never talk about troubles they may have experienced in their birth countries. Instead, they love to talk about religion and the connections they see between their backgrounds.

"They are truly astounded when they realize that Abraham plays a role in Judaism and Islam and that Jesus appears in Islam and Christianity," Potocnik says.

She has learned to tread lightly when it comes to current conflicts, yet controversy does arise. Once when she mentioned Israel in the classroom, a student said to her "Israel doesn't exist" and he brought in a map the next day to prove it.

Instead of politics, the students at Islington focus on children around the world who need help. They adopted a foster child in Haiti, who was lost in the recent violence and no one seems quite sure if he is even still alive. Unfortunately, these are situations the students are familiar with.

Despite the fact some students who have been through Potocnik's classroom have seen their parents killed or have been forced to steal from Red Cross camps in order to stay alive, they usually don't want to bring their past with them into the school.

"We learn about their backgrounds in their writings or in the Remembrance Day assemblies. And that's when I realize that these kids actually have a lot to tell," she says.

School funding petition

McGuinty and the government by signing the online petition at http://www.petitiononline.com/EqualOnt/petition.html. It can also be accessed through www.equalfunding.org, which gives a brief history of the issue.

Aryeh Snitman

The petition has already been signed by Jewish, Muslim and Christian parents of children in faith-based schools, as well as by parents who signed as Catholics "disgusted" by the current inequity in funding.

The Liberals retroactive cancellation of the previous government's Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC) last December was especially difficult for many parents, Snitman said.

It may have been controversial, but the EETC was the beginning of a solution to the religious inequity built into Ontario's education system because it allowed parents to benefit from a significant financial tax credit, he said.

However, Snitman, who is a tax lawyer for the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, acknowledged that the EETC was left vulnerable to attack because it was extended to "elite" private schools as well as faith-based schools.

"Funding these sorts of initiatives through the tax system is not necessarily the most efficient way of dealing with this problem," because the credits are often viewed as tax giveaways, Snitman said, adding that direct funding to schools is probably the more efficient way to deal with the problem.

But he said the issue has become especially heated because parents began to rely on the tax credit. The frustration felt by affected parents was compounded because "a feasible solution to their problem was given to them and then taken away."

Once 10,000 signatures have been collected, Snitman plans to present the petition to McGuinty.

Israel's imminent withdrawal from the Gaza Strip was roundly denounced by three Israeli opponents of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's unilateral disengagement plan in passionate speeches at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue last week.

They expressed anger, amazement and disappointment that Sharon, long regarded as the father of the settlement movement in the territories, would abandon Gaza as well as four settlements in the West Bank.

"No one really imagined that Sharon would think of giving away the Land of Israel and uprooting settlements," declared Arieh Eldad, a member of the far-right National Union party in the Knesset.

In a further condemnation of Sharon, Eldad said, " He's giving up and falling apart, and he might take the whole nation with him."

Sharon 'is giving up and falling apart'

Yossi Ben-Aharon, a former senior official in Israel's ministry of foreign affairs, was equally critical.

"It's painful to tell people there is something wrong with the way Sharon has been conducting himself on this issue."

Moshe Saperstein, a resident of Neve Dekalim, one of the 21 Gush Katif settlements to be relinquished under the government's plan, also blasted Sharon.

"He believes we're frail and can't go on."

The trio arrived in Toronto after several of their putative allies, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Education Minister Limor Livnat and Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, reluctantly decided to back Sharon's initiative. Coincidentally, they were here on the 61st anniversary of the Warsaw ghetto uprising,

Eldad, whose party is in Sharon's coalition government, called Israel's planned pullout a capitulation to terrorism, for which Israel will pay a heavy price.

Describing Sharon's plan as suicidal, Eldad – a member of the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee – said it is "unthinkable" that Gaza and parts of the West Bank will be rendered "Judenrein."

He said that Hamas flags will fly over synagogues in Gaza once the plan has been implemented.

Warning that Gaza will become a terrorist base after Israel's withdrawal, and comparing Sharon's plan to the now-defunct Olso peace process, Eldad predicted that Israel will come under increasing pressure to give up still more settlements in the West Bank.

And in a final dig at Sharon, Eldad asserted, "The nation of Israel is stronger than their leaders. We have a right to live anywhere in Israel."

Ben-Aharon, Israel's chief negotiator with Syria in 1991 and 1992, voiced exasperation with Sharon.

"I just can't fathom the makings of this mind that has produced this plan. I can't see how it will enhance Israel's security," said Ben-Aharon, who called the pre-1967 armistice border "Auschwitz lines."

Claiming the withdrawal will be interpreted in the Arab world as a victory, Ben-Aharon said, "It will heighten their perception that Israel is a passing phenomenon and will disappear, like the Crusader state."

Although he said he doesn't "know how this story will end," Ben-Aharon also voiced confidence. "I have no doubt we will overcome this, as we have overcome previous challenges."

And in a parting shot, he said that Israel's withdrawal from Gaza may even "impinge" negatively on current U.S. efforts to pacify Iraq.

Saperstein, who lost an arm in the 1973 Yom Kippur War, acknowledged that the 7,500 settlers in Gaza face expulsion. "It's very, very bad for us."

But he said he was sure "the Almighty" will intervene and stop what now seems like an inevitable withdrawal.

Saperstein drew attention to the fact that not a single settler has been killed by the 4,000 Palestinian mortars, shells and rockets that have fallen in Gush Katif since the outbreak of the second intifadah 3½ years ago.

"It's not luck," he mused, "but divine protection."

Rabbi Moshe Stern, Shaarei Tefillah's spiritual leader, likened Gaza's settlers to Zionist pioneers who persevered despite ridicule from the Jewish world.

"If we're not entitled to [Gaza], are we entitled to Tel Aviv or Netanya?"

Rabbi Stern added that Gaza and the West Bank constitute Israel's front lines and are its future.

Before the meeting got under way, a brief, upbeat film produced by the Gaza Coastal Regional Council was screened.

"Gaza, like all of the Land of Israel, belongs to us," a voice intoned."We must stand firm and prevent them from carrying out their insidious plans," another voice said.

The sparsely attended meeting was sponsored by the Toronto Zionist Council. Izzy Kaplan, the owner of Israel's Judaica and one of the event's organizers, urged people to contribute funds to a campaign to halt "Sharon's transfer plan."

Shoah survivor helps promote Canadian values

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Former citizenship judge Sigmund Reiser used to make a point of telling new Canadians about the importance of accepting Canadian values such as equality and living together in harmony.

Proceeds from a gala dinner in his honour, to be held May 12 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, will fund programming to combat bigotry and anti-Semitism, through the Sigmund Reiser Fund for Truth and Justice in Race Relations. Irwin Cotler, Canada's minister of justice, will deliver the keynote address.

Recently, Reiser crossed paths with Cotler in Ottawa, when the justice minister spoke at the first annual Canada Holocaust Memorial Day. Reiser, who lost 21 close relatives in the Holocaust and was the sole survivor of his immediate family, laid a wreath on Parliament Hill in his capacity as a Yad Vashem board member.

He attributes his long-term communal service – evidenced by many framed certificates and medals, including an Order of Canada, displayed in his dining room – to an incident at the Montreal train station in 1949, just after his arrival in Canada with his wife Carole and their young son.

Sigmund Reiser

Two women representing a volunteer organization approached the small family, en route to Winnipeg to join Carole's mother, and asked whether they had money to buy food. The women, seeing that the Reisers lacked money and spoke only minimal English, not only offered them $10, but bought food for them and gave them the change.

"Right there and then, I decided I would become a volunteer," said Reiser, 80, in an interview in his comfortable apartment.

He began his working life in Canada in a factory, putting in 12-hour days then heading to night school for English classes.

"I imagine it's not easy for newcomers today either," he said. "But opportunities are here because we have such a wonderful, peaceful country, and we have to keep the country like that."

After a few years, Reiser began selling insurance for London Life. He became the company's leading Canadian sales agent and later a regional manager in Toronto and Montreal, where he became involved with B'nai Brith Canada's Snowdon Lodge.

In 1968, the Reisers – today the grandparents of eight and great-grandparents of three – settled in Toronto. Their son, Benjamin is a professor at Haifa University; daughter Felice Guberman is a Toronto lawyer.

Since his retirement in 1988, Reiser's community service work has included high-level involvement with his synagogue and organizations including State of Israel Bonds, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Jewish National Fund and B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights cabinet; and membership on the discipline committee of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario and the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC). He has been active in the Liberal party, serving as campaign manager for two members of Parliament, Robert Kaplan in 1988 and Art Eggleton in 1993 and 1998.

He also served twice as an international election observer-monitor in Bosnia and represented the CHRC at a 1998 seminar in Warsaw about the evolution of human rights and democracy in the former Soviet Union.

"I never thought I would go back to Poland," he said. While there, he visited his hometown, Przemysl; the nearby mass grave where his father, a wheat merchant, and the rest of his family is likely buried; and several concentration camps, which he saw for the first time, having been in Russia during the war.

On the plane home, he felt "free again," he wrote in an article. "I have never analyzed this, but I realize now why I am so passionately in love with Canada…"

As a citizenship judge, he tried to instil Canadian values not only in new citizens but in young students when he presided over citizenship courts in their schools, and afterwards when he stayed there – his idea – for a question-and-answer session.

Today, he said, "we have to try to create dialogues with other groups and build bridges to other ethnic communities… We have to build understanding, tolerance and inclusiveness."

He would like to see classes about Canadian values given to newcomers and to children in their formative years.

For older students, Reiser said, university campuses "have to be for studying, not for political infighting," referring to recent tensions related to the situation in the Middle East. "We have to train speakers who can go to the universities and speak on campus about [Canadian] values."

The money from the Reiser fund will be used to achieve such ends, he said.

"I believe basically people are good by nature," he said, "but the veneer of civilization is very thin, and we have to work to make it thicker. That can only be done by building on human rights."

Schneider served as leading Jewish professional

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Benjamin Schneider, former executive director of the United Jewish Welfare Fund (now UJA Federation of Greater Toronto), creator of its endowment fund and founding executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park, Pardes Shalom, died recently of a heart attack. He was 92.

Obituary

Schneider was born in New York, and grew up in the Lower East Side. He studied at Fordham and Columbia universities, and earned his master of social work.

One of his crowning accomplishments, his son Kal said, was his work with the United Service for New Americans just after World War II, facilitating the entry of immigrants and refugees into the United States.

He also held positions with the Jewish communities of Miami, Cleveland and Boston.

In 1959, he came to Toronto as director of social planning for the United Jewish Welfare Fund. He also held positions with the United Jewish Appeal, including that of director. When longtime welfare fund director Faigie Hutner retired, Schneider assumed that position.

Sam Sable, who was president of the Welfare Fund when Schneider was hired in 1959, called Schneider "one of the finest professionals I had the pleasure of working with."

Schneider was "a good person," Sable said. "I never heard him insult anyone. He always did his homework and was prepared for anything. If there were objections to something he did, he would explain clearly, and without getting angry."

Sable said he was impressed with the way Schneider dealt with staff, not as underlings but as equals.

Schneider's retirement from the welfare fund was a retirement in name only. Anxious to have a stable source of income for the community, he established the bequest and endowment fund, before such a thing became common, Kal said.

Later, he had the foresight, as Sable described it, to recognize the need for a community cemetery. Together with Sidney Freedman, he was responsible for founding Pardes Shalom and for persuading the welfare fund to join the enterprise and assume responsibility for it.

Freedman, who first came up with the idea of a community cemetery, called on Schneider when he realized that he needed someone to help who knew the community and how it worked.

Schneider was still at the welfare fund when he became executive director of the cemetery in 1970. He was passionate about it, Freedman said, and maintained his connection even after he retired in 1999.

"He never missed a meeting," Freedman said, "even if he had to come in a wheelchair." In fact, he attended a meeting of the board the week before he died, as well as telephoning and consulting about the expansion of Pardes Shalom.

Bill Draimin, president of Pardes Shalom, praised Schneider's "uncanny ability to plant seeds in your mind, and by the end of the discussion or project, with great humility, he allowed you to accept the fruit of his labour, as if the seeds had been yours."

Ben Schneider

Schneider was "confident in himself and his opinions, and at the same time, a man who valued and maintained confidences," Draimin said.

He used his "iron-clad memory," he added, to "render the advice necessary to maintain stability in the administrative structure of the Toronto Jewish community," as well as in Pardes Shalom.

Stephen Speisman, Schneider's successor as executive director of Pardes Shalom, first met Schneider when he became founding director of the Canadian Jewish Congress' Central Region Archives (now the Ontario Jewish Archives).

"I saw him as a mentor," Speisman said. "He saw me in this position before I did. He showed me the ropes and wrote out directions, not as if [his ideas] were cast in granite, but as ways I could best succeed."

Schneider had a great sensitivity to the Jewish community, Speisman said. But "he saw the community not just as a whole, but as a collection of individuals – and he valued those individuals."

Speisman said Schneider had the ability to elicit the best from people, not just in terms of money, but in effort as well.

Like Sable, Speisman saw Schneider as "the consummate Jewish professional." He "made things happen behind the scenes, and was willing to step back and let the lay people shine."

He was "generous with his wisdom," Speisman said. "He was not mean spirited. He wanted people to succeed."

Kal Schneider said his father was able to separate his family and personal life from his professional life.

"We were a very close family," he said, adding that Ben Schneider was "totally devoted to his wife and family."

He had a "unique relationship" with his wife Estelle, and was devoted to her throughout her long illness, Kal said.

He said his father played basketball, swam until he was well into his mid 80s and was an avid golfer.

Schneider was predeceased by his wife Estelle and brother Fred. He is survived by his son Kal, daughter Margaret, and grandsons David and Dan.

Two Neptune Drive to be renamed for president of Baycrest residence

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care's condominium building, known as Two Neptune Drive, will be renamed the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community, at a dedication ceremony for residents and their families on May 9.

Through a donation of $5 million to the Baycrest Centre Foundation, Reuben Cipin's daughter and son-in-law, Marla and Aubrey Dan, say they are expressing their love for her father and their gratitude to Baycrest for providing a facility that has brought renewed life and enjoyment to her father and his partner, Sharyn Gunter, and to all those who live in the 120-unit life-lease building.

Cipin says the gift will also be an early birthday present. He turns 76 on May 14.

Marla Dan says the moment she visited the sales centre for the Two Neptune Drive building and discovered the amenities the facility would provide, she and her siblings knew this was the best place for Gunter and Cipin.

"It has surpassed all our expectations," she says. "There is a vibrant and thriving group of people who are active and reach out to one another. They have become one large family."

Cipin is the president of the 11-member elected residents council at Two Neptune. Gunter is the co-chair of the program committee with vice-president Monty Mazin. This committee organizes onagei Shabbat, movie nights, speaker series and other programs. The social committee, chaired by Temi Rosenthal, helps organize all social functions, including the Cipin dedication.

Last year, the Dans were approached by the Baycrest Centre Foundation to make a donation to the 2003 Annual Campaign, which has a matching funds program. Aubrey Dan says that after taking a tour of Baycrest, "we were so impressed with the centre that we decided to substantially increase our support."

Part of their gift will help fund the gap between government funding and the cost of care at Baycrest and part will go to special projects of the Dans' choosing that will directly benefit seniors throughout the centre.

"A portion will be invested in an endowment fund that will provide social and wellness programming at the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community. These activities will be planned by the residents council," Marla Dan says.

"I was overwhelmed with great pride and deeply moved by the scope and purpose of the gift Aubrey and Marla made," Cipin says of the donation. "Not only does Baycrest Centre benefit financially, but the residents of this building will receive substantial funds enabling them to enhance the various programs which are involved in the building's healthy living concept the residents have created."

"We were both taught that the more you give, the more you get and tzedakah is a way of life in our household that is built into the human fabric of our souls," says Aubrey Dan. "This is our family motto that we live by and that we are teaching our children."

Born in Glace Bay, N.S., Cipin attended Acadia University at Wolfville, N.S., and graduated from Osgoode Hall Law School in 1956. He married Donna Cristall of Edmonton, Alta., and they spent their first year of marriage in Toronto, living on Neptune Drive.

Cipin then practised law in Edmonton, but left the firm in 1970, at the age of 42, after he had a heart attack. He worked for the Alberta Justice Department for 22 years. In Edmonton, he served as president of Beth Shalom Synagogue and was active with the Edmonton Talmud Torah.

His wife died in 1985 and in 1997, he moved to Toronto, following his five children, Jeff, Jacqui, Caralyn, Marla and Jennifer.

Marla Dan notes that when she moved to Toronto, she moved two doors away from the Dan family on Wychwood Avenue, and that's where the couple met.

"What a coincidence that my parents first lived on Neptune Drive after they were married and now, a half-century later, my father and Sharyn live on Neptune Drive. My father is there again to create a new definition of the golden years."

Marla Dan says all her father's children and grandchildren live in Toronto, "and we can now celebrate his life."

In a recent dvar Torah at the residence, Mazin, a former public relations specialist, said the donation made by the Dans will benefit those who live in the building.

"It is a wonderful, loving tribute to your dad and father-in-law, Reuben Cipin, and it has overwhelmed our entire Two Neptune mishpachah…

"It is young people like yourselves, sensitive to the needs of the community, caring, compassionate humanitarians, menschen, who are our hope for the future of Judaism."

"I think it is important to lead by example," Marla Dan says. "And to us, it is peace of mind to know that the residents can live in a community that is associated with Baycrest which provides a health and service network. People are coming back to life and the building is allowing them to grow old gracefully.

"We do not donate for personal recognition," she adds. "We just want to recognize Reuben and his contributions and achievements in his life. Why not enjoy that recognition when you're alive?"

Seen at a Two Neptune Drive residents council meeting to discuss the forthcoming dedication on May 9 are, from left, Monty Mazin, first vice-president; Aubrey Dan and Marla Dan, donors of a $5-million gift to Baycrest; Reuben Cipin, president and honoree; Temi Rosenthal, chair of the social committee; and Sharyn Gunter, co-chair of programs.

MONTREAL – Montreal Jews recently witnessed a historic, bittersweet moment with the dedication of a special Torah whose cover bears the gold thread-embroidered names of 1,000 victims of terror in Israel and the United States.

The Torah has travelled to several locations, including the Capitol building in Washington, D.C., on its way to its final destination, the Western Wall.

The siyum sefer Torah in Montreal on the eve of Yom Hashoah marked its only Canadian stop.

"I can tell you this has been an emotionally overwhelming experience," said Carolyn Roiter, a Brooklyn lawyer whose idea it was, along with Simon Jacobson of Crown Heights, to create a Torah in memory of terror victims, including those at the World Trade Center.

When Roiter and Jacobson began the project two years ago, less than halfway into the current intifadah, the death toll was about 400.

The number now inscribed, Roiter said during a recent luncheon and dedication at Chevra Kadisha B'nai Jacob Synagogue, is testament to the "lives not yet fulfilled and hopes and dreams shattered."

One of the names added to the scroll cover this year, she said, was former Torontonian Yechezkel Goldberg, who died in January after the suicide bombing of bus no. 19 in Jerusalem.

Another name is Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, who was kidnapped and executed two years ago by terrorists in Pakistan because he was Jewish.

Roiter said the Torah completion and dedication event had a special resonance in Canada because of recent anti-Semitic events and the firebombing of United Talmud Torahs (UTT) in St. Laurent.

In that context, Jews have to "reinforce their determination" to fight terror, she said.

In Montreal, young children from the synagogue's pre-K class walked down the main aisle as the Torah entered the sanctuary, and Crown Heights sofer Rabbi Moshe Klein, who's been travelling with the Torah from city to city, helped the project's donors inscribe final letters onto the scroll. Money for the project was raised through private donations.

Later, the Torah, bearing a gold crown and a breastplate in honour of the World Trade Center victims, was marched outside next to Clanranald Park.

Roiter said the scroll, whose cover is dedicated as a "tree of life" for the victims, is the "final culmination of my dream."

"When people see this cover, you really feel it in your heart," she said. "We did this because we would not allow their memories to be forgotten."

Time to give up fixation on Israel

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Globe and Mail columnist Jeffrey Simpson, writing about former U.S. counter-terrorism official Richard Clarke's book Against All Enemies ("We did exactly what Al Qaeda said we would do," April 14), focused on Clarke's argument that U.S. President George W. Bush was "fixated" on invading Iraq. Simpson wrote: "The original reasons for war – imminent danger to the United States, possession of weapons of mass destruction, links to terrorists – have long since been discredited."

Simpson quoted Clarke's argument that "important issues, like terrorism, like Iraq… needed analysis, and Bush and his inner circle had no real interest in complicated analyses; on the issues they cared about, they already knew the answers; it was received wisdom."

Simpson began his conclusion with this quote from Clarke: "Rather than seeking to work with the majority in the Islamic world to mould Muslim opinion against the radicals' values, we did exactly what Al Qaeda said we would do… We invaded and occupied an oil-rich Arab country that posed no threat to us, while paying scant time and attention to the Israeli-Palestinian problem."

By choosing that quote and placing it strategically at the end of his argument, Simpson would appear to share Clarke's assessment: Bush should have paid more attention to the "Israeli-Palestinian problem" instead of to Iraq. But what would that accomplish? Would the war on terrorism have been more effective? Would it have won over the hearts and minds of the "majority in the Islamic world"?

Instead of rejecting "received wisdom" in favour of "subtlety and nuance" and "complicated analyses" – which Simpson favours – this argument merely substitutes one of the most blatantly shallow bits of received wisdom around: that a resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the central requirement in the fight against Islamic extremism.

This argument is as baseless as it is widespread. As CBC-TV anchor Peter Mansbridge wrote in his e-mail commentary "Nightly Note" (April 14): "To some, the Middle East – and specifically the question of Israel and the Palestinians – is the root cause of so many of the other international disputes that dominate the headlines. And even when it seems remote at best to connect them, you can always find an analyst or an expert who can find a thread between the two."

A resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict (and the Arab-Israeli conflict more generally) is important. But the resolution – if it ever comes – will not be the regional panacea that many pundits predict. What riles so much of the Arab and broader Muslim world is not Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza (something Israel has been trying for years to resolve), but the very existence of a Jewish state in the Middle East.

Arab and Muslim countries, which are ruled by repressive, non-democratic and often corrupt rulers, cannot tolerate the idea of a Jewish democratic state in their midst. Israel has always served as a convenient excuse to divert the attention of their populations from the various regimes' own failures. Were Israelis and Palestinians to find a way to live harmoniously, tensions might be reduced for some in the region, but not for the majority who need the perfidious "colonialist" Jewish state to blame for their ills.

Islamic extremism did not emerge in reaction to Israel. In fact, to Osama bin Laden – surely one of the world's most dangerous Islamist terrorists – Israel is an afterthought in Al Qaeda's campaign to overthrow first and foremost what it views as corrupt Islamic states, then the immoral West, and only then (recent propaganda notwithstanding) Israel, which it views as a simple lackey of the United States.

It's time for some Middle East commentators to give up their fixation with Israel and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as the "root cause" of the Middle East's ailments and take a more nuanced look at the bigger picture.

NDP MP takes lead in Yom Hashoah ceremony

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The MP who initiated last year's all-party bill proclaiming the 27th day of Nisan – the date of Yom Hashoah on the Hebrew calendar – as National Holocaust Memorial Day across Canada was the keynote speaker at this year's annual Holocaust memorial service in Winnipeg on April 18.

"This is a significant moment in our history," Judy Wasylycia-Leis, the New Democratic MP for Winnipeg North, said in her speech to members of the Jewish community who attended the memorial service at Congregation Etz Chayim in north Winnipeg.

"By proclaiming National Holocaust Memorial Day, we want to send a message to the whole world."

Wasylycia-Leis credited the efforts of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and her Jewish constituents for encouraging her to introduce the bill. She also praised her fellow MPs for putting aside political differences to pass it into law.

She described the Holocaust as a "horrific crime against the Jewish people" and one of the "most monstrous crimes" in history.

"The purpose of the bill is to honour and respect the memory of all those Jews who were murdered by the Nazis as well as the survivors who lived through that unimaginable period of history," she said. "We have to make sure their stories are not forgotten. And we have to fight against the kind of indifference that allowed Canada to close our doors to boatloads of Jewish refugees during World War II."

Following Wasylycia-Leis, Winnipeg's senior rabbi, Rabbi Peretz Weizman, himself a Holocaust survivor, added his reflections.

In an impassioned address given first in Yiddish, then English, Rabbi Weizman remembered the millions who perished, the great Jewish communities destroyed and the loss of a 1,000-year-old culture. He spoke of the heroes of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

"We ask the world, where was your heart? Where were your eyes?" he said.

"Did the world learn anything from the Holocaust? No. There are still evil forces at work. Anti-Semitism has again raised its vile head," he added, citing Mel Gibson's movie The Passion of the Christ and the lies about Jews emanating from the Muslim world.

"We Jews have changed though," he said. "We have learned to believe people who say they want to destroy us. We are no longer homeless. Our response to the Holocaust is Israel and the Israel Defence Forces."

Rabbi Henry Balser, Etz Chayim's spiritual leader, agreed the world has not learned from the Holocaust, noting the global lack of response to the killing fields of Cambodia and Rwanda.

"I agree with Rabbi Weizman that we can't expect the rest of the world to rescue us," he said.

"I do expect the world to understand when we defend ourselves though."

The memorial service also included comments from Neil Duboff, president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/CJA, the Margaret Park Hebrew Bilingual Elementary School Choir, readings in English and Yiddish by young adults Jodi Koffman and Nicole Freed, a rendition of the Hebrew song Shirim Ad Kan by Gray Academy of Jewish Education student Ksanya Khomenko, the lighting of memorial candles by Holocaust survivors and their families, the presentation of colours by members of the General Monash Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion and the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, General Moshe Dayan Post, and the renaming of the street outside the synagogue "The Avenue of the Warsaw Ghetto Fighters."

Other Holocaust-related events in Winnipeg included the annual B'nai Brith program "Unto Every Person There is a Name," followed last Monday by the annual public commemorative service at the Holocaust monument on the grounds of the Manitoba Legislature.

On Tuesday evening, the federation's Holocaust Awareness Committee, the Jewish National Fund and Winnipeg's Italian community co-sponsored a screening of the a film Perlasca, Italian Hero. On Wednesday, the Shaarey Zedek Congregation showed the documentary Facing Evil, which featured people such the poet Maya Angelou and author Raul Hilberg talking about their own experiences with racism and hate.

Montreal police set up hate-crimes unit

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Montreal will join other major Canadian cities and create a hate-crimes unit within its police force, Peter Yeomans, the city executive committee member in charge of public security, announced after a meeting with Jewish community leaders at city hall.

Yeomans said the work of about 12 officers across the island who specialize in investigating of crimes of this nature will be reorganized and more clearly defined.

He stressed that most of the new unit's parts were already in place, but lacked coherence. "This is a clarification of how hate crimes are handled… who does what, where the accountability is. It's a more refined command structure."

Otherwise, he said the police will "do the same work, in the same fashion. There is no dramatic change."

Yeomans said the new unit is spearheading the investigation into the library firebombing at United Talmud Torah's (UTT) St. Laurent branch. He said increased police surveillance of schools and other Jewish institutions would continue. "But it might not be visible. It could be undercover," he said.

Mayor Gerald Tremblay, Yeomans and fellow executive committee members Robert Libman, Alan DeSousa and Marcel Tremblay, as well as police director Michel Sarrazin, were among city officials who met with a seven-member Jewish delegation for about 90 minutes earlier this month.

FEDERATION CJA first vice-president Richard Vineberg; Joseph Gabay, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region chair; Allan Adel, B'nai Brith Canada legal counsel and co-chair of the Montreal Jewish community security co-ordinating committee; and Sidney Benudiz, executive director of UTT's St. Laurent campus, were among those present.

Yeomans said that creating a hate crimes unit should send a signal that the police take such crimes, as defined under Canada's Criminal Code, seriously. These include promoting genocide and inciting hatred, as well as hate as an aggravating factor in other offences, such as assault, damage to property, threats or harassment.

Yeomans said that in addition to trying to solvge hate crimes, the new police unit will work to prevent them through monitoring and intelligence-gathering. Its commander is Guy Ryan, who headed the morality squad in the eastern part of the city.

Yeomans would not say what the unit's budget is, but commented, "It doesn't matter. We will spend what it takes."

He added that there is a greater awareness among the police to take even relatively minor incidents seriously. "We now see every act as grave. We can't be indifferent."

Yeomans said that previously, hate crime investigations were done at the station level. Now, this activity will be "vertically" organized, he said. The unit's 12 officers will not, however, work exclusively on hate crimes, he said.

Vineberg expressed the community's appreciation for the city's support. "The police will not tolerate one iota of racist acts."

Adel said B'nai Brith has offered its expertise in training police and others in taking action against hate crime. It has developed a 45-hour program, accredited by the University of Manitoba, that is available to police, community groups and universities across the country.

CJC and B'nai Brith were among the organizations that held a press conference in the wake of the UTT firebombing and called for the establishment of a hate crimes unit.

Organized by the Centre for Research-Action on Race Relations, the coalition consists of a broad spectrum of ethnic and community groups, including the Quebec Human Rights Commission, Quebec Federation of Labour and Alliance Quebec.

Human rights museum receives $1M donation

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Izzy Asper may be gone, but his dream lives.

The late Winnipeg-based media mogul, philanthropist and larger-than-life Canadian figure had a lot of balls in the air at the time of his death last year, but none as close to his heart as the creation of the world's first museum dedicated to human rights.

Model of planned human rights museum.

The project was pursued with typical Asper-style zeal and passion that is continued by Asper's daughter, Gail, who told a press briefing in Toronto last week that not only has her father's death not slowed the project, but that organizers are committed more than ever to seeing it through.

The grandiose $270 million museum is on track to open its main building on Canada Day 2007 and its galleries a year later.

To be built on 8.2 acres on the Red River in the Forks district of downtown Winnipeg, the museum hopes to draw 350,000 visitors a year – 100,000 of those students – and will sell itself as a Canadian landmark.

"When people think of Canada, they will think of this building," said Moe Levy, executive director of Friends of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights.

The yet-unnamed 200,000-square-foot museum "is the most talked-about project in Winnipeg," Levy added. "It will be the largest human rights museum in the world, period."

Organizers hope for a dramatic opening ceremony, with Queen Elizabeth, Nelson Mandela and the descendants of Martin Luther King Jr. and Mahatma Gandhi in attendance.

One-fifth of the museum's space will be dedicated to the Holocaust. Of 60,000 square feet of permanent exhibition space, 13,000 square feet will describe the Jewish experience before, during and after World War II.

Though welcome, the Holocaust gallery throws into doubt plans by Canada's Jewish community to build a freestanding Holocaust museum in Ottawa.

Those plans were born around 1998, when a controversy erupted after the Canadian War Museum announced a Holocaust gallery as part of a $12-million renovation.

Veterans' groups opposed a Holocaust wing, saying the Shoah was not part of the Canadian war experience. Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith were also against a separate Holocaust display, saying they had not been properly consulted, and that their ideal was a freestanding Holocaust museum to be built in Ottawa.

In the end, the Canadian Museum of Civilization, which administers the Canadian War Museum, dropped plans for the Holocaust wing.

That makes a Holocaust exhibit in the human rights museum all the more appropriate, said Gail Asper.

Organizers say the the project will not be a museum in the customary sense, but rather one that showcases and promotes human rights as well as the dangers of their denial.

"Human rights are a very precious thing," Asper said. "My father believed in them deeply, but he was also very concerned when people who needed them most didn't have them."

Half of the $200 million needed for the project's first phase has been pledged by the federal government, 10 per cent by the government of Manitoba, 10 per cent by the city of Winnipeg, and 30 per cent must be raised in the private sector.

Fundraising for the remaining $70 million for the second project's second phase will begin when phase one is complete.

Asper said $34 million from 100 donors has been raised to date.

Last week, RBC Financial Group's charitable foundation announced a $1-million donation to the project.

More than 500 architects from around the world submitted designs for the building, said Levy. That number has been progressively whittled down to three, of which one will be declared the winner.

Several ethnic groups have endorsed the museum. They include the Assembly of First Nations, the Chinese Canadian National Council, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Ukrainian Canadian Congress and the National Association of Japanese Canadians.

The museum will showcase several instances of human rights abuses, including the Armenian, Rwandan and Cambodian genocides, the forced famine in Ukraine and ethnic cleansing in the former Yugoslavia.

On the positive side, it will pay tribute to such human rights luminaries as Gandhi, King, Mandela, former Canadian prime minister Lester Pearson, Mother Teresa and Holocaust educator Elie Wiesel.

Levy told The CJN that the museum has been trying to accommodate a multi-ethnic coalition called Canadians for a Genocide Museum, which has expressed concern that the Asper project will put a disproportionate emphasis on the Holocaust.

York students united in fighting problems: Hillel

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Jewish students are putting up a united and organized front to promote Israel and confront anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism at York University, says a senior staff member of Hillel.

"Jewish students on our campuses have not failed us," said Talia Klein, director of Hillel@York.

"We will continue to… proactively promote Israel."

Klein was speaking at a recent Holocaust Remembrance Day program at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, where a panel discussed the historical roots of anti-Semitism and its resurgence in Canada.

She was joined by military historian Gunnar Boehnert and the synagogue's spiritual leader Rabbi Avraham Plotkin.

Klein said in the last few months, Hillel and Jewish students have made strides in dealing with a rash of pro-Palestinian rallies.

She pointed to the late November election of the Hillel-endorsed Progress Not Politics slate to the York Federation of Students and a successful demonstration to denounce Palestinian suicide bombings as signs Jewish students have united in support of Israel.

A Jewish student has also been elected as assistant news editor at the Excalibur, York's traditionally far-left student-run newspaper, Klein said.

"Jewish students have fought back loudly – very loudly," she said. "They showed a tremendous amount of pride."

While the situation at York has been tense and at times uncomfortable for York's 4,500 Jewish students, Klein said the campus is in no way a hotbed of anti-Semitism.

"There are certainly anti-Semitic students at York… but York's administration is not anti-Semitic nor do they foster an environment of anti-Semitism," Klein said.

Boehnert, a non-Jewish survivor of Auschwitz and lecturer at several international universities including the University of Krakow, traced the origins of European anti-Semitism to the Crusades, when successive popes incited anti-Semitic attacks.

For several centuries, pogroms were fuelled by sensational, false claims by Catholics that the Jews murdered Jesus and used the blood of infants for religious rituals.

Protestant anti-Semitism was triggered by Martin Luther's verbal assaults against the Jews, Boehnert said.

"Luther emphasized that God's anger with the Jews was great," he said.

By the mid-19th century, the religious arguments for anti-Semitism were replaced by political ones. In Germany, Jews were reviled for assimilating and for their disproportionate contributions to politics, arts and sciences. In the early 20th century, Polish Catholics felt Jews wielded too much power in commerce.

"This tapped Polish envy, [sparking the belief] Jews had to be driven out of commerce, to be replaced by ethnic Poles," Boehnert said.

"There were anti-Semitic outbreaks all over Europe."

Rabbi Plotkin called anti-Semitism "one of the most hateful forces in the history of the world."

When Jews fled from Pharaoh's wrath in Egypt, they had contrasting views of how to fight it, he said.

One group wanted to return to Egypt, a second felt it was best to jump into the Sea of Reeds, a third tried to fight the Egyptians and a fourth felt prayer was their salvation.

Rabbi Plotkin said these responses to anti-Semitism still resonate today, as some Jews are responding to anti-Semitism by assimilation, disengagement, militancy and prayer.

"God says they're all good ideas and bad ideas," he said.

What God believes is the best response is to "march forward. Be a light unto the nations… Teach the world to lead an ethical life."

Israel's population reaches 6.78 million

By MOTI BASSOK
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's population has climbed to 6.78 million people on the eve of the country's 56th Independence Day, 8.4 times more people than at the first Independence Day in 1948.

Of Israel's population, some 81 per cent are Jewish, while 19 per cent are Arab. Of the country's Jewish citizens, 66 per cent were born in Israel, and 34 per cent were born abroad. In 1948, the numbers were reversed, with only 35 per cent of Jews born in the country.

Jerusalem is the largest city, with 692,000 residents – 464,000 Jewish and 228,000 Arab. Most of Israel's population is concentrated in the centre of the country around Tel Aviv, which has a population of 364,000. To the east is Ramat Gan, with 126,800 residents, and Bnei Brak, with 139,700 residents. To the south is Bat Yam, with some 134,000 people.

The 14 largest cities in Israel include some of the country's oldest communities, founded in the 19th century, according to figures released Sunday by the Central Bureau of Statistics.

Among the 14 is Rishon Letzion, founded in the 1880s, which has grown from 11,000 residents in 1948 to 214,900 today. Its neighbour to the south, Rechovot, also a veteran town, has grown from 12,500 residents in 1948 to 100,300 today. Ashkelon and Ashdod were founded in 1948 and 1955 respectively as cities on the periphery of the most populous centre of the country. Today, Ashkelon's population is 104,700 and Ashdod's is almost twice that number.

Be'er Sheva, the "capital of the Negev" and the largest city in the south, has 183,200 residents. The third largest city in the country, and the largest city in the north, is Haifa, with 270,500 people.

Some 30 per cent of Israel's population, or 1.5 million people, were born in Israel to a family in which the father was born in Israel, and 1.2 million people were born in Israel to a father born in the former Soviet Union. Morocco is the country of origin of about 500,000 Israelis. Another 245,000 are from Iraq, 240,000 are from Romania and 220,000 are from Poland.

Since last Independence Day, some 144,000 babies were born in Israel and 21,000 immigrants came to the country. Slightly more than half of this year's immigrants hail from the former Soviet Union, 2,600 are from Ethiopia, 1,800 are from France, 1,600 are from the United States, and 1,200 are from Argentina.

Sharon vows peace breakthrough for sake of fallen

The country came to a standstill at 11 a.m. Monday morning to the wail of air-raid sirens, which sounded for two minutes.

From Nov. 29, 1947, to this April 4, 20,196 soldiers fell. From last Memorial Day to April 19, 184 soldiers were killed. From the time the first Jewish settlers left the walls of Jerusalem in 1860 and started building Jewish quarters until April 19 this year, the number of fallen soldiers was 21,781.

Ariel Sharon

The memorial ceremonies started Sunday evening at 8 p.m. with a one-minute siren. Israeli President Moshe Katsav opened the state ceremony at the Western Wall plaza in Jerusalem.

"We hoped that we would not add more names to the list of fallen," Katsav said in his speech, "but to our regret, it was another year of pain and of blood in the streets, another year of sorrow and grief, a year in which the awareness grew within us that we are fighting to defend the lives of citizens of Israel and for the security of the state."

Katsav was followed by Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Maj.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon.

Israel's "war for its existence is not over..." said Ya'alon. "Murderous terrorism that targets men, women and children has not ceased. We will not stop fighting until peace and quiet return to the streets of Israel."

Speaking at a memorial to civilian victims, Sharon said, "It is today clear to our enemies and the whole world that those who raise their hands against Jews, citizens of Israel, and those who incite and dispatch murderers, those who engage in terror of any form against us, will not find shelter from punishment, and will have no immunity from harm.

"As long as our enemies continue their strategy of terror," Sharon continued, "we will exact a heavy security and diplomatic price. They have already begun to understand that we have changed the rules. Their present policy will bring about the continued loss of their assets, and [they will] see their national aspirations unfulfilled."

At the same time, Sharon said, "all those who truly and genuinely want peace and good relations with us will find our hand extended and will find us truly prepared to meet them halfway with painful concessions, in order to build a better future for ourselves, and all the residents of the area."

Europe's Jews have mixed emotions over new EU

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — On May 1, less than 15 years after the collapse of the Iron Curtain, the former communist states of Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Slovenia, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia are to become full-fledged members of the European Union (EU), along with the island states of Cyprus and Malta.

The move marks the culmination of Europe's political and economic transformation and puts a formal end to the post-World War II paradigm of a Europe divided between East and West. At the same time, it validates the emerging Jewish communities in the new member states as part of the European and Jewish mainstream.

"It's as if brothers who were out are coming home," said Mario Izcovich, director of pan-European programs for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC).

Like their non-Jewish fellow citizens, Jews in the new EU countries view the union's enlargement with a mix of emotions ranging from eagerness to deep anxiety.

Younger Jews in particular are eager to take advantage of enhanced business, educational and other opportunities. Others hope enlargement will facilitate contact among Jewish communities.

Some Jews, however, fear they will be left behind by the changes. And many fear that "new" forms of anti-Semitism and unfavourable Israel policies in western Europe may be exported to new member countries that to date have had policies supportive of Israel.

"EU enlargement will not directly affect the new member states' Jews, other than in the mainly positive way it will change the lives of the general population," Polish Jewish writer Konstanty Gebert told JTA. "In the long run, it will be instrumental in bringing all the continent's Jews together and helping them avail themselves of new opportunities, both through EU sponsorship of some community programs and through the implementation of EU laws."

But the main issue, he said, "is whether there exists a 'European Jewry' able to profit from the opportunity."

What might change, Gebert said, "is the relatively more balanced approach that some new members, especially Poland, have taken on the Middle East conflict. As the EU attempts to integrate the foreign policies of its members, it can be expected that the newcomers will more closely toe Brussels' line, which is markedly critical of Israel."

About two million Jews live in Europe, in national communities that range from about 100 people in Malta to 600,000 in France. European Jewry encompasses all walks of life, all social and economic levels and all religious streams.

Altogether, fewer than 150,000 Jews live in the 10 new EU states. In east-central Europe, the EU expansion is the culmination of a period of extraordinary changes in a region where the Holocaust wiped out millions of Jews and communist regimes virtually eliminated Jewish observance.

After the end of the Cold War, there was a dramatic revival of Jewish life in post-communist Europe. Synagogues, schools and other Jewish institutions were established and a wide range of Jewish cultural activities blossomed. International Jewish networks expanded to encompass Jews once cut off by the Iron Curtain.

Beginning in the mid-1990s, some Jewish strategists foresaw the emergence of a "European Jewish identity" that could make European Jewry a collective "third pillar" – or equal player – in world Jewry, alongside Israeli and North American Jewry.

Some Jews in Europe feel they are moving toward that goal, albeit slowly, and they see the EU expansion as a key step in that direction.

"Perhaps we have not entirely created a European Jewish identity, but we are near to that feeling," said Fero Alexander, executive chair of the Central Union of Jewish Communities in Slovakia, home to 3,000 to 4,000 Jews.

European Jews, he told JTA, have found their self-confidence, and that is "what I consider the most exciting achievement."

Izcovich, whose job is to foster programs aimed at cross-border Jewish co-operation, said the definition of European Jewish identity may be more complex than envisaged.

"We need to speak about European Jewish identity with a capital 'I' that includes many Jewish identities," he said. "This comes from the past: 2,000 years of Jewish presence in Europe, the development in Spain, in central Europe, from Rashi and Maimonides till nowadays. So the European Jewish identity really exists, with all its differences."

Gebert and others have said, however, that the optimistic expectations of the 1990s have not been fulfilled, partly due to internal Jewish relations.

"The two main communities, in France and in the United Kingdom, do not seem interested in reaching out to the remaining small fry," Gebert said. "The large communities in Russia and Ukraine remain essentially dependent on American Jewish and Israeli support, both material and spiritual, and the Hungarian community is as insular as ever.

"Representatives of smaller Diaspora [areas] meet more often in Jerusalem or Washington than in Paris or London – let alone Moscow, Budapest or Warsaw – and mainly compete for the attention of the big Jewish organizations, instead of trying to coordinate their actions," he said. "EU enlargement will probably not change this."

In addition, a grim litany of global challenges has cast a shadow over European Jewish development and made some Jews feel less secure on the continent than they did in the 1990s.

These include a spike in anti-Semitic violence, world terrorism, Islamic fundamentalism and Holocaust revisionism. Fallout from the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the war in Iraq have added further cause for concern, as Jews are torn by left-right politics and anti-Semitism has often become linked to anti-Americanism.

Widespread European criticism of Israel for its policies against the Palestinians has prompted warnings that a demonization of the Jewish state forms the basis of a new type of anti-Semitism.

"It's very dangerous," said Janos Gado, an editor of the Budapest Jewish monthly, Szombat. "It is politically correct to be against anti-Semitism and to lament the Shoah, but also to be anti-Zionist. This development in Europe is very disappointing, and I share the fears of many Jews that Europe will not be able to protect them."

European Jews and non-Jews "speak two different languages, so I'm not so enthusiastic about Europe," Gado said.

EU expansion, he said, could be good for Jews as individuals, but for Jews who are very committed to their community and to Israel, "it may, in the long term, give them no protection."

Such issues are slated to be discussed at the third General Assembly of European Jewry, organized by the European Council of Jewish Communities, to take place in Budapest May 20-23, just three weeks after the new countries join the European Union.

Insurance firm to compensate Iraqi Jews

The compensation will be paid out to three Jews in Israel who own insurance policies they took out when they were Iraqi citizens. The three left Iraq during the exodus of Jews who were forced out of their homes and lost their property.

The policies were purchased from an insurance company that was operating on behalf of a branch owned by the French insurance company Axa.

An Axa spokesperson told Associated Press that the three had made their claims through the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims and that more payments could be made if other claimants come forward.

Yaakov Galanti, a spokesperson for the Israeli Justice Ministry, told AP that although the case involves a small group, it could force other other insurance companies to compensate other claimants.

The compensation to be paid to the three Iraqi Jews by Axa amounts to $130,000 (US). The company has also announced that four other Jews who left Iraq and who had taken out insurance policies with Axa are also eligible for compensation.

The existence of policies owned by some of the estimated 130,000 Jews who were expelled from Iraq was discovered as a result of a check run by the Justice Ministry in Israel.

The ministry has completed work on 12,000 files that include information on property and assets owned by Jewish residents of Arab countries who were expelled or who were forced to leave after the State of Israel was established.

Hundreds have filed insurance claims on policies they owned before they were forced to flee, but most don't expect much compensation as many of the insurance firms have since closed, Galanti told AP.

Among the ministry's 12,000 files, some 200 cases have been found of Iraqi Jews whose insurance policies were never honoured because they were forced out of the country.

The list of 200 was published in newspapers in October last year.

The current value of personal and communal property left behind by Jews fleeing Arab countries has been estimated at between $30 billion and $100 billion (US).

Vanunu to Norway?

Norway's opposition leader has asked his government to press Israel to remove the limitations on Mordechai Vanunu, the nuclear technician who spent 18 years in jail for revealing classified nuclear secrets, and allow him to move to Norway as a political refugee. Israel prohibited Vanunu from leaving the country or obtaining a passport for one year following his release last week. Among other restrictions, for the next six months, he must also apply for permission to meet non-Israelis. Vanunu has said he wants Norway's help to leave Israel.

Israeli unemployment rises

Israel's jobless rate hit 11 per cent in February, the highest level since 1994. The number of unemployed people reached 289,800, up 2,600 in a single month, the Israeli newspaper Globes reported. The jobless rate is worsening by 0.1 percentage points every two to three months, the Central Bureau of Statistics said. The unemployment rate has risen by 2.3 percentage points, or 60,603 people, since the Palestinian intifadah started in September 2000.

March surge in tourism

Tourism to Israel jumped by nearly 200 per cent in March over the same time last year. Some 106,000 tourists visited Israel last month. The increase may have been due partly to the fact tourism was very low in March 2003, when the United States invaded Iraq.

Cellphone numbers change

Cellphone numbers in Israel are changing. The new numbers went into effect last week, though the old ones will continue to work through Oct. 31. Under the new system, the area codes 050, 051, 056 and 068 are being consolidated under 050; area codes 052, 053, 058, 064 and 065 all become 052; and area codes 054, 055, 066 and 067 all become 054. In addition, a seventh digit was added to each cell phone number, derived from the old prefix. For example, if an old number was 056-XXX-XXX, the new number is 050-6XX-XXXX. From outside Israel, the first zero must still be dropped for all area codes.

Burg apologizes to EU

Former Knesset speaker of Avraham Burg apologized to the European Parliament last week for Israeli government policy. Referring to recent events, notably Israel's killing of Hamas leader Abdel Aziz Rantissi and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to withdraw unilaterally from Gaza, Burg told the parliament members: "I apologize to you, because I find no words in which to come to defend the policies of my government. But at the end of the day, this is the democratically elected government of Israel." Burg called on Europe to get more involved in the Mideast peace process in order to balance the dominant U.S. role. Burg was in Strasbourg with Yasser Abed Rabbo to present their Geneva Initiative peace plan.

Alleged Mossad agent may have used Canadian passport

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Two Israeli men arrested in New Zealand on passport fraud charges are alleged to be Mossad agents, one of whom once entered the South Pacific country using a Canadian passport.

News media in New Zealand and Australia reported last week that Eli Cara, 50, and Uri Zoshe Kelman, 30, were arrested in a police sting operation as they waited to obtain a phony New Zealand passport. A third man, Zev William Barkan, 37, reportedly left the country before his colleagues were arrested, while a fourth unnamed individual was believed to be hiding somewhere in the country.

If the allegation about the Canadian document is proven, it could sour relations between Canada and Israel, which promised seven years ago to refrain from using Canadian passports in covert operations. The pledge came after two Mossad agents posing as Canadian tourists were captured in Amman, Jordan, when they tried to assassinate a Hamas leader, Khalid Mashal, with a high-tech poisoning device.

> If the suggestion about the Canadian document is proven, it could sour relations between Canada and Israel

In New Zealand, the acting minister of foreign affairs, Jim Sutton, has alleged that Cara and Kelman worked for the Israeli government, though New Zealand Prime Minister Helen Clark refused to confirm whether she believed the pair were Mossad operatives.

In Ottawa, Ofir Gendelman, second secretary of the Israeli embassy, said last week that embassy staff had only been made aware of the incident the day before it was reported on last week in the National Post and had no further information. He said Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs (DFA) had not sought a meeting to discuss the matter.

DFA spokesperson Reynald Doiron said "the matter is being investigated" but until Canadian authorities know more about the allegations, it would be premature to discuss the issue with Israeli diplomats.

The government of New Zealand, however, summoned Israel's acting ambassador, Orna Sagiv, from her base in Australia, for consultations. The government demanded Israel return any bogus New Zealand passports it might have.

The legal charges allege Cara and Kelman attempted to obtain a New Zealand passport and were part of an organized crime operation.

Outside court, Cara denied being a Mossad agent while Kelman refused to comment.

News reports indicated Kelman entered New Zealand in 1999 using a Canadian passport that appeared on its face to be phony because it contained two extra identifying letters. He also left for Australia eight weeks later on a temporary replacement Canadian passport he obtained while in New Zealand. On his most recent visit, he used Israeli travel documents, but he is believed to have also used a U.S. passport on an earlier occasion.

In 1997, Jordan's King Hussein was so outraged at the Mashal incident that he personally demanded Israel provide the antidote.

The government of then prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu complied. Jordan released the two agents in exchange for the release of Sheikh Ahmad Yassin, who resumed his role as leader of Hamas. Israel assassinated Yassin last month, saying he was an architect of Hamas' campaign of suicide bombings.

End-of-life issues critical for three key religions

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Protecting the sanctity of life, respecting the dignity of the individual and providing relief from pain while treating the dying patient are principles common to the three main monotheistic religions in Canada, according to a recent interfaith panel on the subject.

The discussion, titled "Ethical Issues in End-of-Life Care: the approaches of Judaism, Catholicism and Islam," was the Israel Kaplun Memorial Lecture in Bioethics held recently at Beth Tikvah Synagogue. It was jointly presented by the synagogue, the Ja'affari Islamic Centre, the Centre for Clinical Ethics and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

Panellists were Michael Gordon, head of geriatric and internal medicine at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care; Hazel Markwell, director of the Centre for Clinical Ethics at St. Joseph's Health Centre and St. Michael's Hospital; and Shabbir Alibhai, a specialist in geriatric medicine at the University Health Network.

Moderator was Michael Enright, host of CBC's Sunday Edition.

The Catholic approach to end-of-life issues comes from theological and philosophical principles set down by sacred texts, doctors of the church, papal edicts and contemporary thinkers, explained Markwell.

But, she said, there are differences of opinion, as in all religious streams, such as, for example, regarding the question of whether to withdraw nutrition for a dying patient.

In Catholic ideology, Jesus is seen as the "incarnation of God" and his suffering and death a sign that God is involved with life.

"Life is both a gift and a responsibility," Markwell said. Each person is created in the image of God, and is considered a steward – not an owner – of his body.

Every patient is entitled to have his dignity respected, she said. According to Catholic philosophy, that is an inherent right and is not dependent on how well or how poorly he is functioning.

Markwell said the distinction between ordinary and extraordinary measures in medicine is less clear than it used to be. For instance, there is an issue as to whether dialysis should be offered to a patient who is clearly dying.

If there is not a clear benefit to the patient of a certain treatment, it can be withdrawn. But the intent of that action must be clear. Catholic theology says if the goal is to hasten or cause death, then it is wrong.

Alibhai said Muslim philosophy on medical ethics is based on the Koran, the Sunya, writings by the prophet Mohammed and his family, scholarly writings and responsa by jurists in Islamic law.

Islam, he said, shares with the other Abrahamic faiths the belief that life is sacred, and that every moment of life is precious.

"We believe that he who kills one, it is as if he killed the whole world. Similarly, he who saves one, it is as if he saved the whole world."

God is the final arbiter of the beginning and end of life, Alibhai said.

"We have no right to either accelerate life or to judge the value of it."

For instance, he said, food and drink are not considered medical care, but rather a basic need that may not be refused, regardless of the imminence of death.

It is a religious duty in Islam to prevent illness and to seek treatment if necessary. The obligation to prolong life takes precedence over quality of life considerations.

However, "if there is intractable, uncontrollable pain, one can back off [treatment]. We do not have to extend life if one is only extending suffering."

It is not the responsibility of the medical or nursing staff to make those kinds of decisions, he said.

"Our responsibility is to seek out opinions of experts both in the medical field and scholars."

Gordon said the interpretation of the Halachah of health care, as expounded in the Torah, the Talmud and commentaries, changes "as the world changes."

Accordingly, he said, in bioethical matters, a rabbi should be consulted.

"A rabbi's role is not that of an emissary [of God]," he said. "His role is to interpret what has been taught."

While Halachah holds that life is sacred and must be preserved under any conditions, many clinicians don't hold by that opinion, and focus on quality of life instead, Gordon said.

"This can cause tension."

Judaism does not find merit in suffering, unlike Islam, for instance, which sees it to a certain extent as an expiation of sin (although the relief of that suffering is nevertheless obligatory).

The obligation toward a dying person changes during the process from the preservation of life to the promotion of a "good death."

"Respect for the dying process implies not interfering with it," Gordon said, such as by forcing extraordinary and obviously useless therapies.

Thus, it is obligatory to provide food and fluid and to relieve pain. It is also forbidden to hasten death.

However, Gordon said, it is not the role of medical staff to impose their own values on patients or their families. "One's own values must be parked at home," he said.

When a member of the audience asked how can medical staff separate faith from their profession, Gordon said, "The only important person in the equation is the person being taken care of."

Alibhai said one's duty to a patient "doesn't override one's duty to God – God must come first."

Markwell said, "You cannot separate your faith from your profession."

The advance directive, the document signed by a person in advance of being terminally ill, is "highly overrated," Gordon said.

"It can be overruled if the patient is comatose… what is significant is the discussion that you have with the people you love."

Alibhai warned that a person overrides the advance directive "at [their] peril," especially if the family is not there at the time, or if they haven't discussed the matter.

Finances enter into the care of the dying patient as well.

"How far do you go in saving one life when 10 others may be at risk?" asked an audience member.

Resource allocation is not the purview of the physician or nurse at the bedside, the panel agreed.

"Your responsibility is to care for your patient," Gordon said. "Resource allocation is not your decision."

Alibhai slammed the refusal by medical staff to provide sufficient pain relief to the terminally ill because of the danger of addiction as "plain wrong. We consistently undertreat pain in the elderly anyway."

Organizations present at the discussion included representatives of the Canadian Council of Churches, the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, the Islamic Ja'affari Centre and Beth Tikvah, the host synagogue.

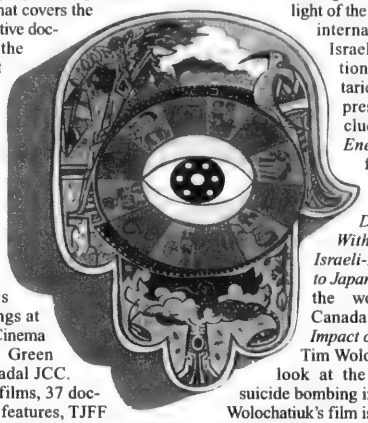
TJFF program celebrates diversity of Jewish content

By TAMMY STONE
Special to The CJN

The upcoming 12th Annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF), May 1-9, is gearing up to showcase some of the best of this year's Jewish-themed films.

The TJFF has grown steadily over the last few years and had 25,000 in attendance in 2003. This year, the programming team has selected a line-up that covers the gamut from provocative documentaries on the Middle East conflict and films by local talent to Israeli and international titles and favourites from years past.



Culled from around 250 submissions the world over, 88 films in 16 languages were selected for the festival, which this year holds screenings at two venues: Bloor Cinema and the new Al Green Theatre – Miles Nadal JCC. Including 22 short films, 37 documentaries and 21 features, TJFF also boasts nine world premieres, 14 North American premieres, 19 Canadian premieres and eight films showing in Toronto for the first time.

But sheer numbers are nothing compared to the hard work that went into presenting these films in thematic programs and turning the cinematic experience into an event that celebrates the art of film, the diversity of Jewish content and the ability of cinema to educate and shed light on important issues. TJFF has become seasoned at doing this and has turned the festival into one of the largest and most successful of its kind in the world.

Shlomo Schwartzberg, the festival's director of programming, attributes its success to several factors. "We program very well, we have a very receptive audience and we treat our filmmakers warmly so they go back and tell others how much fun they had here."

He notes that about 13 per cent of the festival audience is non-Jewish and says with a wide palette of rich, diverse and thought-provoking films, the TJFF program offers something for everyone.

Fascinating to many, especially in light of the current escalation of international conflict, are Israeli-Palestinian relations. Nine documentaries on the subject are presented this year, including Israel's Behind Enemy Lines (the festival's opening night film), Checkpoint, It is No Dream and Sleeping With the Enemy: An Israeli-Palestinian Journey to Japan. Also highlighted is the world premiere of Canada's documentary, Impact of Terror, directed by Tim Wolochatiuk, a poignant look at the implications of a suicide bombing in Jerusalem.

Wolochatiuk's film is one of 13 Canadian films this year, in accordance with TJFF's mandate to showcase local and national talent. Among these are Karen Shopsowitz's My Grandparents had a Hotel; Igal Hecht's The Chosen People, about a Jewish congregation in Toronto that believes Jesus is the Messiah; and work by emerging filmmakers. Andrea Feder, a Ryerson film student who did one of TJFF's mini-trailers last year, is back this year with The Bund, co-directed by student Carolina May.

Schwartzberg stresses that it's always been important to the programming team to listen to audience feedback from prior years when choosing the films. This has led to the return of Jonathan Kesselman's hugely popular and scathingly funny The Hebrew Hammer, which screened last year, as well as films by veteran actor/director Richard Benjamin, who will present Mermaids and My Favorite Year.

Moving to the other side of the globe we find an Israeli cinema that Schwartzberg says is thriving. Audience demand inspired a turn to Israeli TV (The Postwoman, Amsalem's Tears, A Life's Work), "strong dramas that highlight Israeli life that has nothing to do with the interminable Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"Israel is not just about the conflict but a country whose people go through all sorts of problems and deal with all manner of issues that are universal," Schwartzberg says.

Other films to watch for include Pearl Gluck's Divan, a poignant documentary about a famous sofa slept on by numerous rebbes and now a family heirloom; Wondrous Oblivion, a moving family film about race relations in England; James' Journey to Jerusalem, about an earnest, religious African Christian's experiences in modern day Israel; and Abjad, a thought-provoking film from Iran that entwines a relationship between an Iranian and a Jew in the narrative.

TJFF also offers informative free programs interspersed throughout the festival to complement the regular screenings. A series called "A Conversation With…", for example, features an on-stage dialogue with a filmmaker/special guest each weekday, including Toronto filmmakers Karen Shopsowitz and Harry Rasky; Richard Benjamin,who will be interviewed by Martin Knelman; and Israeli filmmaker Benny Brunner.

The keynote free program this year, though, is a panel called "Up Against the Wall," which discusses TJFF's documentaries about the Middle East crisis, from all sides of the spectrum. Moderated by columnist Shira Herzog, the panellists are Dov Gil-Har (director of Behind Enemy Lines), Benny Brunner (The Wall, It is No Dream, The Children of Abraham and Sophie) and Palestinian journalist Adnan Joulani (the subject of Behind Enemy Lines). This panel will look at the Middle East situation from both angles and explore whether filmmakers can indeed play a part in the peace process.

The bombing of the Sbarro Pizzeria is the focus of the world premiere of the Canadian film Impact of Terror.

"It's a vitally important initiative, we feel, and one that can only do some good in its own way," Schwartzberg says.

"We hope the films on the Middle East will open up dialogue… Dialogue, in a non-threatening filmic setting can only help, in Toronto too… By offering non-stereotypical views of Jews and showcasing the rich diversity of Jewish life, we successfully counter the stereotypes others may have of us."

Jewish film festival offers cornucopia of Israeli documentaries, features

The 12th edition of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, May 1-9, has lined up a cornucopia of Israeli films running the gamut from documentaries to features. Below is a preview.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Dov Gil-Har's intriguing Sleeping with the Enemy: An Israeli-Palestinian Journey to Japan (May 2, Miles Nadal JCC, noon) offers a glimmer of hope that Israelis and Palestinians can indeed coexist. The film, which was shot before the eruption of the current intifadah, follows 10 Israelis and 10 Palestinians as they travel through three Japanese cities – Tokyo, Kyoto and Hiroshima – in a quest for mutual understanding. The visitors, the guests of Japan's foreign ministry, are at first cold and uneasy in each other's company. But as they discuss issues of mutual interest, they loosen up, and in some cases, they form friendships.

The fascinating sequel, Behind Enemy Lines (May 2, Miles Nadal JCC, 2 p.m.), filmed in Israel and the territories following the outbreak of the intifadah, focuses on two of the participants, Adnan Joulani, a Palestinian journalist, and Benny Herness, an Israeli police superintendent. The pair visit a variety of sensitive places, from Yad Vashem to the Jenin refugee camp. Joulani and Herness are personally compatible, but their views on the political situation diverge, to say the very least.

It is no Dream (May 6, Bloor Cinema, 3:15 p.m.), directed by Benny Brunner and Joseph Rochlit, presents an array of figures from Israel's left – a religious soldier, a writer, an academic, some journalists and a human rights worker – who disagree with government policy vis-a-vis the territories and the Palestinians. Some accuse Israel of having committed war crimes, while others stick to specific critiques (of checkpoints, zoning laws and collective punishment). All believe that the occupation stains and corrupts Israel. A thought-provoking but one-dimensional movie.

The Main Suspect (May 4, Bloor Cinema, 5:45 p.m), by Yaky Yosha, examines the nation-wide rioting that claimed the lives of 12 Israeli Arabs in the first few days of October 2000 and damaged the fabric of Jewish-Arab coexistence in Israel. Graphic footage of stone-throwing Arabs and burning tires permeate the film, but its focal point is Alik Ron, the Israeli police chief in the Galilee who ordered the use of lethal force to squelch demonstrations. In the director's opinion, the villain is Ron, an amiable, well-meaning man who claims he was merely upholding the law as Galilee was "burning." The Main Suspect, which tends to be one-sided, ends on a hopeful note as Ron meets with a group of Israeli Arabs in their town to thrash out grievances.

The Children of Abraham & Sophie (May 3, Bloor Cinema, &:15 p.m.), by Benny Brunner, zeroes in on two unusual Israeli families – the Bar-Ons and the Zedeinis. Mordechai Bar-On, the family patriarch, is a writer, an ex-member of the Knesset, the former chief education officer of the armed forces and Moshe Dayan's one-time chief of staff. Bar-On was born in Israel, but his mother, Sophie Schopf, was a German convert to Judaism. Bar-On's daughter, Talli, is married to an Israeli Arab, Daher Zeideni, an opponent of Zionism. Their two children are torn between their Jewish and Arab backgrounds. This intelligent film looks at Israel's struggle for statehood, the expulsion of Palestinian Arabs from Israel in 1948, the nature of ethnic identity and the German family related by blood ties to the Bar-Ons. The film, while never less than interesting, is somewhat choppy and gives Sophie far too little screen time.

Promised Land (May 3, Bloor Cinema, 1:15 p.m.) is an ironic play on words, focusing as it does on three Israelis who have immigrated to Germany or are considering the possibility. The subjects of Avy Hemy's tough-minded documentary – the descendants of Jews driven out of Germany during the Nazi era – have left Israel, or wish to do so, because life is easier and seemingly more secure in Europe. Their respective families oppose their quest for German passports, and Hemy himself adopts a disapproving tone.

Nitzan Gilday's In Satmar Custody (May 5, Bloor Cinema, 1: 15 p.m.) is a brooding, disturbing account of cultural dissonance, turning on the efforts of an anti-Zionist haredi sect, the Satmars, to bring Arabic-speaking Yemenite Jews to the United States and assimilate them into a Yiddish Ashkenazi religious milieu. The movie revolves around a young married Yemenite couple, Yahia and Lauza Jaradi, whose life has been made miserable by the Satmars (who discourage Yemenite Jews from settling in Israel). The heartbroken Jaradis have lost custody of their children, and their 2½-year-old daughter has died under suspicious circumstances. Fed up with the Satmars, Yahia describes them as "tricksters," while Louza wishes she had never left Yemen. Though the topic is compelling, the film merely limps toward its bitter-sweet denouement.

Israeli feature films seem to get better every year, judging by this year's offerings.

Yossi & Jagger (May 2, Bloor Cinema, 9:45 p.m.), directed by Eytan Fox, breaks new ground, being the first Israeli film about a homosexual relationship set in the Israeli army. The protagonists, Yossi (Oded Knoller) and Jagger (Yehuda Levi), are officers posted to a fortification in southern Lebanon. In an early scene, they make out in the snow after a spirited snowball fight. Jagger, who has the good looks of a rock star, wants to come out of the closet, but Yossi, a stolid career officer, lives in fear of being outed. The film features fine performances, and is bawdy, unsentimental and heartbreaking.

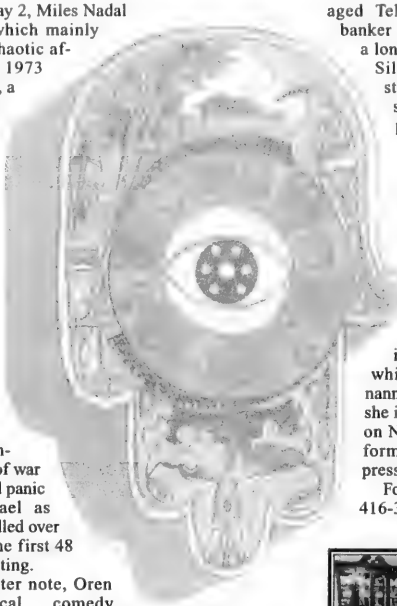
In Insight (May 2, Miles Nadal JCC, 6 p.m.), which mainly unfolds in the chaotic aftermath of the 1973 Yom Kippur War, a dazed Israeli soldier tries to ascertain the fate of his best friend, a fellow observant Jew who may have been killed in a fierce tank battle on the Golan Heights. Deftly directed by Eyal Halfon and based on Haim Sabato's novel, Adjusting Sight, it is a touching film. Flashbacks delineate the horrors of war and the dread and panic that seized Israel as Syrian armour rolled over Israeli lines in the first 48 hours of the fighting.



On a far lighter note, Oren Stern's satirical comedy, Amsalem's Tears (May 2, Miles Nadal JCC, 8:30 p.m.), is about a gruff, violent but tender-hearted Israeli gangster (the irrepressible Moshe Ivgi) who comes to terms with his inner feelings after his mother's death and his reluctant decision to commit his father to an old age home. Deliberately or not, Ivgi's character acts a lot like the notorious Tony Soprano.

Ivgi also stars in The Postwoman (May 2, Miles Nadal JCC, following Amsalem's Tears 8:30 p.m.), a poignant film by Dina Zvi Riklis. Here he portrays a middle-aged Tel Aviv widower and banker who corresponds with a lonely letter carrier (Orly Silberschatz-Banai, in a stellar turn) desperately seeking love and companionship.

Finally, in Round Trip (May 5, Bloor Cinema, 9:45 p.m.), Nurit (Anat Waxman), a depressed 40-year-old bus driver from the northern border town of Kiryat Shmonah, leaves her perpetually unemployed husband, with their two children in tow, for supposedly greener pastures in Tel Aviv. Life being hard and hectic in the decrepit neighbourhood area of Tel Aviv in which they have settled, Nurit is forced to hire a nanny (Nathati Moshesh). An illegal Nigerian worker, she is an attractive woman who casts a romantic spell on Nurit. Shahar Rozen's film, with excellent performances from the principals, leaves quite an impression.

The story "Documentary examines world of messianic Jews" (CJN Apr. 22 page 26) gave the impression that director Igal Hecht's upcoming film Y.I.D. 2 is scheduled to premiere at next year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival. In fact, the TJFF has not made up the program for next year's festival at this time.

James' Journey a bittersweet assessment of Israeli life

By BILL STERN
Special to The CJN

Bill Stern, the author of You Don't Have To Be Jewish: A commentary on selected Jewish-content films, previews three of the films at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, running May 1 to 9.

In James' Journey to Jerusalem, James (Siyabonga Melongisi Shibe), a religious African Christian leaves his country for the Holy Land to realize his life's dream of experiencing Jerusalem as he envisions it from intensive study of the Jewish Bible.

Howie Mandel and Mario Van Peebles star in Crown Heights.

He enters the country and is immediately challenged by an immigration officer who cannot understand why a black person would come to Israel. He soon finds himself in jail.

He is bailed out by a businessman, Shimi (Salim Daw) who hires him for cleaning, heavy work and caring for his aging father Solph (Arie Eliot). James is unhappy and frustrated with his burdensome task. His only wish is to see Jerusalem. He is obligated to Shimi, however, because he posted the bail. James is stuck far away from Jerusalem, his inspirational vision.

An intelligent man, James quickly adjusts to modern Israeli economic life. He hires others to do the cleaning and soon has many clients and workers. He is making money, but is still obligated to Shimi who has his passport.

Shimi's father lives on a small piece of valuable land, which he refuses to give to his son who would build an apartment complex on it.

Shimi is so impressed with James' business acumen that he offers him a small association in his business. He gives him his passport, ensuring his trip to his spiritual destination – Jerusalem. Shimi also invites him to a very posh party there.

During the party, James discovers that it is a celebration because Shimi has obtained the small but valuable property from his father.

"Didn't you know this is why we are celebrating?" Shimi asks James.

Incensed, James who was Shimi's father's caregiver, throws all the money that Shimi has given him at Shimi and into the wind. James is still financially in debt to him.

This is a bittersweet assessment of life in Israel today. For those in the early struggle of the Zionist dream, it was a fantasy of a co-operative society – a beacon to the world. The people are still sweet, but the economic philosophy is no different than that in the Diaspora.

The film is directed by Ra'anan Alexandrowicz, who is also the director of the Inner Tour, shown at the Toronto Jewish film festival in 2002. James' Journey to Jerusalem runs at the Miles Nadal JCC, May 5 at 8:15 p.m. It is in English, Hebrew and Zulu with English subtitles.

When World War II was over, survivors' lives were no longer in mortal danger; their anxiety, however, was still alive, and they had a lot of time to think. Nightmares, despair, depression, despondency were a reality for them.

Almost Peaceful (Un Monde Presque Paisible), directed by Michael Deville, portrays a group of Jewish survivors in Paris determined to live happily again with their remaining families.

The main focus is a tailor's shop located in Albert's (Simon Abkarlan) home. He employs a small number of survivors as sewing machine operators. Their interrelationships and bonding as a group are majestically presented by writers Rosalinde and Michael Deville.

They are realistic about present-day anti-Semitism. Describing a recent community rally, a group member relates that "the police arrested more Jews than fascists."

Despite the realities of life, this is an unusual "Holocaust" film in that the final scene is one of great hope and beauty. We view a park where Holocaust survivors and their children indulge in games and fun in a setting poetically awe-inspiring.

In French with English subtitles. May 9, Bloor Cinema at 6 p.m.

"What two communities?" the Rebbe asks, confronted by a disciple, following the tragic death of a young African American man and a Crown Heights Lubavitcher Chassid. "We are one administration – under one God."

This opening comment in the film Crown Heights takes us back to 1991, when a Chassid's automobile accidentally struck an African-American youth who died of his wounds. The film shows how the young man's death leads to an alarming community crisis with riots and violence in which a visiting Australian Chassid is stabbed and perishes.

We view a densely populated area of 80,000 blacks and 20,000 Jews with negative rampant feelings in both groups. These feelings are not lessened in the Crown Heights Jewish population when an all-black jury finds Lee Limerick, the black protagonist, not guilty.

Two cultural activists, one black, the other white, are determined to face the emergency: a chassidic rabbi (Howie Mandel) and a black youth leader, Paul (Mario Van Peebles). They implement a concise but detailed plan, intelligently involving youths from both cultures.

They choose two teenage youth leaders, T.J. (Dequan Henderson) from the African American culture and Yudi (Jeremy Blackman) from the Jewish culture to help in the "peace process."

Their choice is a significant one. They, with the rabbi and the black activist are successful in their project, "Increase The Peace," by using the media in a program involving entertainment, art and sports.

The performances by (Toronto-born) Mandel, Van Peebles, Henderson and Blackman are inspiring. There is much for all of us to learn from the film Crown Heights as it pertains to hope, courage, caring and love.

Toronto is fortunate that our communal leadership has included Dan Hill, Ben Kayfetz, and Alan Borovoy, who laboured for better Jewish-black relationships with marked success. In black-Jewish dialogue, too, Judge Arthur Downes and Morley Wolfe have been most helpful.

The film ends with a quotation from civil rights activist A.J. Muste: "There is no way to peace, peace is the way."

Jeremy Kagan, who directed Crown Heights, is renowned for his superior direction of Chaim Potok's The Chosen, considered by many movie critics as one of the foremost Jewish-content films ever. May 3, Bloor Cinema at 8:15 p.m. Kagan will be in attendance.

For tickets to all screenings, call 416-324-9121 or visit www.tjff.com.

Pizzeria bombing documentary

On Aug. 9, 2001, a young man walked into a busy, downtown Sbarro Pizzeria in Jerusalem with a guitar slung on his back. The guitar was packed with explosives, nails and bolts. He blew himself up, killing 15 people and injuring more than 100. The victims were Jews and Arabs, young and old.

Impact of Terror, a Canadian-made documentary, premiering at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 3, 5:30 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema, revisits this tragic event.

Witnesses are shocked at the scene outside.

Featuring interviews with the survivors and the families of the dead, the film almost plays out as a thriller, slowly revealing the fate of those in the resturant at the time.

The film is directed by Tim Wolochatiuk, a veteran director, whose films include Scandals: Then and Now and the investigative series Days of Reckoning.

Simcha Jacobovici, executive producer, and Orley Pinchuk, a volunteer who was at the site of the bombing, are scheduled to be in attendance.

Novel paints a highly ironic portrait of Israel

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Set in modern Israel, Orly Castel-Bloom's latest novel Human Parts follows a troupe of characters around their ordinary lives as the nation struggles with an assortment of blights and curses that almost seem like divine punishments.

In Castel-Bloom's version of Israel, as in real life, there's a grueling intifadah that inflicts endless terrorist outrages upon an increasingly numbed-out nation. But in her fictional realm, the country is also caught in the grip of a prolonged and unprecedented period of freak rain, hail and snow storms.

Orly Castel-Bloom

It also must cope with the Saudi flu, a powerful virus whose victims often end up in hospital or the cemetery. Finally, endemic poverty, racial prejudice, corruption and spiritual malaise also plague the land.

Like personalities in a soap opera, the characters seem so wrapped up in their own personal troubles that they cannot grasp the dire national emergency. As they chase after an illusory success, most of the characters descend into a realm of low farce and pathos.

The book presents us with Kati Beit-Halahmi, who lives with her family in a run-down neighbourhood of Lod. Because her husband is out of work and his parents have disinherited him, she scrubs stairwells to feed her children. Invited onto a television talk show about poverty, she shames her husband's parents before the nation and becomes an instant sensation.

We also meet Liat Dubnov and her half-brother, Adir Bergson, who run a Tel Aviv laundromat. When Liat dies of Saudi flu, the mourners at her funeral are drenched in a sudden cloudburst that fills her grave with water.

Castel-Bloom's distinctive and colourful troupe also includes Adir's Ethiopian-Jewish girlfriend, Tasaro, who feels her life's prayers are answered after she wins a glamour job as the girl who spins the wheel on a television game show; Iris Ventura, a divorced mother struggling with poverty; and Reuven Tekoa, a fictitious Israeli president whose daybook is filled with funerals, shiva calls and visits to hospitals.

When Tekoa arranges to visit Kati Beit-Halahmi, she can't decide whether to lay out fancy refreshments or emphasize her extreme poverty. However, she's crushed when he postpones the visit to attend the funeral of a terror victim.

The story unfolds amidst a steady procession of suicide bombings, freak storms, cold snaps and flu deaths. Ordinary Israelis have given up trying to understand their world; public attention is continuously diverted from poverty to terror attacks to the weather to the latest flu statistics. Terror and storm alerts become so commonplace that the government adds more warnings to caution the people not to become apathetic.

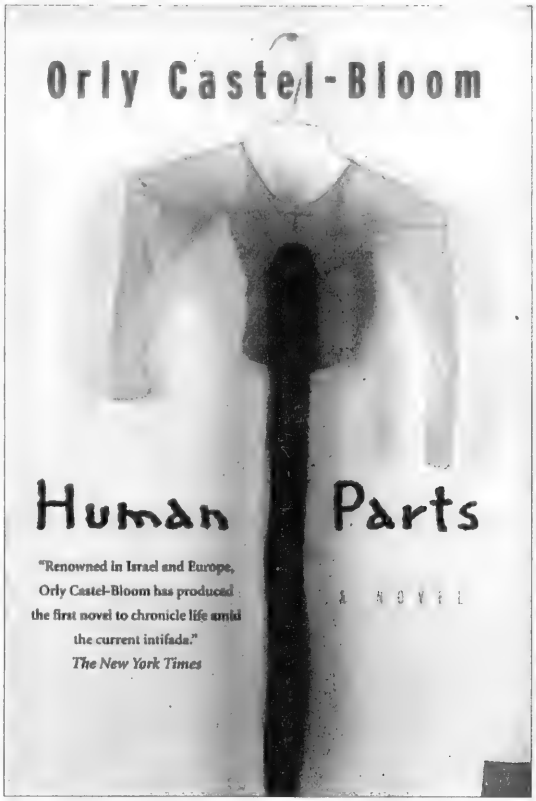
During a visit to Toronto, Castel-Bloom, a 43-year-old Tel Aviv native, told The CJN that the novel is the closest she has come to realism in any of her books. She also explained that it represents the first time she has employed the third-person omniscient narrative voice in her fiction.

"I decided to make the change when I turned 40 years old," she said. "In Judaism, when you are 40 years old, you can open the Kabbalah. I also gave myself permission to write in the third person, even though I know it's not an objective point of view. It's a kind of a lie. But everyone knows that I wrote it, not somebody else."

The book took her two years to write, she said, during which she had to shift her focus because reality kept intruding into her fictional plan.

"I started before the intifadah. I decided to write a social book that would focus on poverty, and then the intifadah erupted and invaded the material immediately, so I put it into the background until it eventually expanded and became part of the plot . . . .

"When I was writing, there was an attack every day or two, and, God forbid, it gave one a kind of inspiration. I wanted to contribute my point of view, to use my capacity as a writer to describe this epoch. History became so invasive that I had to stick with reality."



Orly Castel-Bloom
Human Parts
A NOVEL
"Renowned in Israel and Europe, Orly Castel-Bloom has produced the first novel to chronicle life amid the current intifada."
The New York Times

A dark and disturbing book, Human Parts paints a highly ironic portrait of Israel that seems equally funny and sad. If it depicts a disintegrating society almost beyond hope or salvation, it also offers a recognizable cry to the heavens for deliverance -- suggesting that all hope may not be lost after all.

Toronto-based Key Porter Books has published Dalya Bilu's fine English translation of Human Parts in a trade paperback that sells for $24.95

Jewish site in Spain on terrorists' list

By JEROME SOCOLOVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MADRID — Nicholson family members love getting out of Madrid on weekends, and often they round up other young families for the weekly kosher barbecue at Masada, a Jewish retreat in the mountains outside Spain's capital.

Masada, it turns out, was on a list of bombing targets police found in the hideout of the Islamic terrorists suspected of blowing up four commuter trains in Madrid on March 11, killing 191 people.

So will the Nicholsons go back to Masada?

"Absolutely I would. You cannot let that sort of thing stop you from continuing with your life," Paul Nicholson said, several days after his wife Dalia gave birth to a baby boy, their second child.

After the train bombings, Spain's 35,000 Jews – like most other Spaniards – were outraged that Islamic terrorists had struck in the country. Videotapes and statements on behalf of Al Qaeda said the attacks were meant to punish Spain for supporting the United States in the Iraq war.

Most Jews already accepted the importance of stringent security measures for a small community in a country with a large and rapidly growing North African population, and a long history of anti-Semitism.

But at least this time, it seemed after the March 11 bombings, the Jewish community had been left out of the terrorist vendetta. Many Jews thus were taken aback when, a few weeks after the train attacks, the newspaper El Mundo published the terrorists' plans for further attacks – including a map showing Masada's precise location.

"Masada is pretty well off the beaten track," said Nicholson, a New Zealand-born business consultant. "For them to have been able to track it down, get information about it – you really wonder a bit about the security in Spain for Jews."

In addition to Masada, the suspected terrorists also had planned to blow up a suburban shopping mall and bullet trains.

None of these attacks took place thanks to a cellphone found March 11 attached to an unexploded bomb as a makeshift detonator. Police used the phone to track the suspected leader of the train bombings – a Tunisian named Sarhane Ben Abdelmajid Fakhet – to an apartment in Leganes, a southern suburb of Madrid.

When police tried to storm the building, Fakhet and a group of followers triggered an explosion, killing themselves and a policeman and ripping off the front of the apartment building.

Police believe several suspects remain at large, and the Jewish community is taking no chances.

Jacobo Israel Garzon, president of Madrid's Jewish community, said synagogues in the city are beefing up their own security, and Spanish law enforcement authorities have been asked for additional help.

In Barcelona, where another 8,000 Jews live, Yitzhak Levy's home is next door to that city's Masada.

Levy says it's clear the Madrid train bombings, which came just three days before Spain's national elections, influenced the outcome. Yet he accepts the common analysis that many Spaniards voted for the Socialist government not because of its stance against the Iraq war, but because they felt deceived by the conservative government of then-prime minister Jose Maria Aznar.

Aznar's government first blamed the attack on the outlawed Basque separatist group ETA, despite increasing evidence of involvement by Islamic extremists. Aznar has said the government released new information pointing to Islamic radicals as soon as it became available, but many Spaniards felt the government was trying to hide something, afraid its support for the Iraq war might backfire electorally.

On Sunday, a day after being sworn in, the new Socialist prime minister, Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero announced he would make good on a campaign promise to withdraw Spain's 1,400 troops from Iraq.

He previously had said he might reconsider if the United Nations were given control of Iraq as planned by June 30.

After his inauguration, however, Zapatero said it seemed clear the transition wouldn't happen, and he promised to bring Spanish soldiers home "as soon as possible." Opinion polls showed that around 70 per cent of Spaniards agreed with the decision.

Madrid's Garzon said the rapidity with which Zapatero announced the pullout "gives the impression that we are submitting to the threats" of the terrorists.

"Most of my Spanish friends disagree with me," Nicholson said. "But one Spanish government made the decision to go in there, and for another Spanish government to come in and change that, all you're doing is answering the terrorists' request. Whether that was right or wrong doesn't really matter anymore."

Life of German Jews depicted in Ottawa play

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — On the day following Canada's first Holocaust Memorial Day, local audiences had an opportunity to attend a performance of the play In the Shadow of Death, a sombre depiction of the life of a German Jewish family before and during the Holocaust.

With an effort initiated by Anna Lee Chiprout, an employee of the Embassy of Israel who had seen the play in Toronto and felt it must have a wider audience, the play was booked for two performances at Centrepointe Theatre earlier this month.

"I feel very fortunate that the embassy would allow me to do this and to support the effort," she said.

She and fellow volunteer Howie Osterer worked on all the local arrangements for the play, including housing and feeding the cast and crew.

Written and directed by Stephen Puddle, a former New Zealander with extensive theatre training and background, the play follows the story of a fictional Jewish family named Elsner from their happy, secure life in the 1930s through the tragic years of the Holocaust. With a non-Jewish cast of mostly volunteers and a few semi-professional actors and dancers, the play evokes strong emotions using very little dialogue. Narrators, music and dance and a changing background of still photos projected onstage set the tone and describe the events vividly.

"We held open auditions and many of those who attended came from the church I attend," said Puddle. "Many had an interest in the subject, but not all, though by now I think all would say that they have grown in their understanding and appreciation of just what it is we are doing with the play."

Puddle decided to write the play to address what he felt was media bias against Israel and the Jewish people. Having received and read a copy of a Christian newspaper, "I suddenly found myself wanting to learn more, and so during the following weeks, I searched out information in books, magazines, articles and on the Internet," he said.

"I had always been interested in the Holocaust, but now my interest was turning to a deeper sense of horror and awe that something like this could have happened. My interest in World War II was also possibly due to the fact my father fought in the war and was actually interned in a prisoner of war camp by the Italians."

The initiative to bring the play was supported by several Christian and Jewish organizations, including the Most Rev. Marcel Gervais of the Archdiocese of Ottawa; the Right Rev. Peter R. Coffin, Bishop of Ottawa; the Ottawa Presbytery of the United Church of Canada; the Ottawa Presbytery of the Presbyterian Church in Canada; Interfaith Ottawa; the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem; the Soloway Jewish Community Centre; the Embassy of Israel; and B'nai Brith Canada.

The audience for the matinee was made up mostly of local high school students. Following the performance, they received a live history lesson as Holocaust survivor Barry Davis stood up to tell his personal story of horror and loss. Barely able to speak, Davis' emotional response to the play was testimony to the quality of the performance. After the evening performance, survivor Vera Gara shared her personal story with the audience.

Puddle said the play will be touring to Vancouver and Kelowna in the fall, and next year, it will embark on a three-month world tour.

International soccer matches to return to Israel

By DORON BERGERFREUND
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The executive committee of the Union of European Football Associations (UEFA) last week informed an Israeli delegation in Cyprus that international soccer matches would return to Israel.

Meeting in Limassol, the UEFA executive committee approved a recommendation to immediately lift the two-year-old ban on home matches in Israel.

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said the decision was a "great diplomatic, financial and sporting victory."

The decision follows a visit to Israel in mid-April by a UEFA delegation, which met with security, police and ministerial bodies involved in security issues.

After observing security measures in place, and with the recent reduction of terror incidents in Israel, the delegation agreed to allow matches under specific conditions. Games must be played in the Tel Aviv area only and security guarantees must be provided for every match.

The Israel Football Association and its clubs were required to confirm in writing they will meet these conditions before entering any UEFA competition.

UEFA added that it could re-impose a ban on any match in Israel at any time if the security situation deteriorates.

In its decision, the UEFA executive committee took account of the position of FIFA, the international football federation, which has allowed the Israeli national team to play its home 2006 FIFA World Cup qualifying matches in Israel, starting in September.

Last July, Israel formally lobbied UEFA officials at their Nyon, Switzerland, headquarters to end the ban. Shalom brought letters of support from eight European governments, including Germany, Italy and Spain.

The last international game in Israel was the national team's 1-1 tie with Austria in October 2001. Since then, Israeli clubs and the national team have played home games in Cyprus, Italy, Turkey and most recently in the Netherlands last December.

Soccer matches were withdrawn from Israel in March 2002 after a terror attack at the Seafood Market restaurant in Tel Aviv, which took place on the eve of a UEFA quarterfinal match between Hapoel Tel Aviv and Milan.

Synagogue baseball league holds event at SkyDome

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Inter-Synagogue Baseball League (ISBL) kicked off its season last week by combining a fun event with a community commemoration of the Holocaust at SkyDome.

About 300 onlookers participated in a Yom Hashoah commemoration at home plate, in which memorial candles were lit, prayers were chanted and the Canadian and Israeli national anthems intoned.

Then, survivor Mendel Goldband threw out the ceremonial first pitch to begin the league's 17th season. That was followed by an exhibition match that saw last year's champion, Pride of Israel Synagogue, defeat the league all-stars 23-11.

The ISBL events followed a Blue Jays loss earlier in the day to the visiting Baltimore Orioles. ISBL spokesman Neil Grunberg said the league sold 554 tickets to the game and ticket holders were invited to wait until the ballpark emptied for the start of the ISBL program.

Holocaust survivor Mendel Goldband throws first pitch in ISBL's 2004 season.

About 300 of the fans took part in the Yom Hashoah commemoration and stuck around to watch the softball matchup, he said.

"It was a really great day for everyone. It was somber during the ceremony, but it was great to be on the field... playing where the Blue Jays play."

For many, it was their only participation in a Yom Hashoah commemoration that day. "It was a win-win-win situation," Grunberg said.

Part of the day's events included a fundraising component in cooperation with the Blue Jays, Grunberg said. The league raised enough money to purchase 400 tickets that were donated to the Jewish Family & Child Service and an additional $700 was presented to the Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

The ISBL was established in 1987 as a fun league for the members of Toronto-area synagogues. As many as 13 teams and 180 players are expected to participate in the 2004 season, which will see its first league game played on May 16, Grunberg said.

Hapoel Jerusalem takes ULEB Cup

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hapoel Jerusalem overcame the most successful club team in European history and became only the second Israeli team to win a European basketball competition with an 83-72 victory over Real Madrid earlier this month.

With the win in the ULEB (Union of European Basketball Leagues) Cup, Jerusalem earned the right to participate in the lucrative Euroleague alongside Maccabi Tel Aviv next season.

Some 2,000 Hapoel fans who made the trip to Charleroi, Belgium, and thousands others who packed Hapoel's home arena to watch the game on a large screen, erupted in cheers when Madrid's Elmer Bennet missed a layup with 38 seconds left, and Hapoel's Kelly McCarty, the game's MVP, grabbed a rebound and drew a foul to put the game beyond doubt.

"This is the happiest day of my career," McCarty said after the game. "We have achieved the unbelievable."

"The victory is for Jerusalem and for the whole of Israel," said Hapoel chair Danny Klein. "We have worked for this moment for 10 years. The triumph makes up for all the difficult times we have suffered."

McCarty led Hapoel with 22 points, while Will Solomon and Doron Sheffer added 15 each, and Tunji Awojobi had 12 points and 10 rebounds. Bennet led Madrid with 21 points.

Hapoel blew open the game with a monster third quarter that saw their lead soar to 15 points. Madrid rallied to within five in the closing minutes.

Maccabi Canada to hold tryouts for youth hoops squad

Maccabi Canada will be holding tryouts this spring for teenage basketball players who would like to participate in the 17th World Maccabiah Games in Israel next summer.

Regional tryouts for the youth boys basketball team will be held in Vancouver on May 8 and 9; in Calgary, on June 5 and 6; in Toronto on May 18 and 20 at the Bathurst JCC, 8:30-10:30 p.m. both days; and in Montreal on May 29 and 30.

To be eligible, players must be born between Jan. 1, 1987, and Dec. 31, 1988, and must be resident in Canada six months prior to the games.

A final tryout is planned for the Labour Day weekend.

The purpose is to stock Maccabi Canada's first-ever entry in the youth basketball competition in Israel. At the last Maccabiah Games in 2001, the Canadian junior squad of under-16s brought home a silver medal, losing to the top-ranked U.S. team in the final.

The Maccabiah Games are held every four years in Israel. An estimated 6,000 athletes from 58 countries competing in 43 sports are expected to attend the next games, which will run from July 11 to 21, 2005.

Three NBA alumni, Dolph Schayes, Danny Schayes and Ernie Grunfeld, represented the United States at earlier Maccabiah Games. Canadian hoopsters Set Adler (University of Victoria), Nathan Aryev (York University), Alex Brainis (University of Guelph) and Alex Bougaieff (Rice University, Texas) are among past participants in Maccabi basketball tournaments.

For more information, contact Ted Badner, head coach of the youth team, at 905-707-7556 or Allen Gerskup, head of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee, at 416-630-7799.

Learning in New York

There are three central components to the AVODAH Jewish Service Corps' year-long program: Jewish living and community building, front-line anti-poverty work and education on local and global social justice issues, both from general and Jewish perspectives.

The goal of the AVODAH program is to have its participants educate, motivate and support one another to do the tikkun olam work our Jewish tradition compels us to do. In addition to our work at our respective non-profit groups, the 18 of us engage in program planning and participation to round off our experiences in Jewish social activism.

Each month, two or three AVODAH volunteers are responsible for creating educational programs for our group that address themes we decided were important to us during a brainstorm session at the beginning of the year. We voted to deal with such complicated and pressing issues as hunger, homelessness, the environment, freedom and liberation and tzedakah.

The monthly "point people" meet often to plan the twice-weekly programs that we all attend, and to line up speakers, texts and films and to organize panel discussions and activities that tie in to the month's topic. We also try to link our monthly theme to any Jewish holidays that month. We dealt with environmental issues in February to coincide with Tu b'Shvat, and ideas of freedom and liberation in the month leading up to Pesach.

The AVODAH volunteers who planned our March programs invited activists who examined with us issues of imprisonment and alternatives to incarceration. They taught us how prisons and the booming corporate prison system economically and socially destroy underprivileged, predominantly black and Hispanic families and communities, exploit prison labour to make brand-name clothing and promote the creation of harsher drug laws simply to fill new prison cells with more people. We also discussed some of the root causes of crime, such as drug addiction, poor education and endemic urban poverty, which affect many of our clients.

To explore such important concepts as prison abolition and raising the minimum wage – which is only $5.15 an hour in most of the United States – as we recounted the Passover story of slavery and freedom was deeply meaningful for me as a Jewish social justice activist and advocate.

There are also numerous opportunities to learn about contemporary issues in New York. A few months ago, my housemates and I attended a community event in support of detainees in Guantánamo Bay, whom the New York Center for Constitutional Rights is representing in the U.S. Supreme Court. Several of us also recently attended a weekend-long Jewish student global justice conference at New York University that dealt with globalization and fair trade, environmental sustainability, corporate accountability and ethical consumerism. I learned how important it is to buy fair trade coffee and chocolate as well as clothing that is not made in Third World or North American sweatshops, to support companies that refuse to exploit poor countries and instead find more ethical ways to make profits.

Such programs – which we plan ourselves or seek out in the New York activist world – enhance my everyday work as a legal advocate and inform my choices and responsibilities as a consumer and global citizen.

Our faith teaches us not only to think, study and question, but also to act and fix what needs repairing. AVODAH allows me to do both – from a Jewish perspective and with the support of my peers.

BRUNCH CASSEROLE

4 cups cubed French bread
1/4 cup melted butter
3 cups sliced mushrooms
4 cups grated Cheddar cheese
6 oz. lox, chopped
8-10 scallions, chopped
8 eggs
4 cups milk
4 tblsps. Dijon mustard
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1/2 tsp. paprika
1/4 tsp. cayenne

Place the bread in a glass, ovenproof 13"x9"x2" pan and drizzle with melted butter. Scatter mushrooms, cheese, lox, and scallions over the bread cubes. Whisk remaining ingredients together in a large bowl, and pour over everything in the pan. Cover and refrigerate overnight.

In the morning, bake at 325°F for about 1 hour, or until just firm and lightly browned.

Once again, we are being harassed by anti-Semitic crimes in Toronto, Montreal, and Kitchener. For Jews, this is a very old story, one we know all too well.

The question most often asked in the midst of these terrifying moments is "What is the proper response?" The answers range from acts of vengeance, which put us in the camp of the criminals, to hushed silence, which aids the enemy. In truth, our response as Jews and the response of both the various levels of government and Canadians at large has been healthy: community rallies to demonstrate our concern, quick action by the police, sincere expressions of outrage by government leaders, and shows of solidarity by Canadians of all faiths.

These responses come, sadly, from experience. We have lived through so many incidents of hatred directed against us (both in our lifetime and in the annals of Jewish history), that we seem to know instinctively how to react. We have rarely over-reacted, but we have learned lessons from those occasions when we did not respond adequately. All of this is obvious to most of us, but what of those in our midst who have not yet been exposed to such ugliness, our innocent children?

What do we say to children who are shocked by this recent wave of attacks and who lack our historical perspective? As they watch us organize rallies, co-operate with the police, and maintain vigilance, but also continue our daily activities, the next generation is learning the lessons we absorbed from our ancestors.

All of this is necessary, but is it sufficient?

When a Jewish library is burned down, the proper response must go beyond generous offers by Jews and non-Jews, by private citizens and publishers, to re-build and re-stock the stacks. The full and adequate response is to venerate the lessons in the sacred texts that were destroyed – by studying them and applying them to our lives.

The authentic and authenticating response to anti-Jewish hatred is to assert our Jewishness through deep engagement with its essence. We must do what we have always done: read our lives into the texts, and let the texts and their values speak to our lives.

A Jewish guardian at Sheppard, Bathurst

It might be that every intersection has its good and honourable man. He knows everyone in the community by name or situation, has done something for most of them and is very human and wise – so much so, you're never sure if the deeds he does are really so great. But they generally are.

David Serfaty, who lives at Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue, is one of those people. He is my dear friend Burt's father, a remarkable man, and has demonstrated his powerful commitment to Jewish values in the Bathurst-Sheppard area.

David was born on Oct. 28, 1928 in Tetouan, Morocco. His father, Abraham, was a custom mattress maker. With his wife, Leah, they enthusiastically practiced the Jewish tradition of hachnasat orchim – welcoming guests.

As a youngster, David successfully, in that mystical childlike way, memorized the Shabbat and holiday prayers and tunes.

"My father has a huge database of music in his head still today," Burt told me. "Most people can't do that."

In the early 1950s, the young vibrant cyclist proposed to his soulmate, Esther. She accepted. Over the next few years, as inhospitality brewed in the Kingdom of Morocco, their daughters Lilliane and Mercedes were born and the Serfaty family decided to set sail to a new land – Canada.

The exodus from a homeland and the subsequent strenuous adaptation as an immigrant to a new country is never easy and fraught with uncertainty. Despite those difficulties, David created a vibrant infrastructure for his family in Toronto, beginning in Regent Park and the birth of every Sephardi man's crown – a son they called Abraham (Burt).

Through the years, David shaped his life into a rich island of community and bountiful benevolence – whether in the shipping department at McGraw Hill where he worked, as the parnas/gabbai at Tiferet Yisrael Synagogue on Sheppard Avenue or in his home. In essence, he is a man whose title is his good name.

"I remember lying in bed in our apartment on Canyon Avenue, hearing my parents counsel couples, and other times seeing my father teach bar mitzvah students," Burt said.

"My dad used to tell the guys in the shipping department about Judaism and Israel, and he would help them with their troubles. His giving is from his heart and because he believes it's his duty as a Jew to help," he said.

As the parnas at Tiferet Yisrael, David has used his lifelong gift of remembering tunes and prayers as the bearer of the community's musical treasures and the person who determines the proper liturgy for different services.

Since his arrival in Toronto, David has also continued his father's tradition of making charoset en masse for the Sephardi community at Pesach. Using his father's tools, including a hand grinder for the nuts, David has made charoset balls for hundreds of families.

"My dad's charoset has a smell and taste that can't be duplicated. I'll continue the tradition. I feel compelled to," Burt said.

The Serfaty family grew beautifully and became a model of uncapped familial love and warmth – beginning with David's love for Esther.

"They never go to a bar mitzvah alone. If my mother's sick, my dad will stay home. My mother [once] went to Israel for six weeks and my dad was so sad. I felt it too," Burt said.

"I think my father would say he's a happy man. He would because he's content, so in love with my mother, and knows his family has grown up in a religious way."

"You know," Burt said. "I've never, ever felt betrayed by my father. I can't imagine what it must be like to go through that. I am so lucky. My dad is a good and honourable man. What a blessing to be able to say that, and to have him as my father."
